Held, that he could not be convicted on the second charge.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the A.R.M. of Queen's Town, sitting at Sterkstroom.

From the record in the Court below it appeared that on the 4th May of this year the appellant was charged with contravening the 21st section of Act 20 of 1894, the Scab Act, in that, "On, or about, the 26th March, he, being the owner of certain sheep running on the farm Lismore, and having a reasonable amount of suspicion that the sheep were infected with scab, did fail to give notice to the inspector in the field-cornetcy in which the said flock was running, and did fail to take proper measures to cleanse the said sheep." The accused was discharged for lack of evidence. Then, on the 11th May, he was also again before the same magistrate charged with the contravention of the same section of the same Act, under the same circumstances, only on this occasion the charge was split into two. The first count of the indictment was that he was the owner, and failed to give notice to the inspector within seven days of his becoming aware or having reasonable suspicion that the sheep were infected. The second part of the charge was that between the 12th March and the 10th April he failed to take proper measures to cleanse his sheep.

The Magistrate's reasons for judgment stated that on the first occasion the prosecutor failed to bring sufficient evidence, and then closed his case, whereupon the attorney for the defence applied for the discharge of the accused. This the magistrate was bound to give. As to the second occasion, the first part of the indictment was exactly similar to that appearing on the former occasion, but in the second part he was charged with failing to take proper measures between the 12th March and the 10th April to cleanse his sheep. As to the second occasion when the case was heard, he found himself justified in acquitting the defendant on the first count as the man in charge of the flock had proceeded to Sterkstroom to report the outbreak to the inspector, but he was away at the time. As to the second part of the indictment, he held that hand-dressing did not constitute "proper and diligent efforts," and he therefore convicted the defendant on this count. He called attention to the evidence given by the inspector and others as to the inefficacy of hand-dressing, and said that it was borne out by the fact that some of the sheep were infected by scab in April.

Mr. Burton for the appellant; Mr. H. Jones for the Crown.

Mr. Burton said that the main ground of the appeal was previous acquittal. He submitted that that plea was a justifiable one, and that the magistrate should have found in favour of the defendant when it was raised. It was quite clear that the defendant was charged on the 11th May with the same offence, and in respect of the same inspection. The same facts were under consideration, it was the same case, the same flock of sheep, and the only difference was in regard to the date. In the first charge the defendant was accused of committing the offence on or about the 26th March, and the week later he was charged with having committed the offence between the 12th March and the 10th April. As to the question of hand-dressing, he was disposed to say that the magistrate had acted rather hardly upon the defendant, seeing that there was no water convenient. March was a dry month, and the defendant did the best he could, next to dipping, by hand-dressing the sheep. It would have been very difficult for him under the circumstances to have complied with the Act.

Mr. Howel Jones supported the conviction, and contended that time was the essence of the offence.

De Villiers, C. J.: I wish it to be clearly understood that I do not accept the defence that hand-dressing is a proper mode of curing scab; the evidence is conclusive that it is a wholly improper mode of curing scab. It will cure the parts where the insect has become visible, and its ravages have become visible, leaving those parts wholly uncured where the scab may exist without the ravages having become visible to the naked eye. In the present case, it would appear that the scab was cured where the accused had hand-dressed it, but was still alive on other parts of the sheep, and it is clear that the only effective mode of curing the scab is by proper dipping. Therefore, if the sole defence had been that the accused did make "proper and diligent efforts" to cleanse the sheep, then, in my opinion, it would have failed altogether in the absence of proof that it was wholly impossible for the accused to use other means for the purpose. But the further defence is raised that the accused had been previously acquitted. The summons in the previous case was put in where the prisoner is charged with "having on or about the 26th March, 1903, being then the owner of certain sheep, and having become aware or having reasonable ground to suspect that the sheep were infected with scab, failed to give notice thereof to the inspector within the field-cornetcy where the flock was situated and forthwith to make proper and diligent efforts to cleanse the said sheep." The prisoner pleaded not guilty, and the judgment was that he be discharged Clearly that judgment amounts to a verdict of not guilty. If, therefore, the subsequent charge embraced the same charge as the one upon which the prisoner had been previously acquitted, clearly it was not competent for the Magistrate to try the prisoner again on that charge. Well, the offence is contravening the 21st section of Act 20 of 1894, and the part relating to this offence is that "Every owner failing to make such effort or to give such notice within seven days aforesaid shall be deemed to be guilty of a contravention of this Act." On the 26th March the accused knew that his sheep were infected with scab, and if it had not been proved in the first case before the Magistrate that he did not make such efforts within the time when under the second summons he could be convicted he would have been found guilty. In the present case, it is admitted that the failure to cure the scab was after the 26th; that is admitted, and if so, identically the same evidence to establish guilt in the first case would establish guilt in the second case. Therefore it is clear that the Magistrate should not have convicted the prisoner on the second charge after the acquittal on the first charge, and the appeal must be allowed.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

TABLE BAY HARBOUR BOARD v. SACKS, CHIAT AND CUMES. } 1903. June 10th

This was an action brought by the Table Bay Harbour Board against Messrs. Sacks, Chiat, and Cumes for the recovery of the sum of £64 12s., being the value of certain cases of eggs delivered to the defendants in error.

The declaration set forth that in January, 1903, part of a consignment of eggs, per the Kanzler, for Messrs. Berman, Grolman and Co. had been delivered in error to the defendant firm. The defendants were unable to return the goods to the Table Bay Harbour Board, who had paid the consignees the sum of £64 12s. The defendants admitted liability to the extent of some £43 odd.

In their plea the defendants admitted receiving the eggs, which bore the same marks as a consignment they were receiving at the same time. They tendered the amount of £43 odd, which they allege was the value of the twenty-nine cases.

The replication was general.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Gardiner) for plaintiffs; Mr. Alexander (with him Mr. Pymont) for defendants.

Samuel Berman, partner in the firm of Berman, Grolman and Co., produce dealers, said that they dealt largely in imported eggs, and disposed of on an average a hundred thousand per week. On the 5th January one hundred and ninety cases of eggs consigned to his firm arrived per the Kanzler from Lisbon. Twenty-nine cases had gone in error to the defendants. Witness claimed of the Harbour Board the sum of £64 12s., being at the rate of 15s. per hundred. Each case contained two hundred and ninety-seven eggs. In January the average price per hundred was 15s. In February the Table Bay Harbour Board paid him the amount of his claim.

Cross-examined by Mr. Alexander: When Lisbon eggs came good they were quite as valuable as Madeira eggs. Witness paid for the eggs about £1 1s. or £1 2s. per case. He was not aware that Klein Bros. sold the same eggs for 9s. per hundred. After the eggs were sorted he classified them as table eggs, frying eggs, and baking eggs. Seven days after he claimed 11s. he sent in a claim for 15s. The market price of Lisbon eggs at present was about 11s. Witness had four cases consigned by the Briton during the same month, and, although they were so bad that the firm lost £19 out of a total outlay of £26, he would still adhere to the statement that the eggs that came to this country were very good.

[By Maasdorp, J.: Witness refused to accept a tender of eggs from the defendant firm because he was afraid they might be bad.]

Gabriel Teixeira, partner in the firm of Shalovsky and Teixeira, wholesale importers, said that in January from 14s. 6d. to 15s. was a fair price for imported eggs.

William Edward Morrow, claims clerk of the Table Bay Harbour Board, stated that the consignment per the Kanzler was delivered to Berman, Grolman and Co. between the 5th and 13th January.

Cross-examined by Mr. Alxeander: He did not remember any claim for 11s. on the same matter.

For the defence, Mr. Alexander called Mr. Abraham Meyer Solomon, partner in the defendant firm, who stated that one of the partners (Sacks) attended to the shipment in Lisbon. The Kanzler eggs arrived in very bad condition, and several customers refused to accept them. Manuel Ferreira Cerraro was the only shipper at Lisbon. Forty to fifty per cent. of the eggs were bad, and when they were picked witness disposed of them at 11s. Madeira eggs were always 3s. dearer than Lisbon eggs, for which 10s. would be the utmost price obtainable in January. The usual loss on Lisbon eggs was 15 per cent.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He was not aware that he had received twenty-nine cases over his warrant for two hundred and seventy-six cases, and in all probability they were mixed up with another consignment. He had no entry of his purchase of eggs at 14s. 6d. from Teixeira.

Louis Levin, egg merchant, said that in January he bought some Lisbon eggs from Klein Bros., and paid for them 9s. per hundred. Madeira eggs were always worth a couple of shillings a hundred more than Lisbon eggs.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: It was cheaper to buy by the case, as the purchaser had to take the risk.

Joseph Cohen, egg merchant, said that in January he bought 20 cases of eggs from defendant company for 10s. They were delivered to witness. Witness examined the contents of five of the cases, and found they were not good, and so he returned the lot. Lisbon eggs were the cheapest on the market. Witness had never known Lisbon eggs to go higher than 10s. when bought by the case.

Israel Lewis, egg merchant, said the Lisbon eggs were the cheapest on the market. Next came Madeira and English; the Colonial were the dearest on the market. When picked eggs were sold, about 15 or 20 per cent. had to be thrown away. Picked eggs sold for 11s. 6d. would represent a greater profit than eggs bought by the box at 10s.

After hearing argument on the facts,

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiffs in this case received 29 cases of eggs for delivery to the firm of Berman and Co. By some mistake they failed to deliver the cases to Berman and Co., but delivered them to the defendant. The result of this was that the cases became lost to the firm of Berman and Co., and plaintiffs became liable to that company in the damage suffered by them. Having satisfied the claim made by Berman and Co. they acquired all the interest in the cases, that company having been satisfied, renouncing all interest they had in the matter. Plaintiffs were therefore entitled thereafter to get possession of these goods. The defendants were bound to deliver these cases to the plaintiffs, and being unable to do so, they are now liable to pay plaintiffs the value of the cases. The question the Court has to decide is as to what was the value of the eggs at the time when they should have been delivered by the defendants to the plaintiffs. It appears that when the question of the value arose between the Harbour Board and Berman and Co., the Harbour Board was satisfied to pay the sum of £64 12s., which was arrived at by taking the eggs as being of the average value of 15s. per hundred. There being 29 cases containing each 297 eggs, the result of that calculation was that £64 12s. became due by the Harbour Board to Berman and Co. But the defendants in this case are not bound by that calculation; it is still necessary to prove what the actual value of these eggs was. Berman has stated that the whole of the shipment he got by the Kanzler contained a very good quality of eggs, and that he had a good market for these eggs in January. He stated that he sold some of them at as high a price as 18s., and that the lower prices were 12s., and he places the average value of the eggs he received by the Kanzler at 15s. per hundred. He is not wholly unsupported in placing what seems to be a very high value upon these eggs. Mr. Teixiera has been called, and he says that during that very month he himself sold certain eggs to the defendants for from 14s. 6d. to 15s., but he says these were Madeira eggs. At the same time he states that there have been occasions when Lisbon eggs were equal in quality and value to Madeira eggs. This is very valuable evidence, because it supports Berman to some extent, as showing that it is not at all improbable that the eggs were of the average value of 15s., this being, according to Berman, a shipment of very good eggs. If we take 15s. as the average value, the question arises as to whether there should be any reduction in the number of eggs. In the calculation which the Court has to make some ingredient must enter which was not taken into account when a similar calculation was made between the Harbour Board and Berman and Co. It now appears that there is an average of broken eggs amounting to about 15 in every hundred. That was not allowed for when the claim was made by Berman and Co., against the Harbour Board. It should now be allowed, and to that extent the number of eggs should be reduced. If that is so, then we find that the defendants are now responsible for 29 cases of eggs, containing each not 297 eggs, but, say, 280 eggs, and if we place the average value of the eggs at 15s. per hundred we arrive at a result in round figures of £60. Now I think, in a case of this kind, where the plaintiffs may be looked upon in law as wrong-doers, that a liberal allowance should be made in calculating the value of the property of which such wrong-doers have deprived the owner, and the value of the property should not be cut down very nicely to the lowest that it might possibly have realised. I think the Harbour Board was very wise in not cutting down the claim of Berman and Co., but allowing it at the average value of 15s. per hundred eggs, and I think the defendants in this case would also have acted wisely if, instead of attempting by evidence to reduce the value of the eggs to the lowest possible figure, they had made a more liberal allowance, and had been willing to pay at the rate of 15s. per hundred eggs. Judgment must be given for the plaintiffs for £60 and costs.

Kotze, J., concurred.

WATSON V. VON DURING.

Brokerage.

A broker instructed to sell property who introduces a client to his principal is entitled to brokerage, even though the principal may afterwards deal with the client and sell the property to him through another broker.

This was an action brought by John Watson, broker, of Cape Town, to recover from Carl von During, a builder, of Cape Town, the sum of £38 10s. in respect of brokerage on certain property.

The declaration set forth that the plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendant in July, 1902, whereby the plaintiff received instructions to sell a certain store in Strand-street, and in consideration, was to receive 2½ per cent. on the purchase price. The plaintiff introduced a purchaser named David Israelson, and he alleged that Israelson was the principal for whom the property was purchased by another broker named Honikman. Wherefore plaintiff prayed for judgment for £37 10s. with costs.

In his plea, the defendant denied giving any instructions to the plaintiff, but admitted that the plaintiff introduced David Israelson. He denied that Israel-so was not aware that the said store was for sale before the plaintiff introduced him. On the 11th July the defendant sold the said store to Honikman, but he was not aware at the time that the said principal was Israelson.

The replication was general.

Mr. Rowson for plaintiff; Mr. Gardiner for defendant.

John Watson said that he was a broker, residing at Cape Town. He had had previous transactions with the defendant, who asked him to sell the store in Strand-street for £2,000. Witness brought Mr. Israelson to the store, and they afterwards met the defendant. Mr. Israelson offered £1,500, and the defendant was willing to accept that amount if Mr. Israelson would pay the brokerage. Witness told Mr. Israelson that £1,550 was the lowest, and it was understood that that amount was to include the brokerage. The defendant promised to see witness next day, but failed to keep the appointment. That day Mr. Israelson told witness that he had just bought the store through Mr. Honikman. Witness called on the defendant for his commission, but he refused to pay him. The defendant led witness to believe that Mr. Honikman had bought the property without disclosing the principal.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: The defendant never mentioned anything about any other brokers. Witness did not tell Israelson that his brokerage was £50. The defendant said that if witness could get £1,550 for the property, he (the defendant) would pay the brokerage. Witness merely told Israelson that he was taking him to a store in Strand-street, but he could not remember whether he mentioned that it was the defendant's store. Everything was settled the same afternoon.

David Israelson said that the plaintiff introduced him to the defendant over a store in Strand-street. Witness knew four months previously that the store had been included in a sale. The plaintiff pressed on him to come to the store. When he met the defendant, witness told him that the price of £2,000 was too much. Witness instructed the plaintiff to get the lowest offer, and plaintiff subsequently mentioned £1,550 or £1,600. In consequence of having seen the store with Watson, witness purchased it.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: Nothing was mentioned to the plaintiff about brokerage. Honikman made very easy terms.

This closed the evidence for the plaintiff, and Mr. Gardiner submitted there was no case, as the purchaser had said that there was no definite arrangement between himself and the plaintiff.

[Maasdorp, J.: I think there is a very strong case to be met.]

Carl von During (defendant) said that he told the plaintiff about the store being for sale, but at the same time told him that several other brokers had it in hand. He remembered meeting the plaintiff and Israelson in Strand-street, where the plaintiff mentioned an offer of £1,500, which was refused. A few days later a Mr. Millar brought him a message from Honikman, whom witness saw at the Langham Hotel. A sale was eventually effected, and Honikman made out the broker's note, but there was no name mentioned.

Cross-examined by Mr. Rowson: Witness never showed plaintiff over the store, which was usually left open. He would swear positively that the name "Israelson" was not on the note when he signed it. Honikman received 2½ per cent. commission from witness through his attorneys.

Isaac Joseph Honikman, broker, stated that in October, 1901, he learned that the property was for sale, and at that time he mentioned the fact to Israelson. In July one Millar came to his office, and arranged an interview with the defendant at the Langham Hotel, where the broker's note was passed. The buyer's name was not disclosed until the sale had been verbally concluded. Witness told the defendant that if Israelson would not take the property he would accept it himself.

Cross-examined by Mr. Rowson: He mentioned the fact of the property being for sale to Mr. Israelson. He was positive that the name of the purchaser was not on the note when the defendant signed it.

Hugo Millar stated that he introduced the plaintiff to the defendant about fifteen months ago. He arranged the whole thing up to the settlement. The name of the purchaser was not on the note when the defendant signed it.

Cross-examined by Mr. Rowson: He knew the defendant for about twenty years, and was at present living with him. When he introduced the plaintiff the defendant mentioned to him about some property that he had for sale. A few seconds after the defendant signed the note Honikman disclosed the name of the purchaser. He was to get half the brokerage, but did not accept it, as the defendant was in very bad circumstances.

[By Maasdorp, J.: He could not explain why he did not accept half the brokerage from Honikman, who, according to the defendant, was paid his commission in full.]

Mr. Rowson (for the plaintiff): The plaintiff has done everything necessary to entitle him to brokerage. He introduced a purchaser who himself says that he would not have purchased the property had it not been for plaintiff's introduction. If the defendant thought fit to afterwards complete the sale through another broker that does not disentitle plaintiff to his commission. Defendant's objects were clearly (1) to oblige a personal friend (Honikman) and (2) to save half the usual commission.

Mr. Gardiner (for the defendant): Clearly no definite agreement was arrived at between the plaintiff and Israelson, the eventual purchaser of the property. Plaintiff spoke about it to Israelson, just as he may have spoken about it to dozens of other people. He offered the property to Israelson on certain terms, which Israelson refused. No sale was actually effected by him, and therefore I submit he cannot claim brokerage.

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiff in this case sues the defendant for brokerage, alleged to be due to him in respect of the sale of certain property of the defendant to Mr. Israelson. The plaintiff says that he was employed by the defendant to sell his property, and it is quite clear from the evidence of Mr. Israelson that the plaintiff was at some pains to effect this sale. He took some trouble to show Mr. Israelson over the store, and also persuaded him to become a purchaser of the property, and after some negotiations he took him to introduce him to the defendant in this case. Now, there is no doubt that a meeting did take place, and through that meeting there were negotiations between the defendant and Mr. Israelson, through the instrumentality of Mr. Watson (who seems to be a go-between) in this meeting an offer was made of the property at a certain price, which Mr. Israelson was not prepared to pay. Ultimately, the property was offered to him for £1,600, and it came down finally to £1,550. We have that on the evidence, and Mr. Israelson corroborates the statement of Mr. Watson to that extent that during that interview an offer was made to him of this property for £1,550. The defendant says that that offer came about in this way: That after the offer had been made by Mr. Israelson of £1,550 the defendant was willing to sell it on condition that he should not become liable for the brokerage. To bring that about Mr. Watson proposed to Mr. Israelson to buy the property for £1,550, in which case the brokerage should have been paid according to the understanding between Mr. Watson and the defendant, and on this additional £50, Mr. Watson says that the contract for the sale of the property was finally concluded at the figure of £1,550, but there Mr. Israelson differs from him when he says that the contract was not finally concluded, but that before they parted he had stated to Mr. Watson: "You must bring me a final offer of the property at £1,550, and then I will make an offer." Mr. Israelson says if that final offer had been made, he would have been prepared to close. I can understand that a misunderstanding might arise when Mr. Israelson expressed himself in such a way that Mr. Watson came to the conclusion that the matter was finally settled. On the other hand, Mr. Israelson says if the sale had been concluded, he was willing to pay £1,550. The parties then separated, without concluding negotiations. Mr. Watson says it was understood that the contract should be finally entered into next day, but if we take the other evidence, it would amount to this, that the parties agreed that this matter should be further prosecuted, and the negotiations go on. In that way we can reconcile the evidence that there was a misunderstanding. Mr. Watson, under the impression that negotiations were still on, went to Mr. Israelson the following day for the purpose of closing this matter. Upon his arrival, he found the property had already been sold through the instrumentality of some other broker by the defendant to Mr. Israelson. Now the question arises: through what agency was this sale brought about, and who brought about the introduction between the parties which finally led to the conclusion of the contract? If we take the evidence as it stands, it would lead almost to the conclusive inference that the saleof the 11th July was brought about through the introduction and agency of the plaintiff in this case. The defendant, on the other hand, states that he never employed the plaintiff at all to effect this sale, that he never was his broker, and whatever pains he had taken were through his own motion, without any request on the part of the defendant. Now I must say I cannot accept that statement. We have the positive evidence of Mr. Watson that he was at great pains to sell the property, and he is corroborated by Mr. Israelson, and I think that must have been on the request of the defendant to sell the property. It is now contended that that sale was not brought about through the instrumentality of the plaintiff, but that a broker named Honikman effected this sale. It seems to me that the evidence given by the defendant in this respect is of a very unsatisfactory character. We hear from Mr. Israelson that the property was offered to him a day or two before he actually purchased it, and that the first person that offered it to him was Mr. Watson, so a day or two before that he got into negotiations with Mr. Watson. The statement of Mr. Honikman and Mr. Millar that they had the property some days before, and that they had discovered Mr. Israelson as a likely purchaser is contradicted by Mr. Israelson. I accept Mr. Israelson's statement to that effect, and consequently the introduction was wholly through the instrumentality of Mr. Watson. Now a great deal of suspicion is thrown upon the case of the defendant by several circumstances. It appears that Mr. Honikman came into the transaction, and when he met the defendant, they set about drawing up a broker's note. Now there seems to me to be no reason why there should have been any secrecy as to who the purchaser was at the time the broker's note was signed. The only reason given at the time was that he thought if he once revealed the name that Mr. Von During might effect the sale himself, but that could not possibly have occurred, because at that very moment the transaction was being concluded by the signatures on the broker's note, and on the signing of the broker's note there could have been no pos-go behind his back to effect the sale. There is certainly a conflict of evidence as to the reason for this secrecy in revealing the name, and there may be an explanation in the evidence which may be an explanation in that which Mr. Von During and Mr. Honikman have offered us in this case. Mr. Von During says that he accepted the broker's note signed by the broker without his revealing the purchaser's name, and that a little time after the name of the purchaser was inserted. That evidence to some extent is contradicted by Mr. Honikman himself when he says that Mr. Israelson's name was inserted at that very interview, and that for some reason or other which even now I am unable to fathom "q.q." was placed after his name. It may be then that this may be the explanation of the secrecy with reference to Mr. Israelson's name, that it is quite possible that Mr. Honikman was aware that these transactions were going on through the instrumentality of Mr. Watson, and that if he had told Mr. Von During that he could sell the property and given the name of Mr. Israelson that the defendant would have told him, "The negotiations are proceeding now through Mr. Watson, and I cannot accept your agency in the matter." It is quite possible for that reason Mr. Honikman concealed the name of Mr. Israelson until the contract was closed, but that would not have bound the defendant to pay Mr. Honikman the brokerage if he was convinced that the sale was really effected through Mr. Watson, and that Mr. Honikman was not entitled to expect anything, but he could have said, "I cannot accept your agency at all. I do not recognise you in the matter, and will not pay you your brokerage." The payment of this brokerage is also a question in a very unsatisfactory position. If Mr. Honikman had sold the property he would have been entitled to full brokerage. What possible reason could he have for doing a wrong to Mr. Watson? It appears that Mr. Honikman was not paid the whole of the amount, and that Mr. Honikman received one-half of what Mr. Watson would have received, and I think we cannot come to any other conclusion but that this sale was virtually effected through the agency of Mr. Watson, and that the other parties, to gain some profit, abandoned Mr. Watson, and allowed this matter to pass through their hands to the broker, Mr. Honikman, and in that way Mr. Honikman got one-half the commission, and the defendant saved one-half the commission. That leaves the defendant's case in a very unsatisfactory position, and I am bound to take the view put forward to the Court by Mr. Watson as correct, that the sale was effected through his agency, through his having introduced the parties, and that he is entitled, under the circumstances, to claim his brokerage upon the sum for which it was sold. He would have been entitled to claim brokerage on the sum of £1,550, but upon his declaration he seems to claim only £37 10s., which would be the brokerage on £1,500, and not £1,550. Judgment must therefore be for the sum of £37 10s., with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

HEADLEY v CILLIERS. { 1903. June 11th, „ 13th.

Constitution Ordinance—Election petition—Office of profit—Acting appointment.

The office of messenger of a Resident Magistrate's Court is an office of profit under the King in terms of the 47th section of the Constitution Ordinance.

A person holding such office, although only acting, is not eligible to be elected a member of the House of Assembly.

The office of Deputy-sheriff is not an office of profit under the Crown.

This was a petition brought by Robert George Headley, a registered voter, in the division of Prieska, to have the recent election at Prieska, wherein Petrus Stephanus Cilliers was returned as member of the House of Assembly, declared null and void on the ground that Mr. Cilliers held certain offices of profit under the Crown at the time of the said election.

The petition of Robert George Hedley showed:

1. That he is registered at Prieska as No. 48.

2. A public Court or meeting was duly and legally held at Prieska on February 20, 1903.

3. Petrus Stephanus Cilliers and Redmond Orpen were duly nominated as candidates for the Electoral Division of Prieska as Members of Assembly in succession to Christian W. H. Schroder at the said meeting, and a day was fixed for the poll.

4. P. S. Cilliers was thereupon returned and was gazetted as the elected member of the House of Assembly, of which House he claims to be a duly-elected member.

5. The said P. S. Cilliers is the secretary of the Divisional Council of Britstown, and at the time of his nomination and of his election held also the following offices:

(a) Deputy Sheriff for the Division of Britstown.

(b) Messenger of the Court of the Magistrate of Britstown.

(c) Field-cornet of Ward No. 1, Britstown.

6. Petitioner is advised that each of these appointments is held under His Majesty's Government, and is an office of profit under the Crown.

7. By reason of his holding and retaining the said offices, the said P. S. Cilliers is, by section 47 of the Constitution Ordinance, debarred from being elected or returned, or from retaining his seat as a member of the House of Assembly for the Division of Prieska.

8. The petitioner, in accordance with the provisions of Act 9 of 1883, presents this petition and complains of the undue election and return of the said P. S.

Cilliers by reason of his want of qualification and in consequence of his disqualification as aforesaid.

Wherefore petitioner prays that the Court will return the election and return of the said P. S. Cilliers to be null and void, that his return as member for Prieska may be set aside, that the seat may be declared vacant, or that this Honourable Court may grant such further or other order in the premises as shall be meet, and make such decree regarding the costs of this petition as shall be in accordance with law.

This petition was dated April 23, 1903. On April 25, 1903, the aforesaid R. G. Hedley filed a supplementary petition stating that sundry persons who had been deprived of the franchise for various political offences had voted at the said Prieska election, and that other persons had recorded their votes at more than one polling-station.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Benjamin) for petitioner; Mr. Burton (with him Mr. C. W. de Villiers) for respondent.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Does the respondent admit that he holds these positions?]

Mr. Burton: Yes, my lord. We sent a letter to the petitioner stating what we were prepared to admit that the respondent was before, at the time of, and after the time of his nomination, and still is the Deputy-Sheriff of Britstown. As to the messengership he admits that from the 11th July, 1901, to the 30th April, 1903, he temporarily discharged the duties of messenger at the request of the Resident Magistrate of the district. He admits that he was in receipt of a special allowance from the Government of £75 per annum for forage for two horses, which were used in the service of any process that might be necessary.

Leonard Tennant Thomas, clerk in the Colonial Office, produced the list of voters for the division of Prieska for the year 1899. The nomination for the recent election took place on the 20th February, and the poll was held on the 28th March.

Robert George Headley, the plaintiff, said his name was on the list and he signed the petition.

Godfrey Wm. Shaw, clerk in the Audit Office, produced the appointment of Mr. Celliers as messenger in the Court of the Resident Magistrate at Britstown, with a forage allowance at the rate of £75 per annum. Mr. Celliers was paid by the month.

Emile Henry van Noorden, relieving officer in the Civil Service, said he was acting as Magistrate at Britstown from March to May this year. During that time the respondent was Deputy-Sheriff and Messenger of the Court. He resigned his office as messenger on the 30th April last. Messengers were paid by the Government by way of forage allowance.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: He had the letter of the 11th July, 1901, from the Magistrate to the department. In this letter the Magistrate said that Mr. C. S. Andrews had resigned his appointment as messenger of the Court. The letter went on to say that Mr. P. S. Celliers, the deputy, and one of the few persons in Britstown who was in possession of a pair of horses, had signified his willingness to perform the duties of messenger until a chief constable was assigned to that division, and he had therefore appointed Mr. Cilliers, subject to the approval of the department, to act, with a forage allowance of £75 per annum. Mr. Cillier's letter of resignation was dated April 30. Mr. Cilliers received no fees from the office of messenger. The forage allowance was conditional on his keeping two horses for the public service.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What would it cost to keep a pair of horses at Britstown?]

It would cost about £6 a month.

Forage was very scarce during martial law, and consequently the keep was dear. Witness had given respondent certificates for the forage allowance. Respondent did not receive any remuneration, except the forage allowance. He had no pension, and he did not come within the scope of the Civil Service Act. He could follow any occupation he liked outside his office as messenger. Mr. Cilliers was an attorney, and he would have had the right to appear in Court to defend prisoners

[Maasdorp, J.: Who was the respondent's predecessor in the office of messenger?]

The Chief Constable. Fees were paid to the messenger in some places where that official had no other source of income.

John Henry Gately, Acting High Sheriff of Cape Colony, said that the respondent was now, and had been since 1894, one of the deputy-sheriffs. The appointment was made by the Sheriff. The deputy-sheriff was entitled to fees for civil and criminal work. For civil work, he was paid by the litigants. Money received from the Government went to pay him for criminal work.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: The High Sheriff was the only officer responsible to the Government. The Government had nothing to do with the deputies, and those were matters entirely between the High Sheriff and his deputies. It was not usual to appoint civil servants; attorneys as a rule were selected for the office in the up-country towns. The only restriction placed upon those holding the office was that they should not undertake criminal defence. In his experience deputy-sheriffs had been members of Parliament; there were several now.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Who hold both positions now?]

Yes; deputy-sheriffs who are now members of Parliament.

The Sheriff had dealt with the deputies simply as his agents controlled by himself alone.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: The Sheriff relied upon the Charter of Justice and the Sheriff's Ordinance for the power to appoint deputy-sheriffs.

[De Villiers, C.J.: How many members of Parliament are there at present who hold the office of deputy-sheriff?]

Witness: There are three at least besides Mr. Cilliers.

Sir H. Juta closed his case.

Petrus Stephanus Cilliers (the respondent) stated that about July, 1901, the Magistrate asked him whether he would act as messenger temporarily until a Chief Constable was appointed at Britstown. Martial law was in force at the time. Witness was one of the few persons who had any horses that could be used. Beyond the allowance for the horses, he received no remuneration, and he spent more than he received in keeping the horses. Witness resigned on the 30th April this year, but previously he had mentioned the matter to the Magistrate. He never had a letter of appointment. When he put in his letter of resignation of the field-cornetcy, he asked the Magistrate to make other arrangements with regard to the messengership. On his return from Prieska, he found his clerk had still been dealing with criminal work.

Mr. Burton closed his case.

Sir H. Juta (for petitioner): The facts of this case are very simple. In the first place, Mr. Cilliers was deputy-sheriff and he was also a messenger of the Magistrate's Court. No person who holds an office of profit under the Crown is eligible for election to Parliament. English law distinguishes between offices held from the Crown and offices held under the Crown. A member who accepts an office from the Crown is eligible for re-election. Thus, e.g., by accepting the office of Steward of the Chiltern Hundreds a member's seat is vacated, but he may be re-elected. See Rogers on Elections (p. 10), where he refers to the Statute. 6 Anne, c. 41, Section 24 and 25. Section 24 deals with offices under the Crown and Section 25 with offices from the Crown. It is not at all necessary that moneys should be received from the Crown in order that a seat may be vacated. The distinction I have pointed (p. 10). The distinction I have pointed out is also dealt with by Rogers at pages 44 and 45. The deputy-sheriff is appointed by the sheriff, it is true, but then this power vested in the High Sheriff is derived entirely from the Charter of Justice (Section 27). See also Ordinance 37 of 1828 (Section 1). The initial authority under which the deputy-sheriff is appointed is the Charter of Justice. In all criminal cases the Crown pays the deputy-sheriff to serve process, but it is not at all necessary that money should come direct from the Crown that a man may be disqualified. Ministers would be holders of offices of profit under the Crown save for Act 1 of 1872. See also Act 7 of 1899, Section 17. The whole object of this rule by which a member vacates his seat on obtaining an office of profit under the Crown is to prevent the Crown from exerting undue influence in Parliament. As to the office of messenger of the R.M. Court, there can be no doubt as to this being an office of profit under the Crown. Mr. Cilliers was appointed by the Attorney-General, and this was an appointment by the Crown. A fixed sum of money is paid by the Crown, and hence this is an office of profit held under the Crown. I may add that in all criminal cases the deputy-sheriff is paid directly by the Crown.

Mr. Burton (for respondent): It is unfortunate that the statutes do not afford more help to enable us to interpret the term "office of profit under the Crown." This, however, is a disqualifying statute, and must therefore be construed in favour of the person disqualified. In this connection, I would wish to refer to the office of sheriff as it existed in England when this Ordinance was framed. The contention of counsel for the plaintiff is a novelty. Many deputy-sheriffs have sat and several still sit in Parliament. The office of deputy-sheriff is not under the Crown, nor is it an office of profit. The Crown deals with the High Sheriff only. He is the only person responsible to the Crown. (Section 27 of Charter of Justice.) He alone receives a regular salary, and he appoints deputies to assist him in carrying out duties which it is impossible for him to perform in propria persona. The Government has nothing to do with the deputy-sheriff, who is responsible to the High Sheriff alone for misfeasance. (See Insolvent Ordinance, Section 16.) As to the distinction between the holder of an office under the Crown and from the Crown, see Encyclopædia of the Laws of England (Vol 11, pp. 530 to 532). In England the sheriff is not disqualified from being a member of Parliament, and his duties are the same as those of the deputy-sheriff here. Both are paid only by fees for work done. In criminal cases the High Sheriff is responsible to his deputy for fees. In England the sheriff is also returning officer, and for that reason cannot be elected as a member for the county for which he is sheriff. That is a very important restriction, because it shows that he is disqualified only as returning officer. Rogers on Elections (Vol. 2, p. 7). See the cases there cited. The respondent was not deputy-sheriff for Prieska, but for Britstown. The deputy-sheriff is not an officer of the Crown, but of the Court, much as an attorney is. He is not a member of the public service, but is the servant of the High Sheriff, and, unlike members of the Civil Service, he is at liberty to undertake any business provided he does not neglect his duties as sheriff. His position is very analogous to that of a Government auctioneer. In England all Government contractors are specifically excluded (Rogers, p. 26). Here it is not so. While Mr. Van Noorden was Acting Magistrate at Britstown, the respondent received nothing, because there was no work to do. The question is whether the term "office of profit under the Crown" does not refer exclusively to public servants. There is every reason why they should not be members of Parliament. Looking to the time when the Constitution Ordinance was framed, and bearing in mind the state of the English law at the time, it is difficult to see how he could be considered a public servant. As to the messenger of the Court, he fulfils the same duties in the Magistrate's Court which the deputy-sheriff fulfils in the higher Courts. I do not admit that the messenger holds office under the Crown, and I contend that his office is not an office of profit. He is not a civil servant, and his status is not provided for by law. He is a kind of Government contractor. He is allowed to conduct defences in the Magistrate's Court if he happens to be a law agent or an attorney, and that would be monstrous if he were supposed to be under the influence of the Crown. As to the object of excluding persons under the Crown from Parliament, see Rogers (Vol. 2, pp. 8 and 26). Rules of Court 294, 307, and 309 put both the deputy-sheriff and the messenger, as to fees, on much the same footing as attorneys. As to the messenger's horse allowance, that is not intended as a remuneration, but as a provision to ensure proper horses being kept for the public service. Another point is that the Government demands security from deputy-sheriffs and messengers, but not from Civil Servants.

I was not aware of that; but now they contribute to a guarantee fund. Respondent, moreover, was not actually holding the office of messenger at the time of his election. He merely filled the position for a time to oblige the Magistrate. He never accepted the office, but merely undertook to perform its duties temporarily.

Sir, H. Juta, in reply: The office of messenger of the Court is an office under the Crown. It is not a philanthropic office, but as a matter of fact, it is one of the most lucrative offices in the country. He got £75 for horse allowance, but attached to that was the most lucrative office of process serving. Take a big water case, with many witnesses, for instance, from a place like Oudtshoorn. The messenger might go out and serve fifty subpœnas in about an hour and a half at £1 2s. 6d. each. With the very high living now prevalent in the Colony, it might be said that there were a good many offices held under the Crown just now that were not offices of profit. In fact, if one might be permitted to say so, the new Estimates showed that.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (June 13):

De Villiers, C.J.: The 47th section of the Constitution Ordinance enacts that no person holding any office of profit under the Crown shall be eligible to be elected a member of the House of Assembly. The object of this enactment, which applies also to elections for the Legislative Council, was to ensure, as far as possible, the independence of members of the Legislature and to prevent the servility and corruption which had led to similar legislation in England. Until the time of the Revolution there seems to have been no limit to the number of so-called place-men who might be elected members of the House of Commons. During the reign of William the Third, Parliament ineffectually endeavoured to grapple with the growing evil, and it was not until the reign of Queen Anne, when the subservience of Parliament to the Ministry of the day had reached its highest point, that a practical measure was passed to limit the number of public officers who might occupy seats in the House of Commons. Instead of entirely excluding all office-holders from the House of Commons, as had been seriously proposed during the previous reign, it was now recognised that it was essential for the proper conduct of the business of the Government that a limited number of officers of the Government should be members of the House of Commons. By the 24th section of 6th Anne, c. 41, it was enacted " that no person who shall have in his own name or in the name of any person or persons in trust for him or for his benefit, any new office or place of profit whatsoever under the Crown, which at any time since the 25th of October, 1705, shall have been created or erected, or hereafter shall be created or erected . . . shall be capable of being elected or of sitting or voting as a member of the House of Commons." There remained, however, a numerous class of officials, holding offices under the Crown, who were still eligible to be elected. Their exclusion was gradually effected by numerous statutes subsequently passed, so that as a general rule no office-holders are now competent to sit in the House of Commons except such as have a representative character in connection with particular branches of the public service. In regard to offices created before the 25th of October, 1705, the 25th section of the Act of Queen Anne enacts that if a member shall accept such office his election shall be void, but such persons shall be capable of being again elected. "If," says Lord Macaulay, " persons who received salaries from the Crown had been suffered to sit without restriction in the House of Commons, those commissionerships, assistant secretaryships, chief clerkships, which are now held for life by persons who stand aloof from the strife of parties, would have been bestowed on members of Parliament who were serviceable to the Government as voluble speakers or steady voters. As often as the Ministry was changed, all this crowd of retainers would have been ejected from office, and would have been succeeded by another set of members of Parliament, who would probably have been ejected in their turn before they had half learned their business. Servility and corruption in the Legislature, ignorance and incapacity in all the departments of the executive administration, would have been the inevitable effects of such a system." On the other hand, he points out how still more noxious, if possible, would have been the effects of a system under which all the servants of the Crown, without exception, should be excluded from the House of Commons. In this Colony, Parliamentary Government would have been impossible without an amendment of the 47th section of the Constitution Ordinance. The Act 1 of 1872, which is generally spoken of as an Act for the introduction of responsible government, did no more than this, it allowed certain public officers, who are now known as the responsible Ministers of the Crown, to be elected as members of Parliament, "anything in the 33rd and 47th sections of the Constitution Ordinance to the contrary notwithstanding." As the law now stands, no person holding any office of profit under the Crown, other than one of the responsible Ministers of the Crown, is eligible to be elected a member of either House of Parliament. It is admitted in the present case that at the time of his election the respondent held the office of deputy-sheriff for Britstown, as well as that of messenger of the Resident Magistrate's Court of Britstown. As to the former office, it was conferred upon him by the sheriff of the Colony. In the performance of the duties of that office he acts only as the deputy of the sheriff, who is responsible, under the 27th section of the Charter of Justice for the due execution of all process. The deputy-sheriff, again, is responsible to the sheriff alone, and not to the Government, which had no voice in his appointment and has no control over him in the performance of his duties. The dangers, therefore, which the Legislature intended to guard against by prohibiting the election of persons holding offices of profit under the Crown do not exist in the case of a deputy-sheriff. His office is one of profit, but it cannot be reasonably regarded as being an office under the Crown. The position of a messenger of a Magistrate's Court stands on a different footing. He is appointed by the Attorney-General in his capacity as a responsible officer of the Crown, and although the messenger does not receive his appointment directly from the Crown, he is an officer under the Crown. If, therefore, the office is one of profit, all the reasons for excluding salaried officials would reasonably apply to him. An office may be an office of profit without any salary being attached to it, provided, of course, that the holder is entitled, by virtue of such office, to some fees or other emoluments. In England, it appears to have been held in Mr. Bathurst's case that in order to relieve from disqualification a person who accepts an office which would otherwise be an office of profit under the Crown, it is necessary for the holder to make a formal renunciation not only of any salary but of any fee or emolument in connection therewith. As messenger of the Magistrate's Court, the respondent in the present case was entitled to charge fees for the service and execution of civil process. It does not appear whether the fees actually received by him compensated him for the expenditure incurred by him in the performance of his duties, but this is not a matter which should enter into the consideration of the legal or constitutional question. It is well known that some messengerships of Magistrate's Courts are exceedingly remunerative, whilst others hardly pay the expenses of the holders. But it may safely be assumed that no one accepts the office unless he hopes to make some profit out of it. It is taken for the sake of the emoluments attached to it, and those emoluments cannot be earned without an appointment to the office by the Government. In England it would appear that the High Sheriff of a county, who is appointed by the Crown, is allowed to charge certain fees, but as the office of High Sheriff is one which existed before 1705 he is eligible to be elected by any constituency except that within which he is High Sheriff. But does a person who is appointed, while member of Parliament, as High Sheriff, vacate his seat in terms of the 25th section of the Act of Queen Anne? If he does not, it would show that a High Sheriff is not considered to hold an office of profit under the Crown, but counsel was unable to answer the question whether in England he would vacate the seat although eligible to be re-elected. Since the adjournment of the Court I have made further inquiries, and I find that it would be impossible for such a case to arise, seeing that, by a Resolution of the House of Commons of 7th January, 1689, it was declared to be a breach of privilege to nominate any member of that House for the office of Sheriff. It would be vain, therefore, to look for any asistance from English decisions upon this aspect of the case. But there is a decision of a Committee of the House of Commons upon a parallel case which appears to be entirely in point. In the Frome case, referred to in Rogers on Elections, (Vol. 2. p. 11), it was held that the office of Secretary of the order of St. Patrick (instituted in 1783) was an office of profit under the Crown, created since 1705, and that the sitting member was incapable of being elected under the 24th Section of 6 Anne c. 41. It was contended on the part of the sitting member that although he was in fact appointed by the Sovereign, it was because the Sovereign of the realm happened to be constituted Sovereign of the Order, that the secretary of such order derived his profits, not from the public, but from those becoming members of the order; and that therefore the mere fact of nomination by the Crown did not make the appointee an officer of the Crown within the meaning of the act. The Committee, however, held that he was disqualified. The 47th section of our Constitution ordinances places the holders of all office of profit under the Crown upon the same footing on which the holders of offices of profit under the Crown created since 25th October, 1705 are placed by the 24th Section of the Act of Queen Anne. If, therefore, the decision in the Fromc case is correct it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the sitting member in the present case was not eligible to be elected.

Quite independently of that decision I am of opinion that the office of Messenger of a Magistrates Court is an office of profit under the Crown, and the only other question to be determined is whether the temporary nature of the respondent's appointment prevents the operation of the disqualification. It was certainly intended to be only an acting and temporary appointment to meet the difficulty occasioned by the sudden resignation of the Chief Constable and the respondent resigned the appointment, not long after his election. Unfortunately, however, for him he omitted to resign before his election. It is quite impossible to hold, whatever hardship the contrary view might entail that because the appointment was an acting or temporary appointment any disqualification which would have arisen from a permanent appointment ceased to operate. The danger which the legislature intended to guard against was that of the loss of independence on the part of members of the legislature, and that danger would exist whether the appointment is an acting or a permanent one. Indeed, under certain circumstances, the danger might be greater in the case of an acting appointment, when the hope would exist that the appointment might be made permanent, than in the case of an appointment already permanent, when the rules of the service would prevent a summary dismissal without good cause. The present is not such a case but the decision of the Court must proceed upon certain definite principles without reference to any special peculiar circumstances of hardship.

In regard to the horse allowance of £75 per annum to which the respondent was entitled under the terms of his appointment, if that had been his only emolument there would have been fair ground for holding that, as he had to expend the money on the keep of a pair of horses, his services as messenger of the Court were wholly gratuitous. But he was also entitled to charge for the service and execution of civil process and it is impossible to say that the horse allowance did not increase the profits made by him in the course of such service and execution. Moreover the very fact that he was allowed to charge fees for such service and execution constituted the office one of profit, and as the office was under the Crown he was not eligible to be elected. The Court will, therefore declare that the respondent has not been duly elected for the electoral division of Prieska, and that no other person was or is entitled to be declared duly elected. The respondent will pay the cost of the petition.

Maasdorp, J., concurred.

Kotze, J.: In this case, which is if some public interest, I should have liked to have given a written judgment like the Chief Justice, but as we are agreed as to what our judgment should be, and it is of importance that our decision should be speedily known, I merely now wish to say that I agree with the judgment just delivered. The office of Deputy Sheriff is not an office of profit under the Crown. A Deputy Sheriff is appointed by the High Sheriff. He may at any time be removed by the High Sheriff, and the fees which he may draw are merely a remuneration for the services which he renders in the same way as an attorney employed by the Government would be entiled to his fees. The Messenger, however, is appointed by the Government, and besides a certain allowance of £75, which in the present case is said to have been paid for forage for two horses to be kept by the Messenger, he is also entitled to make certain charges in civil matters. The appointment to this office, to which an emolument and other pecuniary advantages are attached, is vested in the Government. It is, therefore, an office of profit under the Crown. As Mr. Cilliers, at the time of his election as a member of the House of Assembly, held this office, he was disqualified, and his election is consequently void.

APPEALS.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.

NQUMBELA v. CULLIGAN.

Medical practitioner — Fees — Proof of status—Sec. 56, Act 34 of 1891.

A medical practitioner who sues for his fees must prove that he is duly licensed to practise as such in this Colony, either by the production of his licence or by a certificate given under the hand of the Colonial Secretary. Louw v. Fryer (15 S. C. R. 214) followed.

This was an appeal against the judgment of the Acting Resident Magistrate in the district of Qumbu, in a case heard on the 6th March, in which the appellant was the defendant, and was sued by the respondent for £17 4s., being fees and charges for medical attendance. The appellant pleaded that he tendered £7 1s., and he also pleaded the general issue. Judgment was given for the plaintiff for £10 1s., and costs of suit.

Mr. Upington for the appellant. Mr. Benjamin for the respondent.

Mr. Upington (for the appellant). An initial point in this case is that the petitioner sues as a medical practitioner and produces no proof that he is one. See Section 60 of Act 34 of 1891.

[Maasdorp, J.: Does not that appear from the record?]

He has not produced the best evidence —viz: his certificate to practice.

[Kotze, J.: Suppose he goes into the box and says "I am a medical practitioner"?

That is not the best evidence.

[Kotze, J.: Suppose a man has lost his licence?]

He can get another, and if practising he ought to have a licence in his possession. A medical practitioner cannot sue for fees unless he can prove his licence, and Section 56 of Act 34 of 1891 provides for the proof being by certificate under the hand of the Colonial Secretary.

[Mr. Benjamin: I must admit that Louw v. Fryer (15, S.C. R., 214) shows that the evidence as to respondent being a medical practitioner is not sufficient.]

The Act implies that the best evidence should be produced, and that best evidence would be the production of his licence. Section 60 refers to proof both in civil and criminal proceedings, and excludes all proof which does not reach the standard of proof therein laid down. See Conry v. Bezuidenhout (13, S. C. R. 301).

Mr. Benjamin: In the case cited there was no evidence given by the doctor himself as to his being a medical practioner. In the present case the doctor said he was a District Surgeon and licensed medical practitioner.

Judgment reserved pending the production of the record in Louw v. Fryer.

Poitea (June 12):

Maasdorp, J.: This is an appeal to have a judgment of the Magistrate set aside in a case in which the plaintiff sues the defendant for fees due to him as a medical practitoner. The defendant in the Court below pleaded the general issue. Evidence was taken, and the Magistrate gave judgment for the plaintiff for a reduced amount of fees, not for the full amount of fees claimed by the plaintiff. The amount of fees is not now in question, but upon appeal the point is raised that there was no evidence in the Court below that plaintiff was a medical practitioner in the terms of the Medical Act. That question was not pointedly raised in the Court below, but is now made a ground of appeal. It appears that the plaintiff in giving his evidence in that case stated "I am a district surgeon of Qumbu, and a duly licensed medical practitioner." Appellant contends that that is not sufficient evidence under section 60 of Act 34 of 1891. That section provides that no person shall be entitled to recover any charge in any Court of Law for medical attendance, unless he shall prove upon the trial that he is licenced under this Act. Now the question arose whether the statement on oath by the plaintiff was sufficient proof. It appears that under certain circumstances under section 56 a certificate given under the hand of the Under-Colonial Secretary that the plaintiff is a duly licensed medical practitioner is allowed as prima facie evidence. The question arises whether in this case it is necessary for the plaintiff to provide the best proof, that is to produce his licence as a medical practitioner, at the trial. It seems that the Legislature has provided that in certain cases where some difficulty may arise a less valuable proof than the licence itself may be given at the trial, but that that proof, which consists of the certificate from the Under-Colonial Secretary, shall only be prima facie evidence. There was a case before the Court the case of Louw and Fryer, in which a similar question was raised, and yesterday, when the case was cited, there was some doubt whether any evidence at all had been given in that case that the plaintiff was a medical practitioner. If no evidence at all had been given, that case might not have been conclusive on this point, but if similar evidence had been given in that case, as was given in this case, then it would be conclusive against the respondent in this case. When the matter was referred to yesterday there was some difficulty as to the evidence, but on referring to the record again I find that similar proof was given in that case. The plaintiff is asked his name, occupation, and address, and he gives his name as Richard Charles Fryer, and states that he is a medical practitioner. Here, therefore, you have got similar evidence to that which was given in the case now before the Court, and the Court held that that evidence was insufficient proof that the plaintiff was a medical practitioner. It is conclusive that the evidence was regarded as insufficient proof that the respondent was a medical practitioner, and upon that decision the present appeal must be allowed, absolution from the instance being entered in place of judgment for the plaintiff.

Mr. Benjamin raised the question of costs.

Maasdorp, J.: I do not see any reason why the ordinary rule should not be observed, that the unsuccessful repondent should pay the costs of the appeal, and the costs of the Court btlow.

Kotze, J., concurred.

NIEKERK V. WAKEFIELD. { 1903. June 11th. Sept. 4th. „ 12th

Condition in a perpetual quitrent grant—Magistrate's decision on facts reversed.

Where the finding of a Magistrate is against the weight of evidence, the Court will depart from the rule not to disturb the finding of a Magistrate on questions of fact.

Where a perpetual quitrent grant contained a condition "that all roads and thoroughfares running over the land shall remain free and uninterrupted."

Held, (1) that, upon the facts, the road claimed by appellant was a road or thoroughfare at the time and within the meaning of the grant; (2) that appellant, although the diagram attached to the grant did not shew a certain road or thoroughfare claimed by him, could prove by evidence aliunde the existence of such a road or thoroughfare at the time of the grant.

This was an appeal against a judgment of the Acting R.M. of Umzini, in which the appellant was the defendant and the respondent was the plaintiff.

The plaintiff had sued the defendant in the court below for £10 damages for trespass, and judgment was given for the plaintiff for £1 and costs, except that the plaintiff was ordered to pay costs of an adjournment. On or about the 21st October, 1902, the defendant by himself or his boys entered upon the plaintiff's farm, and conveyed by a team of oxen trees from the forest of Zimunkulu along a private road, alleged to be the property of the respondent.

The magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said that the claim was for trespass and damages, and from the evidence he found that there was a short cut on the farm of plaintiff to that of the defendant, which was sometimes used for half loads, or for return empty wagons. He thought that plaintiff had a right to prevent the defendant from cutting up his farm. Apart from that he had not used the road properly by bringing a sledge over it. The road being out of sight of the plaintiff's house, that might account for him not preventing others from using it.

Mr. Upington for appellant; Mr. Burton for respondent.

Mr. Upington said that he took it that the claim for damages was merely formal, the real point being whether the plaintiff had a right to a small strip of road, branching off, almost at right angles, to the Zimunkulu Bush, across Strahlhoek and Driefontein, and joining the Harding-road. The magistrate, in his reasons, believed the evidence of the plaintiff and his witnesses rather than that of the defendant. He did not specify any particular witness. The evidence produced for the plaintiff was very inconclusive. The magistrate seemed to have relied simply on the evidence of Mr. Strong, who stated that he did not know the road in question. That was quite possible, because all the evidence that had been led showed that it was a rough track, up which, with great difficulty, wagons could be drawn. All the witnesses who knew the Zimunkulu Forest in the sixties, seventies, eighties, and nineties stated that the road was in existence then, and gave instances of the road having been used by people during those periods. With one exception they had all used the road before the country was annexed by the English. The transfer deed, he had no doubt, would reserve all rights of road in existence at the time of the annexation, and although it might not appear on the diagram, it was held in Chamberlain v. Hulley that that would not interfere with the reservation.

The appellant was sued in the Court below for trespass, and he set up the case that he was entitled to a certain short cut or footpath, and evidence was called to prove that this short cut had been in existence for a considerable period. The Magistrate did not found his judgment upon the question of whether the road was in existence prior to the date of the grant from which the plaintiff in the Court below, now respondent, took his title, but on the fact that in that grant all existing roads and thoroughfares were expressly reserved. The grant in the present case, as he (counsel) understood it, was exactly of the same nature as that upon which the Court decided in the case of Chamberlain v. Hulley (11, Sheil, page 193), and the two cases were from almost the same neighbourhood. The whole point of fact was whether this short cut or thoroughfare was in existence at the time this property was given by grant. The trespass complained of was that sledges were used over the path. One of the witnesses, a native chief, said that the road was used many years before Wakefield came into existence for sledges coming from the forest. He contended that the road was in existence before the grant of road was given. Niekerk said that he had always had the uninterrupted use of the road for about thirty-five years. Counsel submitted that on the facts disclosed appellant was entitled to the use of the road in common with other persons, and that the Magistrate was wrong in holding that a trespass had been committed.

Mr. Burton argued that there was no evidence to show that this was a recognised rood before the grant was made. The spasmodic use of the short cut would not upset respondent's title. He would not go so far as to say that the path must have all the characteristics of a public road, but it must be a thoroughfare used regularly by people of the neighbourhood for the purposes of their business. The appellant had failed to prove that at the time this grant was made in 1883 there was actually existing a thoroughfare—a thoroughfare which was used as of right by the people living in the neighbourhood.

Kotzé, J.: This is an appeal from the decision of the Acting Resident Magistrate at Umzimkulu. The respondent, Wakefield, owner of the farm Driefontein, sued the appellant, D. Niekerk, owner of the adjoining farm Middelwater for trespass and damages. Wakefield complained that the defendant had dragged a quantity of poles by means of oxen over his farm Driefontein, and he claimed the sum of £10 as damages. The defendant's answer to the action is that he was lawfully on a road leading from his farm Middelwater across the plaintiff's farm, and he denies that he committed any act of trespass. The Acting Magistrate, after hearing the evidence, gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff for £1 damages and costs. It appears that on the 20th July, 1883, a perpetual quitrent grant of the farm Driefontein, in the Umzimkulu district of Griqualand East, was issued in favour of Philander Niekerk, the plaintiff's predecessor in title. The grant was made "on condition that all roads and thoroughfares running over the land shall remain free and uninterrupted," and the simple question, therefore, is whether the defendant used a road or thoroughfare within the meaning of the grant. The Acting Magistrate, in the reasons given by him for his judment, says that there was a short cut over the farm Driefontein, which was sometimes used for bring along half-loaded wagons, or for the return of empty wagons in the very early days, and he adds that had a proper road been made there, the witness Strachan would have known it. He, therefore, came to the conclusion that the plaintiff had a right to prevent the defendant cutting up his farm by now using old short cuts as a wagon road. The Magistrate further observes that apart from this the defendant is using the road improperly by taking a sledge over it, and that he believed the evidence of the plaintiff and his witnesses in preference to that of the defendant and his witnesses. Now, while it is a rule of this Court not to disturb the finding of a Magistrate on a question of fact, depending upon the credibility of the witnesses, who have given evidence before him, cases may arise where the Court will depart from the rule, where, for instance, the finding of the Magistrate is clearly against the weight of evidence. I have carefully read through all the statemnts of the witnesses, and find it extremely difficult to set aside their evidence for the defence, except upon the hypothesis that what they have said with regard to the road in question is a pure invention. But I must hesitate to accept such an assumption, especially when two of the four witnesses called by the plaintiff to a considerable extent support the defendant's case. Thus the witness Banger stated that when he was sawing wood in the Umzimankulu Forest, that is from 1877, and for some 12 years after, there was a footpath, or short cut, which used to be traversed by horsemen, and also the four wheels of a wagon without the buck. This short cut could also be used for sledges, although he never saw any sledges drawn along it. Then the native Luben, alias Kok, said that he was in Banger's employ for six years, and people used to employ sledges on this road, or short cut. He also stated, "this track was commonly used." This evidence, therefore, shows that this footpath, short cut, or track, was used in 1877, and, subsequently, as a thoroughfare for people on foot, on horseback, and with sledges and wagon wheels, and that this was so not merely in the very early days, as the Magistrate expresses it in his reasons, but also at the time of the grant of the farm Driefontein, that is, in the year 1883. The evidence for the defence is that the defendant has used this road for thirty-five years, and that it was generally used by wood-cutters and natives for the purpose of conveying wood either in sledges or in half-loaded wagons. Without repeating the statements in detail of the ten witnesses called by the defendant, I will merely mention the evidence of the native headman, James Nyangwe, which is of importance. He has lived in the district for forty years, and says the disputed road has been in existence for many years before Wakefield came there. He has himself used this road since Wakefield became owner of Driefontein, and has never been stopped by him, and he adds, "all the people living on the other side use this road on horseback and on foot." Two other witnesses saw this road actually being made, and others again remember this road during the time when Mr. Strachan was magistrate, which was about 1880. The Acting Magistrate seems to attach considerable importance to the fact that the witness Strachan had no knowledge of this road, for he says that had a proper road been made there, this witness would have been aware of it. It is not explained what meaning the Magistrate attached to the words proper road. Strachan states that the only recognised road, whatever that may mean, is past Niekerk's farm, on to Beacon Hill. But the fact that Strachan does not know this road in question cannot weigh against the positive testimony of the defendant and his witnesses. Upon the evidence, it appears to me satisfactorily established that before and at the time of the grant (1883), this road was generally used by persons going to or coming from the Umzimankulu Forest on foot, on horseback, and with sledges and empty and half-loaded wagons. It is, therefore, a road or thoroughfare in its widest sense, and also within the meaning of the grant, which provides that all roads and thoroughfares running over the land, that is, existing at the time of the grant, shall remain free and uninterrupted. I may observe here that the nature or kind of road, and whether this road is a short cut or not, or whether the defendant can use some other road equally well, or by using this road in dispute, is inconveniencing the plaintiff, or whether the defendant may lawfully use a sledge upon this road, are all questions which do not affect the real issue. Although the road is not marked on the diagram which accompanied the original deed or grant, that does not prevent the defendant from proving the existence of the road or thoroughfare aliunde. As he has succeeded in so doing, and showing that the road existed at the time of the grant, the appeal must be allowed, and the judgment below altered into judgment for defendant, with costs. The appellant is entitled to the costs of appeal.

Kotze, J., mentioned that Maasdorp, J., concurred in this judgment.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

ADMISSIONS. { 1903. June 12th.

Mr. Benjamin moved for the admission of John Christian Wrensch as a conveyancer.

Application granted, and oath administered.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

SOUTH AFRICAN MILLING CO. V. GRAND JUNCTION RAILWAYS. { 1903. June 12th.

Mr. Benjamin said that he had to move for provisional sentence on certain bills, and also to apply for sequestration of the defendant's estate, but he understood that application was to be made for the matter to stand over until the 13th July, to enable the referee, to whom the matter of Hills v. Colonial Government had been reforred, to make his report.

Mr. Searle, K.C., said that he had not been instructed, but he had heard that that was so.

Case ordered to stand over until the 13th July.

ROWE V. ROWTOWSKY AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Close moved for provisional sentence for the sum of £115, less £30 paid on account of certain surety bonds, leaving an unpaid balance of £80.

Order granted.

B. LAWRENCE AND CO. V. PATTERSON.

Mr. Alexander moved for the provisional order for the sequestration of the defendant's estate to be made final.

Order granted.

BLACKBEARD V. SWARTBOY.

Dr. Greer moved for provisional sentence for £5 18s. 1d., being judgment given in the Resident Magistrate's Court at East London, and costs, and asked that the property be declared executable.

Order granted.

LITHMAN AND CO. V. GOODMAN.

Promissory notes.

G. owed L. certain sums of money and gave to L. promissory notes to the amount of such sums owing. G. now contended that these were accommodation notes, but the Court held that they were given as security for moneys owing by G. to L., and granted provisional sentence against G. on the notes.

Mr. Close moved for provisional sentence on three promissory notes of £760 7s., £473 6s. 6d., and £474 4s. 6d. respectively, and costs. Counsel mentioned that there was also a claim on the illiquid roll, but that was not before the Court at present.

Mr. Searle, K.C., for the defendant, read the latter's affidavit, which set forth that nearly the whole of the debts were contracted before he came into partnership with the firm Augman and Lewis. Bonds were to be passed on certain property at Sea Point and Salt River. The said bonds were to be paid in on the sale of the properties to be mortgaged. At the time of signing his power of attorney, he asked plaintiff to furnish them with a detailed account of their indebtedness. He had often promised to do so, but had never carried out his promise. It was clearly understood that the notes were signed to accommodate the plaintiff, and they were renewed from time to time, on the understanding that they were to accommodate the plaintiff, and not for any valuable consideration. When deponent took over the business of the said partnership, he asked the plaintiff to furnish him an account of his indebtedness, and he renewed the notes from time to time as they became due, on the express understanding that they were accommodtaion notes. He offered to carry out the agreement arrived at between the parties, and to pass a mortgage bond for the amount which might be due to the plaintiff, on condition that he rendered a detailed account, showing the amount due, and how it was arrived at.

Mr. Close read the replying affidavit of the plaintiff, in which he denied that the notes were given as accommodation notes. He said that the firm were indebted to him in various sums, and he agreed to give facilities to meet the same, provided they gave him security by two covering bonds on their properties. Owing, however, to a certain dispute, the bonds were not executed. Detailed accounts were always rendered when the goods were supplied, and monthly statements were always rendered, so that the firm were always well aware of the amount due to him. A number of notes were renewed from time to time by the defendant, as agent for Lewis. The bills were held for valuable consideration, and were from time to time renewed solely at the request of the said firm. Defendant asked deponent to accept him as debtor in place of the firm, and he agreed to do this, on condition that he gave a covering bond on certain property. At that time the firm were indebted to deponent in the amount of £1,869. He declined to render further accounts, because at that time he considered the defendant's request merely a quibble to delay passing the bond.

Mr. Searle said that the defence was that the promissory notes were given merely as accommodtaion notes, there being an arrangement between the defendant and the plaintiff in order that the plaintiff should discount these notes. The arrangement was that the bond should be passed for the indebtedness of the defendant's firm to the plaintiff, and that the indebtedness should be paid when the landed property was sold. That there was some such arrangement was clear from the letter of the plaintiff's attorney. The defendant did not incur these liabilities, they were incurred by the firm before he took over the business, and it was only reasonable that the plaintiff should furnish him with a detailed account.

Mr. Close (for the plaintiff) was not called upon.

Maasdorp, J.: It is quite clear in this case that the defendant, at the time when the notes were made, was indebted to the plaintiff in a sum exceeding the amount of these notes. There was a request on the part of the plaintiff that this indebtedness should be secured by a covering bond, and the defendant and his previous partners expressed a willingness to pass that bond, but a difficulty arose, and in the meantime it was not passed. The promissory notes were made for the amounts for which the plaintiff now claims judgment. It seems quite clear that when the notes were made, there was an indebtedness for the amount by the defendant to the plaintiff. Under ordinary circumstances, one would draw the conclusion that the notes were given in settlement of these amounts. Even when the notes were given, the plaintiff did not press the defendant, but allowed them to run on from time to time; renewals were given, and when these renewals were given from time to time, he expressed his willingness still to take this security bond which was given. The defendant says that these notes were not given in settlement of the debt that was due, but for the accommodation of the plaintiff. The plaintiff states that he was in no want of assistance at the time these notes were given, and that he took them in the ordinary course of business in settlement of the accounts he had against the defendant. On the whole, I think the allegations made by the plaintiff are more probable, and under the circumstances, it is more likely, with the information now before the Court, that the plaintiff will be successful, if this mater is further proceeded with, and the Court will give provisional sentence, with costs against the defendant.

Mr. Searle asked that the plaintiff should be directed to furnish defendant with an account of his indebtedness.

Maasdorp, J.: There is nothing before the Court now on which an order can be made to that effect. It seems there is a further amount due, and it is a question that can still be raised upon a claim for goods sold and delivered, but there is nothing now before the Court on which an order can be made. At present there will be provisional sentence, with costs.

Mr. Close: And interest from due date as prayed?

Maasdorp, J.: Yes.

BOXALL V. BROAD.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent. The provisional order was granted by Mr. Justice Kotze on 13th May.

Order granted.

EATS V. WHALLEY.

Mr. Russell moved for provisional sentence for £1,400 on a broker's note for the sale of certain property at Diep River, with interest and costs of suit, plaintiff tendering transfer.

Order granted.

THE MASTER V. LOUW.

Mr. Howel Jones moved for the usual order calling upon the respondent to file account in his capacity as executor testamentary of the estate of Matilda Louw.

Usual order granted.

NEL V. LATEGAN.

Mr. M. Bissett moved for the provisional order of the sequestration to be made final. Order granted as prayed.

THESEN AND CO. V. JACKSON AND CO.

Mr. Benjamin moved for the provisional order of sequestration to be made final.

Order granted accordingly.

TALJAARD V. BAUMAN.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved for provisional sentence for interest on a promissory note for £200, at the rate of 6 per cent. from the 1st August, 1899.

Order granted.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

W. AND G. SCOTT V. PINKER. { 1903. June 12th

Dr. Greer moved for judgment for £56 1s. 11d., for goods sold and delivered with interest a tempore morae, and costs of suit.

Order granted as prayed.

PURCELL AND CO. V. WILKINSON AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Buchanan moved for judgment under Rule 329d for £153 17s. 9d., amount due and owing for work and labour performed and materials supplied by the plaintiff to the defendants at their instance and request, with interest a tempore morae, alternative relief, and costs of suit.

Order granted as prayed.

TABLE BAY HARBOUR BOARD V. BUCKNALL STEAMSHIP LINE.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for judgment under Rule 329d for £540 14s. 3d., due and owing for work done, ship's dues, etc., with interest a tempore morae, and costs of suit.

Order granted as prayed.

TABLE BAY HARBOUR BOARD V. BERGL.

Mr. Searle, K.C., moved for judgment under Rule 319, but said he understood there was a motion on the roll by the defendant, and he thought it would be desirable to take the two matters together.

Mr. Benjamin said he appeared for the defendant in this matter, and the applicant in the action, and he asked that the matter should be allowed to stand over until the end of the roll.

Allowed to stand over accordingly.

LOCHNER V. WHITE.

Mr. Russell moved for judgment under rule 329d for £5, money lent by plaintiff to defendant, with interest, a tempore morae. and costs of suit.

Order granted as prayed.

PUGH AND CO. V. SEDDON.

Mr. Pyemont moved for judgment for the sum of £58 12s. 6d., for work and labour and material supplied by plaintiffs at the defendant's request, less £10 paid, leaving due £48 12s. 6d., with interest, a tempore morae, and costs of suit.

Order granted as prayed.

BRAUDE V. BRAUDE.

Mr. Upington moved for judgment in terms of the report of the Official Receiver. The matter arose out of an action in which the present plaintiff sued the defendant for the amount of certain partnership transactions, and the defendant, who was defended in the action, claimed, in reconvention, the sum of £300 odd. The Court gave judgment for the plaintiff in convention, and for the defendant as plaintiff in reconvention for the sum claimed. The whole matter was referred to Mr. Maynard Nash as referee, who had awarded £359 12s. 6d., after deducting the claim in reconvention, to the plaintiff as his share of the partnership transaction.

Order granted as prayed, defendant to pay costs of reference.

MARSH AND SON V. NEL.

Mr. Russell moved for judgment under rule 329d for the balance of an account for goods sold, with interest a tempore morae and costs of suit, less £50 on account.

Order granted as prayed.

REHABILITATION.

Mr. Pyemont moved for an order for the rehabilitation of Anthony George D'Arcy.

Granted.

RAPLEY V. RAPLEY. { 1903. June 12th

Mr. Upington, who appeared for the plaintiff, said that this was the return day of an order calling upon the defendant—the husband— to return to or receive plaintiff on or before the 31st May, 1903, failing which to show cause to-day why a decree of divorce should not be granted and plaintiff declared entitled to the custody of the minor children, and why he should not be ordered to pay the sum of £8 per month for the maintenance of the children. The Court had ordered personal service to be effected, but it had been found impossible to so serve the order, and application was now made for leave to make substituted service and for an extension of the return day. In support of the application, an affidavit was filed by Mr. Arderne, one of the plaintiff's attorneys, who detailed the steps taken to effect personal service, and said plaintiff had spent over £40 in her endeavour to trace her husband.

The Court made an order calling on defendant to make restitution of conjugal rights on or before the 12th July, failing which to show cause on the 1st August; personal service to be effected, if possible, failing which service by publication once in "The Star," Johannesburg.

WASSERMAN V. WASSERMAN.

Mr. Buchanan, for the plaintiff, asked that the rule nisi should be made absolute calling upon the defendant to show cause why a decree of divorce should not be granted, giving the plaintiff the custody of the children of the marriage. The matter had been before the Court on the 3rd February, when the defendant was ordered to return to or receive his wife by the 15th May, failing which, to show cause by the 30th May. On the 30th May the affidavit that defendant had neglected to comply with the order of Court could not be made, and the matter was allowed to stand over. The plaintiff, in her affidavit, stated that her husband had not returned to her.

The decree of divorce was granted, the plaintiff being declared to be entitled to the custody of the minor children.

DUTTON AND CASTLE V. TABLE BAY HARBOUR BOARD.

Mr. M. Bisset asked for a rule nisi calling upon the defendants to show cause why the plaintiffs should not be granted leave to sue in forma pauperis

Order granted as prayed, the rule to be returnable on the 13th July.

GREEN AND SEA POINT MUNICIPALITY V. SEBBA AND OTHERS. } 1903. June 12th.

Building regulations — Building line — Municipality — Ultra vires—Interdict—Sec. 4 (h) of Act 20 of 1896.

In contravention of certain building regulations of the Municipality of G. and S., and notwithstanding warning received from the municipal authorities, the respondent had proceeded with the erection of certain buildings without having previously had his plans approved of by the Municipality. The Municipality now sought to have him interdicted (1) from proceeding with the said buildings until the plans thereof should have been duly approved; (2) from building within 7 feet of the centre of the road.

Held that, as under Sec. 4 (h) of Act 20 of 1896, the Municipal regulation as to approval of plans was intra vires, the respondent must be interdicted from proceeding with his buildings.

Held further, that in the absence of fuller information as to the general line of buildings, the Court should not grant the second part of the interdict for which application was made.

This was an application to make absolute a rule nisi granted in Chambers on an application by the Municipality for an interdict restraining respondents from proceeding with the erection of certain buildings at the corner of the Main-road and St. John's-road, Sea Point, until such time as the plans therefor are approved by the Municipal Council. A rule was granted calling on respondent to show cause why the interdict prayed for should not be granted.

The affidavit of R. H. Heward, Municipal Engineer, upon which the rule was granted, stated that plans for the shops and dwelling over and at the rear thereof were submitted to his Council by respondents. On several occasions these plans were returned with objections, which were clearly defined. Notwithstanding that the plans had not been approved, respondents had commenced laying the foundations of the buildings. Such foundations had not been approved of, and were contrary to the regulations. In the plans submitted, the air space provided at the rear of the buildings was shown at 15 feet, whereas it was provided by regulation that the air space should not be less than 20 feet. According to the plans, the building line was not set back from the footway as required, while a balcony was shown projecting over the footway, contrary to the regulations.

In his answering affidavit, Henry Rowe Rowe, the respondents' architect, referred to certain correspondence which had passed between him, acting for the respondents and the Municipal Council. These letters he annexed to his affidavit. In the letter with which the plans submitted were first returned by the Council, several objections were made. In this and subsequent letters, the chief objections were that the building should be set back 7 feet, and that a balcony shown as projecting over the footway should be removed. In the correspondence, respondents objected to setting back the building unless corresponding advantage were given by the Council, or unless the Council expropriated the 7 feet in the manner provided for by law. Deponent stated that during the period of this correspondence he had an interview with the Council, and discussed the objections. All the questions were settled, with the exception of the setting back of the building 7 feet and the removal of a certain balcony. The respondents denied the right of the Council to insist on the building being set back 7 feet, but expressed their willingness not to proceed with the balcony if the Council did not press their objection concerning the setting back of the building. Deponent further stated that owners of other properties in the road had been allowed to erect balconies such as the respondents proposed to erect.

In a replying affidavit, Mr. Heward denied that all other questions save that of the building line and balcony had been settled at the interview referred to. The respondents only conditionally agreed to the suggestions of the Council. In a letter written on the 30th April, the Council had asked for the return of the plans stating that they could not come to any conclusion in the absence of the plans. On the 4th May a copy of the plans was sent by Mr. Rowe with a letter stating: "We hand you the plans for the information of your Council. In the meantime, we are proceeding with the work." In replying, deponent stated that he regretted to note the respondent's intention to proceed with the work before the plans were approved. He warned respondents that the Council would have no alternative but to apply for an interdict. He denied that other properties there were erected up to the back line of the footway.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., for the Municipality. Mr. Searle, K.C., for the respondents.

Mr. Searle, K.C.: The only point in this matter refers to some 7 feet of footway. We deny the right of the Municipality to set back our property 7 feet.

[Maasdorp, J.: Your balcony projects over this 7 feet?]

We are not going on with the work.

[Maasdorp, J.: Your plans show the projection, and you now complain that the Municipality will not approve of your plans.]

We offered to submit other plans without the balcony. The case of Green and Sea Point Municipality v. Kramer (12 C.T.R., 560), is in point. In that case also building operations had been continued, just as they were here. In both cases the whole point is whether the Council can compel a man to set back his buildings. These two cases are not precisely on all fours, but they are very similar. See also Town Council of Cape Town v. Shenker (12 C.T.R., 120). In that case it was held that the Town Council could not call upon a man to put back his building in order to give a street 40 feet wide. In this case no building line has been laid down by the Engineer, as in Short v. Town Council I admit that the majority of the buildings in the street stand further back than ours, but under the Sea Point Act, the Engineer has no power to determine the line of building. Short v. Cape Town Town Council (15 S.C.R., 190) is also very much in point. There the matter was decided under section 170 (sub-section 9) of Act 26 of 1893. That section is very similar to section 4 (g) of Act 20 of 1896, under which Green Point is governed. There there was a regulation authorising the Engineer to fix the building line, but providing that it should be approved by the Town Council. Here the regulation of the Council is ultra vires. I admit we have no right to put a balcony on the main road without the consent of the Town Council—Claremont Municipality v. Hudson (9 Sheil, 390)—but neither there nor anywhere else can I find that it has been decided that a municipality can fix an arbitrary building line. The Court has never decided that the Council has a right to lay down a building line in old streets. There is nothing on the record to show that the bulk of the houses on the Sea Point road are 7 feet from the road. The whole object of this Act is to secure regularity of the building line, but regularity cannot be secured in an old street, where the houses are placed anyhow. The Council cannot draw a line within a man's property, and say, "You must not build within this line." This the Court has never decided, and I therefore submit that the Town Council has acted ultra vires in laying down such a rule as this. Possibly the defendant may be technically in the wrong, but no similar case has ever been crisply decided.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for the Town Council): Counsel has avoided the main issue in the whole case. The first point is that municipal government is on its trial in this country. If a man might defy local regulations, local government could not possibly be carried on. Here the applicant gives notice to the Council that if he is not allowed to take his balcony over the public road he will do so without their consent. By their regulation (No. 251) they must have a certain air space in front of a three-story building. In this case the Council consented to curtail the air space, in consideration of one of the stories of this building consisting of a mansard roof. On April 23 we objected to their plans, and on the very next day they announced their intention of going on with their building. The proper course of the respondent would have been to have asked the Court for an interdict. If a man may set a municipality at defiance, and take the law into his own hand, there is an end to all municipal government. Spoliatus ante omnia restituendus. Here the Town Council is spoliatus. Therefore we are in the first place entitled to our interdict. In Town Council of Cape Town v. Shenker no objection was raised to the plans as such. Short's case is an authority for saying that the respondents in this case ought to bring their action. The applicant, in his affidavit, gives quite an erroneous measurement, and the answering affidavit shows that all we ask is to have this building put in line with the other buildings in the road (see the letter of April 23). Short's case shows that they were bound to put back their buildings. Short v. Cape Town Town Council (8 Sheil, 221). This is not a question of air space, but of building frontage. The building line may be irregular, but there is a line even if it is irregular. The line of the respondent must be on the same line with that of the neighbouring shops. There is a building line in the street, and now the respondent comes before the Court, and says: "I mean to drive a hard bargain, and if you do not allow me space for a balcony, I will build up to my line." If municipal government is to exist at all, a man cannot take up this position. Our Act does not (like the Cape Town Act) require the building line to be laid down by the Municipal Engineer. The whole question is whether, as a matter of fact, these buildings are out of line. We say they are, and if we are wrong in our contention, let them bring their action.

Mr. Searle (in reply): If they object merely to our building line, see Hudson's and Shenker's cases, and I submit that the Court will follow the decisions in these cases.

Maasdorp, J.: In this matter the applicants move for an interdict to restrain the respondents from proceeding with certain buildings, until the plans of these buildings have been approved of by the Municipality. Sub-section H, of Section 4 of Act 20 of 1896, gives the Municipality power to make regulations in regard to the deposit for the Council's approval of plans by persons intending to construct any building. By virtue of that sub-section, the Council has made a regulation, by which it is provided that no person shall proceed to erect any building without the previous sanction and approval of the Council. Upon that regulation, the applicants have now come into Court. It appears that certain plans have been submitted by the respondents to the Municipality, but they were found by the Municipality's architect to be objectionable in certain respects. One objection was that these plans provided for the construction of a balcony projecting over one of the public streets, and under Sub-Section G, of Section 4, of their Act, the Municipality has power to prevent the construction of projections over the public roads. Another objection which was raised was that the building, being a three-storied one, provision should be made for a certain air space at the back of this building. It is admitted now by the respondent that he cannot maintain his right to construct a balcony projecting over the street without the consent of the Municipality, and he has also admitted that sufficient air space is not provided for at the back of the building, and he makes certain proposals by which this may be rectified. The way in which these objections might be rectified is by omitting the balcony from these plans, and by constructing a Mansard roof over the proposed third story of this building. If plans to that effect are submitted, the Municipality seems to take it there would be no objection to the proposed building in itself, but, as it happens, the plans have not yet been submitted to the Municipality to remove these objectionable features. No plan has been submitted which provides for a Mansard roof at the back of the building over this third story, consequently there have been no plans submitted to the Municipality to which they can be asked to give their approval. Under these circumstances, the Municipality was perfectly right to come to this Court to object to a building being put up which was obviously objectionable in its character, and which they had not yet approved of. Upon that ground, an interdict must be granted restraining the respondent from proceeding with this building. But a further question has been raised, which was also one of the grounds of the objections raised by the Municipality, that this building should be put back from the street some seven feet further than the respondent proposes to place it. A further important question of law has been raised upon that objection, viz., the right of the parties in respect of the powers of the Municipality with reference to putting back the building into the general line of buildings, or, otherwise, of widening the streets for the purposes of improvement. I do not think there is sufficient information put before the Court upon which to dispose of that question. If that question is raised upon the ground that the Municipality has a right to regulate the general line of building and to force persons intending to put up a new building to confine themselves to that line, then there is not sufficient information before the Court to prove that this limit of seven feet would bring this building into the general line of building, and, consequently, the interdict must be somewhat modified in this form: The Court grants an interdict to restrain the respondent from proceeding with the building until the Municipality have approved of the plans, or until the interdict shall have been set aside on action brought by the respondent. The respondent to pay the costs of this motion.

Kotzé, J.: By a regulation framed by the Municipality under Act 20 of 1896, no persons are allowed to commence or erect buildings without first having submitted plans and obtained the approval of the Municipal Council. Plans were submitted by the respondent, to which objections were taken, and these plans were returned in order that they might be amended by the respondent and then resubmitted. It appears, however, from the correspondence that there is a dispute between the parties as to a building line, and several cases decided in this Court have been referred to in connection with the subject. The argument of the learned consel thereon may be very instructive, but in the view I take of this application I do not think it necessary now to say anything with regard to the merits of the dispute between the parties. That must be left for some future occasion The respondent is not entitled to act in the manner of which the Municipal Council complains. He cannot proceed with the building without having the plans first approved, and he should resubmit them with that view. If the Council refuses to approve the plans, and he feels himself aggrieved thereby, he has his remedy, and it is not now for us to say what particular form that remedy should take. Instead of doing that he has acted in defiance of the Municipal Regulation, and therefore I think the rule should be made absolute, but modified, as stated by my brother Maasdorp.

HIDDINGH V. ESTATE HERZOG.

Mr. Upington, for the applicant, moved for the appointment of another commissioner to take the evidence in London of Mr. C. H. van Zyl, who was at present on a trip round the world.

Mr. Searle, for the respondents, objected on the ground that the case had been standing over for a considerable time.

Order granted as prayed, Mr. Mackarness being appointed as commissioner.

ESTATE McGREGOR V DE BEERS CONSOLIDATED MINES. { 1903. June 13th.

Company — Dividend — Profit — Income tax.

The defendants being directors of a joint stock company registered and carrying on its diamond mining operations in this Colony, declared a dividend and informed the shareholders resident in this Colony, including the plaintiff, of such declaration, but, before payment, received notice from the Imperial revenue authorities that income tax was claimed upon the whole of the company's profits. The directors informed the plaintiff that they would resist the claim in the English Courts, and that in the mean time they would deduct the amount of the income tax from the dividend, but would refund the amount if the decision should be against the Crown. The company carried on its business of disposing of the diamonds in England, but the diamonds were delivered and paid for in this Colony. The question was not raised in the special case whether the Supreme Court could prevent the enforcement by the English Courts of the payment of income tax out of the dividend coming to shareholders resident in the Colony.

Held, that pending a final judicial decision as to whether income tax is or is not legally claimable from the company it was justified in withholding from the plaintiff a proportionate share of the dividend.

This was a special case stated between Margaret McGregor, Robert McGregor, and Henry Mathew Arderne, in their several capacities as executirs testamentary of the estate of the late Alexander McGregor, against the De Beers Consolidated Mines (Limited).

The statement of the case set forth that the plaintiffs are the executors testamentary of the estate of the late Alexander McGregor, who died on the 21st day of December, 1902. The deceased during his lifetime was domiciled, and resided for several years before his death in the Cape Colony, and had no business, residence, or agency in the United Kingdom, and was not personally liable to pay income tax in the United Kingdom. The defendants are the De Beers Consolidated Mines (Limited), a company registered and incorporated under the laws of this colony in this colony prior to the year 1892. The principal business of the company, which is the winning of diamonds from the soil, is carried on at Kimberley in this colony, where its head office is situated. The company has an office in London, principally for the transfer of shares. Several directors of the company reside in the United Kingdom, and the company has carried on certain business in London, and has entered into a contract in London, ratified by the Board of Directors at Kimberley, with a certain syndicate for the sale to them of the diamonds produced by the company, which are to be delivered and paid for in Kimberley. The dividends payable to the shareholders resident in this colony are paid by the company in this colony, and not in the United Kingdom. On the 30th June, 1902, the company duly declared in this colony a dividend of 10s. per share on its preference shares, and 12s. 6d. on its deferred shares, for the half-year ending June 30, and notice thereof was given to the deceased and other shareholders in the public press in this colony. On the 30th June the deceased was the legal holder of 4,857 preference shares and 5,164 deferred shares. On the 18th August, 1902, the defendants addressed certain letters to the deceased. Thereafter the defendants paid the deceased the sum of £5,302 9s. 11d., being £353 10s. 1d. less than the dividend declared, which the defendants have deducted as the income tax, and the deceased received the said sum under protest and without prejudice.

The plaintiffs contend: (a) That they are entitled to be paid the sum of £353

10s. 1d. (b) That whether the income tax is or is not legally claimable from the defendant company, it cannot be deducted from declared dividends payable to the deceased. (c) That if income tax can be legally claimed in the United Kingdom from the defendant company, such income tax cannot be charged specially against or deducted from dividends payable to the deceased while resident in this colony, and having no residence, business, or agency in the United Kingdom.

The defendant company contends: (a) That, pending a final judicial decision in England as to whether income tax is or is not legally claimable from the defendant company, it is justified in law and under powers conferred upon the directors in the trust deed in withholding from the plaintiffs payment of the said sum of £353 10s. 1d. (b) That if it should be finally judicially decided in England that income tax is payable by the defendant company, as claimed, such income tax can lawfully be charged specially against and deducted from dividends from time to time payable to the plaintiffs, whether on preference or deferred shares, notwithstanding that the deceased was resident in this colony, and that he had no residence nor carried on any business in the United Kingdom. Wherefore the parties pray for judgment upon their respective contentions, with the costs of this suit.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for the plaintiffs; Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Buchanan) for the defendants.

Two letters were put in, both from Mr. W. Pickering, secretary to De Beers. The first, dated Kimberley, August 18, 1902, was as follows: "I beg to hand you herewith dividend warrant for half-year ended 30th June, 1902, being at the rate of 10s. per share, less income tax referred to below, on the preference shares registered in your name in the company's books at that date, no acknowledgment of which is necessary. The company has received notice from the Imperial revenue authorities that income tax at 1s. 3d. in the £ is claimed in England upon the whole of the company's profits, notwithstanding that the company is domiciled in Cape Colony. Your directors will resist this claim, and, if necessary, take the case to the House of Lords. Meanwhile the company is compelled to deduct income tax at 1s. 3d. in the £ from all dividends on shares and interest payment on debentures and obligations. The amount of the tax deducted will be refunded if the Crown's claim is either abandoned or decided by the Courts to be unfounded."

The second letter contained a similar intimation with regard to the deferred shares.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (for plaintiff). The main point in this case does not turn so much upon the present dividend as on the principles which should govern applications as to income tax. Our contention is that income tax was not claimable under the law. If a company has declared a dividend, each shareholder has a right to sue for his share. Here a dividend was declared without any qualification, and we have a right to sue for it. After declaring a dividend a company cannot go back on the financial position of private persons. If after June 30 an obligation should arise it would be dealt with the following year. We did not overlook the rights of the municipality. See Lindley on Companies (5 Edit., 437). No company could carry on business if after once declaring a dividend claimants might come in and demand that the assets should be realized. This obligation is as against the company. We have plenty of assets and under these circumstances how can we be the only persons liable? The company denies liability, and how then can they make a deduction when declaring a dividend? If a dividend has been declared how can a company hold back a portion of it? As to income tax the language of the Act is very clear. The British Government want us to pay income tax, but they cannot deduct that from what is due to us.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for defendant): The dividend has nothing to do with the plaintiffs. On June 30, clause 4 of section 119 of the Articles of Association was adopted. All we ask the Court to do is to leave this case undetermined, or the jurisdiction of the English Courts will be interfered with. Suppose that after a dividend had been declared something had happened to absorb the De Beer's profits, it could not be said that the directors would be bound to pay the dividend declared. See Company's Act of 1892. There is nothing to show that a declaration of a dividend makes a company liable. Lindley on Companies (p 109). A company is not bound to declare a dividend twice a year, and by saying that dividends will be paid as soon as possible, the company reserve the right to declare it at their discretion. Directors cannot make a profit out of nothing, nor are they bound to anticipate their profits. They cannot do so, for there may be no profits, and certainly they cannot pay dividends out of capital. Then, again, it is said that plaintiff was not liable to pay income tax. If J.B. resides in London he has to pay income tax, but a shareholder who resides here is not; and yet why should he be favoured to the disadvantage of his English brother? A very important point raised in this case is that it has been said that the declaration of a dividend obliges the directors to pay; but see section 140 of Chadwick's and Eadie's Company Law and Watson's Executors v. Watson's Heirs (8 Juta, 283). Why should we be bound to pay anything to McGregor's estate, if we can claim a refund?

Sir Henry Juta (in reply): If shareholders have no right to sue for their dividends, how are they to get them? Section 127 of the Articles of Association provides for the retention of certain dividends, but apart from these cases so provided for, the company have no right to retain anything. If profits are made up to June 30, and some capital is lost in August, this latter fact does not affect the question of dividend up to June 30. It would be quite a different matter if a debt had been contracted by the company before June 30. A balance-sheet cannot be delusive if a claim is presented after the balance-sheet has been drawn up; more particularly if the claim is disputed. There is nothing to show that these dividends would have to be paid out of capital. We all know that that cannot be done. But the fact that directors were aware or not aware of certain payments having been made, cannot effect the situation in the least.

De Villiers, C.J.: The claim of the Imperial Revenue authorities to income tax upon the dividends payable to a person domiciled in this colony by a company registered and carrying on its mining operations in this colony appears to be a somewhat extraordinary one, but, upon the case as stated by the parties, the question does not arise whether the claim is enforceable against shareholders in this colony. The company appears to carry on some business in London, where it has entered into a contract with a syndicate for the sale of the diamonds raised by the company in this colony, but the diamonds are delivered and paid for in this colony. The directors intend to resist the claim in the English courts of law, and until the matter has been finally decided, I wish to say nothing about the merits of the case. The directors were informed of the claim after they had declared a dividend, and had informed the shareholders, including the plaintiff, of such declaration. After receiving notice of the claim from the Imperial Revenue authorities, the directors informed the plaintiff that they would resist the claim, and that, in the meantime, they would be compelled to deduct the income tax from the dividends, but that the amount so deducted would be refunded if the Crown's claim should be either abandoned or decided by the Courts to be unfounded. The plaintiff objects to any such deduction, and claims his dividend in full, and the question to be determined is whether, pending a final judicial decision in England, the directors are justified in withholding from the plaintiff payment of a proportionate share of the dividend already declared. A further question has been raised as to the future powers of the directors, in case the decision should be adverse to the company, but it is not advisable for the Court to express any opinion upon such a hypothetical case. It may prove possible for this Court to protect shareholders residing in this colony against the enforcement of the English claim to income tax in respect of dividends earned and declared in this colony, but the case stated by the parties themselves does not indicate the mode in which such protection should or could be exercised.

For the purpose of the present case it must be assumed that the English Courts would have the power to enforce the payment of income tax upon the whole of the company's profits. Upon that assumption the income tax would be a direct charge upon all profits made by the company. The directors were not informed of the claim until after they has declared the dividend, but their declaration of a dividend did not prevent them, upon being informed of the claim, from withholding a portion of the dividend in the interest of the whole body of shareholders. The directors of a company are no more than the agents of the shareholders, who are the partners in the concern, and the fact that a dividend has been once declared does not give the shareholders an indefeasible right to the payment, even if it be found that no profits have been made for distribution between the parties. It is true that according to Lindley on Companies, dividends which are actually declared and payable are recoverable by action, but he adds that the plaintiff must prove not only that the dividend has been declared, but also that it has become payable, and that he is entitled at law to the dividend. The learned author could not have intended to lay down the rule that a dividend once declared must be paid, whatever discovery the directors might make after such declaration. Supposing after a dividend has been declared it is found that, owing to some catastrophe of which they had no knowledge at the time of the declaration, the previous year's operations resulted in a loss instead of a profit, it would be impossible to hold that the directors would be bound to pay the dividend. Such a payment by the directors of the defendant company would be in direct conflict with its trust deed, which authorises the payment of dividends only out of profits. In the present case the income tax, upon the assumption already made, would be a direct charge on the profits, and it became the duty of the directors, upon being informed of the claim, to set aside temporarily a sufficient portion of the profits to meet the charge. As to what their ultimate duty will be the Court is not in a position to express any opinion, but for the present the judgment will be in favour of the defendants' contention that pending a final judicial decision in England as to whether income tax is or is not legally claimable from the company, it is justified in withholding from the plaintiff the sum claimed by him. The plaintiff will pay the costs of the action.

Maasdorp, J., and Kotze, J., concurred.

In reply to Mr. Schreiner, the Chief Justice added that judgment would be in terms of contention (a), plaintiff to pay the costs. It was really unnecessary for the decision to go beyond that.

COLONIAL GOVERNMENT V. HILLS. { 1903. June 15th.

Contract — Motion — Action — Forfeiture.

The respondent as concessionary of certain lines of railway agreed with the applicant that he would complete the railway in two years. It was further provided that if the line was not completed within that time, unless the delay was proved to the satisfaction of the applicant to have been occasioned by certain specified causes, the agreement should cease and the applicant might enter upon the uncompleted line and the respondent should forfeit any security lodged by him with the applicant. The respondent having failed to complete the line, the applicant after three years applied to the Court, by motion, for an order, declaring that the agreement was at an end, and authorizing him to enter on the incompleted line.

Held, that as there were no facts in dispute, the Court might, on motion, make such an order.

This was an application on motion, brought by the Commissioner of Public Works against Arnold Frank Hills, calling upon him to show cause why an order should not be granted declaring that the agreement entered into between the Colonial Government and the Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Co. had ceased and determined, and authorising the Government to take over the incomplete line of railway between Mossel Bay and Oudtshoorn, in so far as it had been constructed, and declaring the 10 per cent. retention money under the said agreement, and also under the agreements for the construction of the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat and the Somerset East-King William's Town lines, dated July 4, 1900, together with the security lodged with the Cape Agent-General to be forfeited to the Colonial Government as, and for liquidated damages sustained by the said Government for the non-completion of the said line, in terms of Section 17 of the said contract of the 4th July, 1900. And further, to show cause why the £10,000 referred to in Clause 16 of the said agreement should not be declared forfeited, and also to show cause why the Colonial Government should not be authorised to take over all the material imported or purchased for the said railway.

The affidavit of the Commissioner of Public Works, sworn on July 4, 1900, set forth that a contract was entered into between the Colonial Government and the Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Co., Ltd., of London, whereby the company undertook on payment of a subsidy of £2,000 per mile of railway to construct a line from Mossel Bay, via George, to Oudtshoorn, in accordance with certain plans and sections attached to the contract. The contract was confirmed by Parliament, by Act 19 of 1900. On the 18th December, 1900, the Thames Ironworks Company, with the consent of the Colonial Government, ceded its rights under the contract to Arnold Frank Hills, who undertook the obligations of the company under the said contract. Clauses 16 and 17 of the said contract were as follows: Clause 16: "The Concessionary undertakes within two months from the date of approval of this agreement by Parliament to submit to the department detailed plans and specifications for a deviation from a point on the original line surveyed by order of Government, at or beyond George, proceding towards Oudtshoorn, via the Zwart River, or Kayman River Valley, either or both, and within fifteen months from the approval thereof by the engineer, undertakes to complete the cuttings and embankments, whether in earth or rock, with the following exceptions; (a) heavy rock cutting or high embankment (say over 40 feet in depth or 40 feet in height respectively), of which, at least, a proportion of two-thirds of the total cube must be completed. (b) Tunnels up to 500 yards in length shall be completed, and over that length to be at least two-thirds complete. The Concessionary further undertakes to complete within the said period of fifteen months, all culverts and bridges on the said section, excepting bridges of fifty feet and upwards, or large viaducts. And the Concessionary also undertakes, within eighteen months from the approval of this agreement by Parliament, to complete the section of the line from Mossel Bay to George, with the exception of platelayers' cottages and station buildings. Should the Concessionary fail to complete the sections within the periods mentioned, he shall forfeit £10,000, unless the delay is proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner to have been caused by acts of God, war, insurrection, strikes, lock-outs, or combinations of workmen, or other unforeseen circumstances, beyond the control of the Concessionary, or from or on the part of the Railway Department." Clause 17: The Concessionary shall push the work forward with all possible speed, and complete it within two years of the approval by Parliament. In the event of non-completion within the time mentioned, unless the delay is proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Public Works to have been caused by the Act of God, war, insurrection, rebellion, strikes, lock-outs, or combinations of workmen or other extraordinary or unforeseen circumstances beyond the control of the Concessionary, or from or on the part of the Railway Department, the security, viz., 10 per cent. retention money for the construction of the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat and the Somerset East-King William's Town lines, and the security lodged with the Cape Agent-General shall be forfeited to the Colonial Government as and for liquidated damages sustained by the Government, and thereupon the agreement shall cease and determine, and it shall be lawful for the Government to take possession of such incomplete line as had been constructed by the Concessionary, and return the ascertained amount, less subsidy money and retention money to the Concessionary. The contract for the completion of the Mossel Bay-George section expired on the 19th April, 1902, but an extension of a month was granted, and the respondent had failed to complete the said section, which remains incomplete. On August 25, 1902, I wrote to the respondent, enquiring whether he had any intention of completing the line within the contract time, or within a reasonable extension, should the same be granted. On the same day a letter was written to respondent claiming forfeiture of the £10.000 provided for in clause 16 of the contract. The work done on the entire line represented about 28 per cent. of the total contract. On the 31st January, 1903, the respondent was conceded a further six months' extension. The extensions, in my opinion, were fair and reasonable. During the latter half of 1900 fair progress was made, but in 1901 the progress was most dilatory and unsatisfactory. The contractor's operations were singularly free from interference under Martial Law regulations until October last, but the delays thus caused were not such as would justify him in attributing the poor progress made during the war to this. The distance from Mossel Bay to Oudtshoorn was 75 miles, and the section from George to Oudtshoorn 43 miles. Up to the end of 1901 no construction work had been commenced on that section. In April, 1902, the works were practically closed down. Since June, 1902, no work whatever had been done on the line, and there was not even a man in charge. It was urgently necessary in the public interest that the incomplete line should be entered upon and taken possession of by the Government, as deterioration was constantly going on while it lay uncared for.

The affidavit of Thomas Smith McEwen, General Manager of the C.G.R., set forth that at an interview with Mr. Walker in January, 1901, he pointed out that the plans did not conform to the requirements of clauses 16 and 3 of the contract, inasmuch as the proposed deviation commenced on the Mossel Bay side of George, and that the plans showed a lengthening of the line in excess of what was allowed under clause 3. Deponent suggested a rack railway over the mountain, plans of which were not submitted till the 20th May, 1901. On the 1st July, 1901, the Engineer-in-Chief wrote to the contractor that if he desired to abandon the original line over Montagu Pass, it would be necessary for him to make formal application to the Government. No compliance with the Engineers's request took place. No plans were submitted until March, 1902, when it was found that a saving of two miles and not six would be effected by the survey of the respondent. The plans accordingly did not conform to the stipulation of the Government. At that date it was apparent that the contractor was not seriously pressing the work, and practically the work was closed down at the end of March or early in April. It is urgently necessary that the incomplete line should be taken over in the terms of Clause 17 of the contract, in order that steps may be taken to stop the deterioration and damage which are constantly accruing in consequence of its abandoned state, and also in consequence of the urgent necessity for completing the line in the public interest. There are large stores of material held by the Government, on which advances have been made under the contract to the extent of 40 per cent., and it is eminently desirable that these stores should be taken over at actual cost, and utilised in the construction of the railway.

The affidavit of William Molteno Bisset, attorney, Cape Town, stated that he represented the respondent in this colony. Respondent was at present in England. Deponent had perused the notice of motion. Respondent claimed that the matters in dispute and the differences in the contract should be referred to arbitration in terms of Clause 29 of the said contract. In the respondent's absence it was not possible to submit his contentions adequately to this Court. In view of the nature of the claims, deponent claimed that the matter should not be settled by way of motion, but by an action. Deponent verily believed that it was the intention of the respondent to carry out the said contracts. He further urged that the matter should not be proceeded with at present, in view of the fact that the arbitrators' report in the action, Hills v. Colonial Government, was expected to be shortly presented to this honourable Court.

The affidavit of Thomas Mouat Cameron Walker set forth that deponent had been for some years manager of the Cape Central Railways. He admitted the formal paragraphs in the Commissioner's affidavit, but stated that the plans in terms of Clause 16 of the contract had neither been approved or disapproved of by the Engineer of the Colonial Government. At the request of the Railway Department, subsequent plans were submitted for the construction of a rack railway early in 1902, but the plans had neither been approved or disapproved of Correspondence bearing on the matter was put in, including a letter from Mr. Alex. Robb, conditionally agreeing, on behalf of the Government, to an increased subsidy in connection with the rack railway. The respondent had been prevented from completing the work owing to the difficulties created through the war, and the Railway Department withholding payments on matters that should have been referred to arbitration. The respondent contended that, upon settlement of the very large amount which, under the judgment of the Supreme Court, he believed would be found due to him in connection with the Somerset East-King William's Town line, and Oudtshoorn and Klipplaat contracts, he would be in a position to satisfactorily prosecute and carry through the contract.

The affidavit of Thomas Roy stated that the completion of the Mossel Bay-George section was greatly retarded and rendered impossible by the non-approval of the sections of the proposed bridge—about 19 miles from Mossel Bay, forming the key to the position—on the part of the Government's consulting engineers in London Further difficulties were caused by military restrictions as to the use of dynamite and a shortage of native labour.

The answering affidavit of Alan Grant Dalton, acting engineer-in-chief, stated that the consulting engineers had approved plans and all that was wanted was their assent to the details. He further said that the site of the bridge was twenty-four miles from Mossel Bay, while rails had been laid only as far as fifteen miles twenty-six chains. As to the shortage of native labour, he believed a large body of natives left on account of a deduction from their wages for passage money to East London.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., for the applicant; Mr. Searle, K.C., for the respondent.

De Villiers, C.J., said he noticed that the affidavits of the applicants were silent on one point, and that was as to whether, if the Government completed the line, they would be prepared to pay actual cost of the materials already worked into the line, and supplied by the respondent.

Mr. Schreiner said that he was in a position to inform the Court that, as affecting this contract also, the Government would be prepared to pay actual cost as soon as determined.

[De Villiers, C.J.: In the contract the matter was not treated as a forfeiture, but as a payment in part. If it were found in the other case that a considerable amount was owing to the contractor, might not the Concessionary yet carry out the Mossel Bay-Oudtshoorn contract?]

There are numerous outstanding judgments and very heavy claims of debenture-holders, and one is rather at a loss to understand the affidavit, which says that the sum of money will be available to go on with the Mossel Bay-Oudtshoorn contract. There are judgments of the Court waiting to be satisfied, there are numerous creditors constantly before the Court pressing their claims, and almost proceeding to sequestration, and then there stand behind the quiet holders of debentures of hundreds and thousands of pounds, all of whose claims have been notified to the Government, and whose claims will be pressed immediately upon any sums of money being awarded by the referees. Assuming that the referees find that £200,000 are due to the respondent, are these people going to let Mr. Hills take that money and put it into the construction of the Mossel Bay railway? Since June, 1902, not a single thing has been done on this line, and there is not even a man on the line. Then, what becomes of all the talk about the difficulties caused by war and the want of labour?

[De Villiers, C.J.: I suppose the Government's sole object is to get the line constructed, they have no interest in ousting the respondent, and if there is still a fair prospect of his going on with the works they would let him go on?]

I am afraid they despair of that. We have tried and tried, but we have seen that Mr. Hills has taken something upon himself that he is unequal to, and that he is unequal to the task of completing these contracts. It is now seven to eight months beyond the time for the completion of the line. Only 28 per cent. of the construction work has been done. In the absence of a suggestion of fraud, it is impossible to go behind the certificate of the Commissioner to the effect that he is satisfied that the time for the completion of the contract has expired. There was no agreement whatever between the parties about a rack railway. There was a contract according to plans and sections, and the respondent could not show any new contract over of a novation or a repudiation; he could not show any new contract over against the old. There were miles of material on which the Government had made advances simply hung up—sleepers and all sorts of material awaiting construction. Surely it is important in the interests of all whom it may concern that the inevitable should be recognised that the contractor could not do his work, that he had failed to complete his contract, and that the Government should take it over and carry out what he had been unable to do.

Mr. Searle (for respondent): Our first objection is that this matter should not have been brought before the Court at all, but should have been referred to arbitration, in terms of clause 29 of the contract. That is a very wide clause. As to reference to arbitration, see Van der Spuy v. The Paarl Bank (7 Juta,, 245) and Davies v. The British Assurance Company (3 Juta, 416). In the former of these cases, an applicant who had submitted to arbitration wished to consult certain bank books; the Ccurt, however, would not even decide the point as to whether he had a right to do so, but referred the whole matter to arbitration.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But can the matter in this case be referred to arbitration? Under the contract the Commissioner seems to have absolute power either to approve or not.]

I submit that under clause 29, in the event of any difference between the parties the matter must go to arbitration, and then, if either party objects to the award, it will be for such objecting party to show mala fides on the part of the arbitrators. This contract applies arbitration in the widest possible way, and it applies even with respect to clause 17 if we do not approve of the Commissioner's decision. Then we object to a case like this—a case of ejectment being decided on motion. The Court will not ordinarily decide such cases on motion. Olivier's Trustee v. Olivier (9 Juta, 208) and Mills v. Jones (9 Sheil, 543). This case is not at all similar to Colonial Government v. Hills (12 C.T.R., 338), as that was in respect of a Government line, while this is a private line. This is not a case for a motion, as it is most important that we should have the witnesses before us.

[Maasdorp, J.: But the respondent has done nothing for twelve months.]

Yes, and the reason was that the Government took up quite an untenable position by insisting on a very complicated system of measurements of the work done, and the result was that while we said that a large sum of money was owing to us, they wanted to bring us in as their debtors. It was in consequence of these disputes that a year was lost. We hope to go on with the line as soon as the arbitrators shall have given their report, but meanwhile we do not know our financial position. The affidavits clearly show that there has been delay on the part of the Government,—e.g., the large bridge between Mossel Bay and George has never been approved of. Then in April we sent in plans, and all we could get from the Government was that they were receiving attention. To this day they have neither been approved or rejected. After all this delay on their part, it does not lie in the mouth of the Government to complain of our delay. The line is ours, and they want to come in under section 52 of the agreement of July 4, 1900, and take possession of our property. Let them bring an action for a declaration of rights. I could cite a number of cases on forfeiture, but the question does not directly arise now.

Mr. Schreiner (in reply): I submit that the case of The Colonial Government v. The Thames Iron Works (9 Sheil, 170) was quite on all fours with this case, and there the Court decided on motion. The contract gives the Government the right to take possession in case of certain eventualities. If no extension of time had been given, res ipsa loquitur, and we could have come in and taken possession. No doubt, the Commissioner has power to extend the time, but the contractor must show that such time has been given him, and that he has confined himself within the limits of such extended time. Here admittedly he can do nothing of the kind. The time originally allowed him and the extension of time have both lapsed; consequently the contract with the Government has determined, and there is no case for arbitration, simply because there is nothing about which to arbitrate.

De Villiers, C.J.: Under the 17th clause of the contract the Concessionary undertakes to push forward the construction of the line with all possible speed, and to complete the same within two years of the date of the approval of this agreement by Parliament. In point of fact, three years have elapsed, and so far from the work being completed, it can hardly be said to have been begun. Then the clause continues: "In the event of the non-completion within the time hereinbefore mentioned, unless the delay is proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Public Works to have been caused by an act of God, war, insurrection, strikes, lock-outs, or combinations of workmen, or through extraordinary or unforeseen circumstances beyond the control of the Concessionary, or from or on the part of the department," then certain results will follow. Among the results which will follow are these: "That that agreement between the Government and the said Concessionary shall cease and determine, and it shall be lawful for the Government to enter upon and take possession of such uncompleted line of railway as has been constructed by the said Concessionary." If these words are taken in their literal sense it would not have been necessary for the Government to come to the Court at all, because it would follow as a matter of course upon certain events taking place that the agreement ceases, and it would be lawful for the Government to enter upon and take possession of the line. But I consider that the Government acted quite properly when they decided not to take the matter into their own hands, but to get the formal sanction of the Court to the authority conferred upon them by Parliament. It is said that this application should not have been made by motion. The general principles laid down in the cases cited are well known, and have been acted upon, but where there are substantially no facts in dispute, and where, as in the present case, the powers already practically exist, and only the formal sanction of the Court is required for the exercise of that power, I think it would be carrying the practice to an extreme to insist upon an action being brought where it is clear what the result of that action would be. Now, before I say anything more about the 17th section, I wish to refer to the argument that the Government has no right to proceed at all either by motion or by action, and that the question in dispute ought to be referred to arbitration under clause 29. Well, it is clear what this clause means. If there are any sums or questions in dispute, they shall be referred to arbitrators; but it can surely not be held that the question whether a contract is in existence in terms of the Act and of the contract should be referred to arbitration. That would be entirely a question of law, going to the very root of the contract, and I do not think it can be regarded as a difference arising out of the contract. A reasonable interpretation must be given to this clause, and in my opinion it would be wholly unreasonable to say that the arbitrators should decide this question of law as to whether the Government may exercise the power of putting an end to the contract, and entering upon the railway upon certain events taking place. Now, undoubtedly, in the present case events have taken place upon which the Government may take over the railway. It is in the event of the non-completion within the time that the Government may take over that line, unless it is proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Public Works to be due to certain causes. It surely cannot be said it has been proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Public Works that these causes exist, when he expressly says that he is satisfied that they do not exist. The applicant further asks for a declaration of forfeiture of these amounts, and also for a declaration that the Government has the right to take over the railway material which they hold on lien, and to appropriate that material. Now in regard to the forfeiture, I think the matter does not press, and that that should be made a matter of action to enforce forfeiture; and there is greater reason for this course because if the Government takes over this line the Government will be bound to pay for the actual cost of the uncompleted line. Therefore, as to this forfeiture, the Court will not include that in the order. In regard to the claim of the Government to use the material, I confess I see the greatest difficulty in such a course. That course was adopted in the action in the previous case, where the question of actual cost arose, and there it was found impossible to ascertain the actual cost without considering also the material which had been ordered by the company; and, inasmuch as the cost of that material was a charge upon the Government which the Government had to pay, it followed that, the Government paying the actual cost of that material, should have that material. But the question of actual cost has not yet arisen in the present case, and until that question arises I do not think the Court is in a position to give the Government power to keep possession of these materials, even if they hold these materials as security for moneys advanced by them. In my opinion, the Government is entitled to an order declaring that the agreement between the Government and the Concessionary has ceased and determined, and the Court will authorise the Government to enter upon and take possession of such uncompleted lines of railway as has been constructed by the said Concessionary. In doing so, we follow the precedent which has been established in the previous case. As to the costs, they must be paid by the respondent.

WOOD v. LOVEGROVE. 1903. June 15th, " 16th, " 17th.

Landlord and tenant — Lease — Ejectment—Damages.

This was an action brought by John Henry Wood, of Muizenberg, against Mrs. Lovegrove, boarding-house keeper, for rent, ejectment, and damages.

The declaration set forth that about October, 1902, the plaintiff leased certain property known as "The Towers," Muizenberg, to the defendant for £25 a month, and it was agreed that, should the rent not be paid at the first of the month, the plaintiff had the right to terminate the lease. The rent for November and December was not paid, and the plaintiff gave one month's notice, but the defendant refused to give up possession. Plaintiff claimed £125, being the amount of 5 months' rent, with interest thereon, and an order calling upon the defendant to quit the premises, with an alternative claim of £105, being the value of occupation, with an additional claim of £100 damages.

The plea admitted the formal allegations, but stated that in November the plaintiff agreed to build and furnish four additional rooms. The defendant entered the premises about the 1st November, 1902, but the plaintiff failed to finish and furnish the rooms, as agreed upon. The defendant claimed, in reconvention, the fulfilment of the lease, possession of the stables, and, by reason of the plaintiff's failure to complete the said rooms, £150 damages, and £50 for furniture, with costs of suit.

The replication set forth that the lease of occupation of "The Towers" was the same, with the exception of the rent, as that of "The Beacons," in which the defendant had previously been in occupation. The plaintiff denied that the hiring of the stable attached to the premises was part of the agreement. He admitted that the rooms were not furnished, but denied that that was embodied in the agreement.

The rejoinder was general.

An action had been brought in the early part of the year to recover the rent for November and December of last year, but as it could not be listed for the February term, it was submitted that both cases should be taken together, as the evidence was practically the same.

Mr. Close (with him Mr. Bisset) for plaintiff; Mr. Benjamin for defendant.

Mr. Benjamin said that he had no objection to the consolidation of the cases, subject to his right to argue with regard to the extra costs which had been incurred by the elaborate pleadings.

John Henry Wood (plaintiff) stated he was the owner of the two houses known as "The Beacon" and "The Towers," Muizenberg. In March, 1902, the defendant entered into possession of "The Beacon" on a lease, which she refused to sign at the time. The only objection taken was the amount of the rent for the summer months. The rent was arranged to be payable on the first of each month for the preceding one. In September he sold the property, and he claimed that he was entitled to treat the lease as expiring at the end of six months, but in spite of the conditions, witness offered defendant a month's notice. Witness showed defendant "The Towers," but she did not care for it. Subsequently witness offered defendant an opportunity of purchasing the property at £4,500, and offered to provide all the money at the rate of 6 per cent. Defendant and her husband wanted him to add additional rooms, and witness thought it better to meet the defendant on her suggestion of leasing the property for eighteen months. Witness then agreed to put four rooms at the back of the premises, and it was finally agreed to close the negotiations, the defendant to pay 6 per cent. on the £4,500 and the rates, with the option of purchasing the property. The defendant asked for furniture in the shape of a bedstead, a few chairs, and a little matting, which witness agreed to provide. It was agreed that the lease of "The Beacon" should apply to "The Towers," and a lease of eighteen months was to be agreed upon on completion of the rooms. Defendant took up occupation in the middle of October, and witness told defendant that the rooms would be completed within a couple of months. The work was proceeded with as expeditiously as possible. The rooms were practically completed about the middle of December. There was some delay in delivering the bricks, which were actually brought hot from the kiln. The defendant showed witness a letter from a gentleman, and requested witness to have the rooms completed by the 13th December. Unfortunately wrong sashes were sent, and it was not till the 23rd December that the rooms were finished. Witness had trouble getting the rent, and one morning Mrs. Lovegrove came down to his office, and told witness that her husband had been very irritable of late, and had left without making any provision for the rent. Witness then said that he would not proceed any further with the furnishing, and that he was sick of the whole business. At Mrs. Lovegrove's request, witness's son wrote a letter in order to frighten the defendant's husband. In answer to a letter from witness's attorney, defendant replied that the plaintiff had constantly taken the workmen away, and that she had let the unfinished rooms to gentlemen. There was no agreement about the stables. The defendant's husband left Muizenburg before the agreement was concluded. Witness had never had any tender of rent from the defendant, or from anyone on her behalf Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: There was a verbal agreement between the witness and the defendant. It was agreed that the defendant was to have a lease for eighteen months, and to pay at the rate of 6 per cent. on £4,500, the cost of the additional rooms and the taxes. When witness considered the agreement broken, he instructed his attorney to write, stating that the rent must be paid in advance. Witness agreed to furnish the four rooms, and the statement in the replication was not strictly accurate. He would be surprised if witnesses would state that the rooms were not fit for occupation.

James Collie, sanitary engineer, said that he was doing some work for the plaintiff in November last, and was subsequently ordered to give up a job to attend to the alterations at "The Towers," Muizenberg. He considered the work was progressing satisfactorily in face of such obstacles as they had to encounter. There was a sufficient staff at the work, but there was delay through want of bricks. The roof was put on in a thoroughly workmanlike fashion. £40 a month was a reasonable rent for "The Towers" during the summer months.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He would not be surprised to hear that the rooms were damp, but he would certainly be surprised to hear that the doctor ordered a patient out of a room on account of the leaky roof.

John Millichip, carpenter, said that he was at "The Towers" most of the time the work was going on, and better progress could not have been made. The job was finished a couple of days before fore Christmas, but about the 10th December he noticed the defendant using one of the rooms. The order for the sashes was given in good time, but the wrong silze was sent, and that caused delay.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: The defendant kept pushing him on about the sashes. The defendant asked witness to send a telegram about the sashes in order to have the job finished.

Charles Wm. Deecker, editor of the "Seaside News," said he also dealt in the letting of houses, and was acquainted with the value of property at Muizenberg. For "The Towers" witness had got £35 a month during a certain part of the year. A fair value for the house (furnished) during the season would be £30 or £35 a month. The best part of the year was from December to February. Witness had been offered £40 a month for the house for three months from December.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: Witness did not know anything of the terms of the lease. He was told the rent was to be 6 per cent. on £4,500, at which figure there was to be an option of purchase.

Edmund James Wood, plaintiff's son, said that he was his father's attorney in the matter. The lease for "The Beacon" was drawn up in duplicate, and handed to the plaintiff. In January there was some attempt at a compromise, and a few alterations were made on the draft of the old lease.

This closed the evidence for the plaintiff.

Mr. Benjamin called the defendant, Alice Lovegrove, who said that she could not say whether the lease was handed back to the plaintiff. She objected to the clause in the lease which stipulated that if the rent was not paid promptly, the lessor reserved the right to terminate the lease. In the middle of September plaintiff came to witness, and told her that the lease of "The Beacon" would shortly terminate. About the first week in October, plaintiff mentioned that "The Beacon" was about to be sold, and asked witness to go and see "The Towers," another house of plaintiff's. There were only five bedrooms in "The Towers," and witness pointed out that it was unsuitable for a boarding house. The plaintiff said that he would do anything in reason by way of alterations. Subsequently in a conversation the plaintiff offered to sell "The Towers" to witness, and further offered to put up all the money, and agreed to take 6 per cent. Next day plaintiff suggested a lease of eighteen months, and was agreeable to rent the place at the rate of 6 per cent. on the purchase money, and the additional cost of the four rooms. There was nothing said about the "Beacon" lease, and plaintiff's terms were accepted as proposed. Witness entered on occupation of "The Towers" about the end of October. The plaintiff agreed to finish and furnish the additional rooms within a month. During the early part of November, witness showed plaintiff a letter, and he informed her that she would be quite safe in accepting the applicants, as the rooms would be finished long before the middle of December. The rooms were actually finished two days before the New Year, but they were not furnished at that time. Witness provided the furniture for the rooms. The furniture had been damaged by the rain. One of her boarders, Mr. Hannon, refused to allow his sons to remain in the rooms. Witness wrote to the plaintiff about the leakage, but he did not reply. The walls were saturated from top to bottom. At two o'clock in the morning of the 21st January all the occupants had to vacate the rooms on account of the rain, and the drawing room, passages, etc., were used as bedrooms that night. When the rain cleared off, witness's daughter occupied one of the rooms, and the doctor told witness to remove the girl at once. During the summer months the general tariff was ten shillings per day. Witness had sufficient applications to fill the rooms during the season. During December, January, and February she would have made about one-third clear profit out of a total turnover of £372. Witness never had possession of the stables, although they were promised to her within a fortnight. She could have let the stables on at least a couple of occasions.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: The matter of offering two months' rent by promissory notes of £25 each was purely an invention on the plaintiff's part. Before she had taken possession of the rooms she brought £25 to her attorney to cover the rent. She could not remember why her attorney tendered £24 10s. for the month of November, when she had not had occupation of the rooms. Although she had the furniture in hand, she claimed the amount she had paid for it, viz., £50. Witness lost fully £35 a month since November. Since the 22nd January witness had never been able to use the rooms. There might have been a lot of talk of a dry season, but the walls continued in a state of saturation. Her list of boarders was not correctly published in the "Seaside News." Most of the visitors were accommodated elsewhere, and merely dined at "The Towers."

By Kotzé, J.: The plaintiff promised a lease of eighteen months on occupation of "The Towers," but never sent any document to witness. Nothing was said about the rates.

James Peter Fenhoulet, medical doctor, practising at Muizenberg, said that in the last week of February he saw defendant's daughter in one of the new rooms. The walls were quite damp, and he ordered the patient to be at once removed.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: The rooms were structurally completed, but the rain was freely dripping through the roof.

Isidore Hannon said that he saw the work of excavation, which was carried on through a clayey-boulder soil. On the 15th December the rooms were incomplete, and when he left on the 15th January the rooms were leaking. He had to take his sons out of the rooms, and was compelled to leave a month before his time. Witness offered to hire the stable.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: The carpenter was incorrect when he stated that one of the windows was put in ten days before Christmas.

Fredk. Lovegrove, husband of the defendant, said that it was agreed with the plaintiff to accept "The Towers" on 6 per cent. on £4,500 and 6 per cent. on the cost of building and furnishing the new rooms. The lease was eventually fixed at eighteen months, in order to give the defendant two seasons. The plaintiff said that he would finish the rooms within a month. The water had a free inlet through the roofs of the rooms, and witness had seen as much as two inches of water on the floor.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: No taxes were ever mentioned, and the plaintiff's statement was undoubtedly an invention.

Daniel Carl Macintosh, architect, said that he inspected the rooms, and found the roof to be of insufficient slope. On that account water came freely into the rooms. He would not, by an means, consider the rooms finished. There was not sufficient fall behind, and the water could get under the floors. The rooms were uninhabitable.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: The roof should have been put on in iron, and not slates.

By Kotzé, J.: With the excavation the rooms could have been completed in two months.

James Bertram Bacon said that when Mr. Hannon came the rooms were unfinished. Witness occupied one of the rooms at the end of December. The leakage commenced about the middle of January, when he noticed moisture all round the rooms.

Counsel was then heard in argument on the facts.

Maasdorp, J.: It appears from the evidence in this case that the defendant was in October last a tenant of the plaintiff's premises at Muizenberg called The Beacons, and the plaintiff having sold that place, the parties entered into negotiations for the lease of another property of the plaintiff called The Towers, situated in the same neighbourhood. The issues raised in this case depend upon the result of those negotiations. Both parties contend that in the result they arrived at, an agreement whereby The Towers was let by the plaintiff to the defendant, although the plaintiff puts in an alternative claim for use and occupation, in case the Court should find that no contract was finally concluded. The plaintiff's case is that the property was hired by the defendant for eighteen months, commencing from the 1st of November last, the plaintiff was to add four rooms to the house within a reasonable time, the defendant to pay rent calculated at 6 per cent. on the value of the house, which was taken as £4,500, and on the cost of the four rooms, together with the rates, said to be £30 a year; rent for each month to be paid on the first day of the following month, and in the event of the defendant failing to pay rent on the day it fell due, the plaintiff was to have the right to terminate the lease, and take possession of the property immediately. The defendant disputes the amount of the rent, in so far as the rates are concerned, she denies that she consented to the termination of the lease upon failure to pay the rent on the day it fell due, and says with respect to the four rooms, that it was agreed that they should be completed and furnished by the plaintiff by the middle of November. The parties seem to be agreed that for the purpose of computing the rent, the cost of the four rooms are to be taken as £400, and the only question open in this respect is whether it was agreed that £30 annual rates were to be paid by the defendant. Upon this point we have the evidence of the plaintiff on the one side, and that of the defendant and her husband on the other. It seemed to me that the two latter had a clearer recollection of what took place than the plaintiff, who seemed in doubt as to the finality of the agreement, and whose alternative claims in the declaration are further evidence of his uncertainty. Then again, we do not find any mention in the correspondence which followed immediately afterwards of an agreement to pay the rates. I come to the conclusion on the evidence that the rates did not form part of the rent. Then the Court has to decide whether it was agreed that the plaintiff could terminate the lease if the rent fell in arrear. The plaintiff stated that it was agreed that the lease of The Towers should be on the same terms as the lease of The Beacons, and he put in a draft lease of The Beacons containing the above-mentioned condition. But I think it was clearly proved that the defendant refused to consent to that condition when she hired The Beacons, and that plaintiff did not insist upon it. It is certain that under that lease the defendant, as a rule, paid the rent of each month during the course of the following month, and not on the first day. Consequently, the terms of the draft lease annexed to the plaintiff's replication do not establish this point in favour of the plaintiff. It seems to me the contract in respect of The Beacons was carried out so satisfactorily by both parties that it could not have been considered necessary to introduce a stringent condition into the second lease, which was given up in the first. Then, again, the defendant contends that under the agreement the four rooms which the plaintiff promised to build were to be completed within one month, but from her own letters it would appear that the time was not definitely fixed. It was taken that they would take about a month to build, and an architect, called as a witness by the defendant, said he was of opinion two months was a reasonable time within which to finish the rooms. On the whole, I think it was contemplated that the rooms should be finished by the middle of December. Having settled the terms of the agreement, it follows that the plaintiff is entitled to rent at the rate of £22 10s. per month, being 6 per cent. on £4,500 until the 15th of December, and at £24 10s. a month, from that time being 6 per cent. on that amount, together with £400, the cost of the four rooms. This time is fixed for the increased rent, although the defendant pleads that the rooms were not then yet completed, because it must be taken as an element in the calculation of profits lost to her, which she claims from the time when the rooms should have been completed and furnished. The plaintiff is entitled to his rent, but he cannot claim that the contract be terminated and the defendant ejected from the house. In our law the non-payment of rent for a period like that in the present case is not a ground of ejectment, unless it is expressly made so by the contract. Plaintiff is entitled to rent up to the end of March in the sum of £119 10s. Defendant claims in reconvention a sum of money as damges suffered by her through the loss of profit she might have earned if she had obtained the use of the four additional rooms on the 15th of December. She has made a calculation, giving the takings from eight lodgers for the four rooms at £120 a month, and the profits out of that she puts at one-third of the amount. Although there is no evidence of the plaintiff upon this point, I think we may fairly take it that this is too liberal an estimate, and depends upon the rooms being constantly fully occupied, which is not very likely. If the profits are taken at a quarter of the takings, I think the allowance will be liberal. And that would for the three and a half months make £105. That the defendant is entitled to damages seems to me clear. She should, under the agreement, have had the use of four furnished rooms from the 15th of December. These rooms have not yet been finished so as to be habitable, and they have not been furnished, and the defendant has not had the benefit of them. I do not think it is necessary to consider the question of damages in respect of the stable. If the defendant had insisted upon getting possession of it, I have no doubt she would have had little difficulty in the matter. But I am of opinion that the stables were let with the house. It was contended that the claim for damages in respect of the four rooms for the months of January, February, and March was not specifically raised in the pleadings. But it would seem that the prospective damages mentioned in the first claim in reconvention has reference to these months, and upon the double set of pleadings in the consolidated actions, the parties come prepared to contest the claims covering those months. Judgment is given for plaintiff in convention for £119 10s., with costs in convention, and for plaintiff in reconvention for £105 and possession of the stable, with costs in reconvention. It will not be difficult to distinguish between the witnesses who gave evidence on the different claims. I do not think the plaintiff should have instituted the second case while the first was pending, and the costs of the pleadings in the second case must be paid by the plaintiff.

Kotzé, J.: The first question which arises is whether any binding contract of lease was entered into between the parties, and if so, what are its terms. Upon the evidence which has been submitted to us, I am of opinion that such a contract was effected by and between the parties, and that the defendant has correctly set out the terms thereof in her plea, with one slight exception, however, and that is that the four rooms had to be completed in about two months instead of one, as stated in the plea. The contract is that Mrs. Lovegrove, the defendant, agreed to hire the premises known as "The Towers," at Muizenberg, for a period of eighteen months, commencing from the 1st November, 1902, at a rental calculated at 6 per cent. on the sum of £4,500, which the plaintiff fixed as the purchase price of the premises, which amounts to £22 10s. per month. The plaintiff, at the same time, agreed as part of the contract to build and furnish four rooms to "The Towers," for which, when completed, the defendant was also to pay six per cent. on the cost, as and by way of rent. Although no definite evidence was given as to the precise amount of cost, the parties understood that it was to be taken at £400. This, then, would make the additional rent for the four rooms £2 per month, or a total monthly rental of £24 10s. in all. The four rooms were commenced immediately after this contract had been concluded, on the 9th October, 1902, and after the defendant had entered into possession of the premises leased. The rent for November was not paid by the defendant on the 1st December, and she intimated to the plaintiff that she was not able to do so, and that her husband had gone upcountry. Thereupon, the plaintiff caused his attorney to write to Mrs. Lovegrove on the 5th December that the rent was overdue, and that it was payable in advance, and that unless the rent was paid promptly on the first of each month as it fell due, the lease would be cancelled. This position it seems to me the plaintiff was not entitled to take up. It was no part of the contract that the rent should be paid in advance, nor was it stipulated and agreed between the parties that on non-payment of rent the lease should cease and determine. The letter to which I have referred gave rise to a somewhat voluminous correspondence between the parties, and although the plaintiff continued to maintain that he was entitled to terminate the lease, he, nevertheless, went on with the building of the four rooms. He, however, refused to provide furniture for these rooms, as he had undertaken to do. He states, in explanation of this, that he completed the rooms because, in his own interest, he could not leave work of that kind unfinished, and that he considered that as no rent had been paid he was not obliged to furnish the rooms, as he regarded the arrangement with Mrs. Lovegrove at an end. As I have already observed, the plaintiff was mistaken in this view, and was obliged, moreover, to complete his portion of the contract. He was bound to have the rooms ready for occupation and furnished by the 15th December at the latest. This he failed to do. Mrs. Lovegrove was anxious to get into these rooms as soon as possible, and of this the plaintiff was fully aware, as she told him she had several applicants for rooms; it being just then the season, or busy time of the year, at Muizenberg. One of these applicants was Mr. Hanau, who went to stay with Mrs. Lovegrove, and he has testified that on the 15th day of December, the day when he arrived at "The Towers," there were no windows or doors in the rooms. The workmen did not leave the place until the end of December, and the roof, owing to a defect in construction, leaked so badly that on the 15th of January Mr. Hanau had to leave, for it was altogether impossible to continue the occupation of one of these four rooms. If this had not occurred, Mr. Hanau would have remained until the 15th February. Doctor Fennelly, a medical practitioner, has also told us that the rooms were so damp that they were uninhabitable, and that he ordered his patient to be immediately removed from her room. There is ample evidence as to the uncomfortable and uninhabitable condition of these rooms, which was due to leakage from the roof. Since the 22nd of January the defendant has not been able to let any of these rooms. Such are the main and material facts. The claim for rent for the months of November, December, January, February, and March cannot, of course, be disputed. Although the plaintiff is not entitled exactly to what he asks, there must be judgment in his favour in convention for rent for the five months at £22 10s., that is for £112 10s. plus £7, that is to say for £119 10s. As to the claim in reconvention for damages, I have arrived at the same conclusion as my brother Maasdorp, and agree that Mrs. Lovegrove is entitled to the sum of £105 as compensation. With regard to the stable, that, of course, went with the building, and is included in the lease of "The Towers." The defendant has allowed the plaintiff the temporary use of that, and I think it clear that if Mrs. Lovegrove had pressed for possession of it, the plaintiff would have vacated it. The additional claim of Mrs. Lovegrove that the plaintiff should be ordered specifically to sign and execute a proper contract of lease, as set out by her in the pleadings, I do not think it necessary to consider. The parties now know their legal position, and should regulate themselves accordingly. I will merely express the hope that they will amicably settle any further differences so as to avoid the necessity for any future litigation.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

MALCOMESS AND CO. v. CHETTY. { 1903. June 16th.

Mr. Benjamin, for the plaintiffs, applied that the matter be allowed to stand over for a further week, as negotiations were still pending.

Application granted.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

GENERAL MOTION.

Mr. Close moved, as an urgent motion, on behalf of Henry Howard, for an order restraining one James Moodie from further using a bioscope, the property of the applicant.

The petitioner's affidavit set forth that he left for Natal in May last, and had left the bioscope behind in Somerset-road. The said James Moodie had taken possession of it, and had since the 29th May last been giving exhibitions at the Odd-Fellows' Hall, Plein-street, and was representing himself under the name of Howard. The machine was valued at £200, and would be very easily damaged.

A rule nisi was granted calling upon the defendant to show cause on Friday why he should not be ordered to deliver the bioscope up to the applicant. A temporary interdict restraining the respondent from removing the property from Cape Town or disposing of it was also granted.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

HENDRICKS AND SOEKER V. ATKINS. 1903. June 17th. „ 20th. „ 22nd.

Architect—Delay in completion of contract—Final certificate.

Where delay was caused by the architect in not supplying necessary and proper details when asked by the contractors to do so, and where the building-owner caused further delay by not delivering certain iron-work, which he had undertaken to do.

Held, that the building-owner could not claim liquidated damages provided for by the contract from the contractors by reason of the noncompletion of the building by the stipulated time.

Held further, that, by the terms of the contract between the building owner and the contractors, the former was not precluded by the architect's final certificate from instituting a claim for liquidated damages against the contractors.

This was an action in which the plaintiffs claimed £188 11s. 3d., with interest from the 23rd August, 1902, alleged to be due upon an architect's certificate for certain buildings erected by the plaintiffs for the defendant. In reconvention, defendant claimed £250, liquidated damages for breach of contract and £60 loss of rent due to the plaintiffs' default.

The declaration set forth that a contract was entered into between the plaintiffs and defendant on the 9th October, 1900, whereby the plaintiffs undertook to erect certain premises for the sum of £4,200, to be payable in instalments upon the architect's certificate. The plaintiffs duly carried out their work. The defendant paid instalments from time to time, and on the 23rd August, 1902, after the final completion of the contract, a certificate was given that £188 11s. 3d. was due.

The defendant's plea admitted the contract, but denied that the plaintiffs duly carried out the contract, and said that the premises were not completed within the time specified in the contract. Tht amount of the plaintiffs' claim was admitted as portion of the contract, but by reason of the matter set forth in the claim in reconvention the plaintiffs were indebted to him in the sums of £250 by way of certain penalties provided for in the contract, and £60, being the amount of rent for three months, during which time the defendant was unable to occupy the premises. The premises were to be completed by the 1st May, 1901, and, if not within that time, or by a further date allowed by the architect, the plaintiff should pay to the defendant the sum of £10 a week as liquidated damages. The time was extended to the 12th June, 1901, but the plaintiffs had not completed the premises until the 4th December, 1901. It was agreed in the contract that the plaintiff should use proper materials and execute the work with good workmanship, but should any defects arise within three months of the completion of the premises, the plaintiffs had to be called upon to make good such defects. Defects did arise, and it was while these were being made good that defendant was deprived of the use of the buildings, and lost the rent now claimed.

The replication said that the certificate referring to the non-completion of the work was not granted until the final certificate had been granted. The delay was caused by the default. neglect, and omission of the defendant or his servants in failing to supply details with regard to the foundations, and to certain iron columns, and by reason of the plague. This caused the work to be prolonged into the rainy weather, and by reason thereof the work was greatly delayed and frequently stopped. They denied that the work which had to be made good was due to any neglect on their part, and said it was due to the fact that certain work had been done on the instructions of the architect's assistant and defendant's agents, which required to be restored. They denied that they were liable for any sum.

The rejoinder was general.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Rainsford) for plaintiff; Mr. Gardiner (with him Mr. Greer) for defendant.

In answer to questions raised by the Bench,

Mr. Searle said that their case was that this matter of penalties and extension of time was simply an afterthought. There was no arrangement between the parties as to an extension of time. The plaintiffs did not want an extension of time; they were delayed in the work by the late arrival of building materials from England which defendant had to supply, and the consequence was that the operations were thrown into the rainy months. Counsel quoted at some length from the clauses of the contract. He added that the plaintiffs were really in the position of defendants; their declaration was admitted, and the defendant had filed two claims.

[Maasdorp, J. (to Mr. Searle): Is it your contention that they should first lead evidence?]

Mr. Searle replied that he thought that should be done upon the pleadings.

Mr. Gardiner contested this view, and urged that it was for the plaintiff to show that the building had really been completed according to contract. Counsel questioned the right of his learned friend to lead evidence on the alleged delays in material arriving from England, seeing that it was not specifically mentioned.

Mr. Searle, replying to Maasdorp, J., said he was prepared to go on with the case. He added that he should like a ruling of Court on the question of material arriving from England.

Maasdorp, J., said that if necessary the plaintiffs could amend their pleadings so as to embrace this particular point.

Mr. Gardiner contended that the plaintiffs should be bound strictly to their pleadings, and pointed out that he might be embarrassed if this question were raised.

Maasdorp, J., said that if necessary, counsel would be allowed time to be instructed on that point.

Mr. Searle proceeded to call evidence.

Barry Hendriks, one of the plaintiffs, said he had been in business fifteen years in Cape Town. Witness and his partner entered into a contract for the erection of a building for defendant at the corner of Long-street and Bloem-street. They commenced work in December, 1900. They had to pull down an old building, and they had to make excavations, when they found clay, slate, and rock at the foundations. In places they had to remove rock from 6 to 9 inches deep. There was no rock shown in the specifications. There was delay on account of the excavations. The architect was Mr. M. Rosenberg. He had to supply detailed drawings. They were stopped because they could not get those details. He asked for details of the columns in the basement, and at the first floor to carry the four storeys of the building. The iron columns were being made by Messrs. Donald Bros. He could not get the columns made until he got the detailed drawings. He was first stopped a couple of weeks on this account. Then he was delayed by the ironfounder seven or eight weeks, as they could not get men owing to the plague. The columns were found to be too short, and another fortnight's delay occurred. There had been a mistake in the drawing. In January the building operations were interfered with by the plague. There was also heavy rain. The site of the building was flooded three times. The verandah was to be of iron work. An allowance was made in the contract because Mr. Atkins was to supply the ironwork from England. The verandah was fitted by Mr. Kemp. The job was nearly finished when the ironwork arrived. The work was finished in November, 1901. The verandah was delayed in arriving, and it had been ordered by the defendant in England. From time to time he got money from the architect, and there was no mention of extension of time or penalties. The alterations were on account of the plaster coming off the lath and plaster partitions. Witness pointed out to Mr. Smith that the work was not being properly done, but that gentleman said that the work must be done according to his instructions. He spent about £400 in putting the work right, which was completed in May, 1902. On the 8th July he received a final certificate for £25. He was told to leave out some portions of the work, and to put in other things in their place. The sum of £188 11s. 3d. represented extras. The dispute was for the difference between £188—which he agreed to accept—and the £23. On August 23 a final certificate was received for the £188 11s. 3d., which he put into the hands of his agents, Chiappini Bros., to claim payment, which he did not receive. Messrs. Moore, in reply to Messrs. Chiappini, set up a counter claim for certain penalties. As regards the claim of £60 made by Mr. Atkins because he could not let the house, it appeared that the buildings were originally intended to be used as shops and offices. He thought that some alterations had now been made in the buildings, and that the yard had been enlarged. The extra work was done after Mr. Rosenberg had gone away. This part of the work occupied about a month. During that period he had men working night and day.

By Maasdorp, J.: Even without the delay caused by the balconies, he could not have finished by May, but he did his best to do so.

Continuing, witness stated that he was interrupted by about sixty or seventy days' heavy rains.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardner: He encountered rock bed in the course of excavations for the foundations. He knew he could charge extra for "rock," which was not allowed for in the specifications, but he did not wish to be so particular. He received a letter from Mr. Rosenberg informing him that unless he employed more bricklayers on the work, a penalty of £10 per week would be imposed. He did not at that time tell Mr. Rosenberg that he had encountered rock, because Mr. Rosenberg knew of it previously. He estimated that the work was delayed about three weeks by the rock. He was entitled to about £30 or £40 for this extra work, but he did not claim it. As regards the columns he had not received a detailed drawing of these until after he was ready to put them up. Then the columns had to be cast, which delayed him two weeks. The details he had received were incorrect, as the columns were too short, and had to be recast. He believed that the whole of the delay on account of the columns was caused by Mr. Rosenberg. It was about seven or eight weeks after he gave the details to the founder that he received the finished columns. The delay in the arrival of the verandah had prolonged the work, as he had to leave parts of the building unfinished, so as to fix up the verandah later on.

Maasdorp, J., pointed out that as the verandah had not been received by the witness until August, he could not be held responsible for not having finished that portion of the building before that time.

Continuing, under cross-examination, witness said that the men whom he had employed on the work caught the plague, and were absent from the building for about one month. He held that the plaster work was properly carried out. He reversed the lathings in accordance with the instructions of Mr. Smith, Mr. Rosenberg's man. He had offered Mr. Rosenberg £120 to get this portion of the work done by another builder, because he wished to get finished with the job, and to get his money.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: The mistake in the length of the columns was due to the drawings. In his account he allowed a certain sum for rock, which he was permitted by Mr. Rosenberg to use, in lieu of concrete, of which he used less than specified. Had he got the details of the columns he would have put them in the hands of the founder at once.

Carl Kemp, of the firm of Carl Kemp and Co., engineers, Cape Town, stated that he fitted up the railings and cut the columns for the work in Long-street. He commenced the work on the 28th September, 1901. Witness had to cut the corner of the iron columns, and the plaintiff put them in position. Witness believed that all the work could be done in a month.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: The material might have been at his place fourteen days previous to the 28th September, but he certainly did not notice it.

Villom Caronimson said he was the foreman carpenter at the work, but the basement was finished when he took up the job, and at that period he was ready for the columns, but they had not arrived. The columns were too short at first. The verandah was also delayed on account of the delay in bringing up the columns. That was the last work to complete the building. Witness first erected the metal partitions, but Mr. Smith insisted on him putting the smooth side out. The plaster fell off, and witness was called on next year to reverse the metal lathing. The work was much delayed on account of the heavy rains.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: Smith stopped him when he was arranging the iron lathing rough side out. The granite bases were not ready when the columns arrived.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: He was only working on and off at the job.

Hadji Solly, foreman mason, in the employ of the plaintiffs, said that when he was on the job in Long-street they were delayed a fortnight through hard rock. The columns had to be altered by the founder. Delay was caused through the men catching the plague, and he had reason to believe the founder's men also caught the plague. It took a long time to fit up the ironwork, which we delivered in pieces. When Mr. Kemp started work on the 28th September, 1901, the only thing that remained to be done was the painting of the verandah. Originally, the metal lathing was put with the rough side out, but on Mr. Smith's instructions it was reversed. The plaster fell off because the flat side was put outside. The material was of the best, and was tested by Mr. Smith. There was no neglect on the plaintiff's part to push forward the job.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: About fifteen men were engaged for five weeks excavating the rock. It was not true that the building was built too high.

Henry Rowe, architect, said that in 1900 he was in Mr. Rosenberg's employ. A certain amount of rock was found in the excavations. From inquiries made at the Town House they had reason to believe that rock would not be encountered at the foundation. The draughtsman had not taken into consideration the thickness of the floors, and, consequently, the columns were supplied short in length. They were waiting quite two months for the columns, and the work was at a standstill for some time. And this detail had to be supplied, and a special piece had to be made. About the middle of August he understood that the ironwork had arrived, but the delivery was not commenced until the beginning of September. At the commencement of the job there was a heavy flood, and up to June there was a fair amount of rain. The chief delay arose from the want of the columns.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He did not revisit the building in his official capacity. It was not because they merely came upon rock in the excavation that the concrete was omitted from the contract. He thought it was an architect's duty to supply details to the builder without waiting to be asked for them. The building was built to the proper height.

This closed the evidence for the plaintiff.

For the defence, Mr. Gardiner called

Max Rosenberg, who stated that he was engaged by defendant as an architect to prepare plans, specifications, and quantities for the property in Long-street. He visited the building about thrice a week until he left for England in June, 1901. He returned in October, 1901, and found the work going on very slowly. With one exception, the men were totally incompetent. The building was practically finished about the 4th December. He would not dispute the statement that there was rock in the excavations, but it was in very small quantity. There was not sufficient to cause delay for a fortnight. It was a practice if rock was found to make an allowance for it. It was a builder's duty to ask for the details. An architect might supply them if he were not busy. To the best of his belief, the columns were a correct fit. The plaintiff never said that it was witness's fault, but always blamed it on the founders. The basement stood out higher than was provided for in the drawings, and that threw out the verandah columns. The plaster was not up to specifications and quantity. The plaintiff had plasterers engaged doing carpenters' work. In the majority of cases the metal lathing was placed smooth side out. The plaintiff took the blame on himself, and witness did not remember him making any complaint about Mr. Smith. He gave the plaintiff six weeks' extension simply as a matter of leniency. The building might have been completed without the verandah, and witness would have been quite satisfied to out it out of the contract.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: The verandah was practically completed when witness returned to South Africa about the end of October. The tenants came in on the 15th November. The building would have been considered complete without the verandah. Although he could not give an instance, he believed the Town Council had given a certificate of completion to a house where the verandah had not been erected, but the doors and windows were boarded up. He was the defendant's son-in-law. The Town Council were not informed that the plans were for residences. He could not say when the plans were handed over. If the plaintiffs built according to the level required by the City Engineer, it might explain the elevation of the granite bases and the misfitting columns. The principal cause of the alterations was the poor cement used by the plaintiffs. Witness believed they mixed a special sample for his representative, Mr. Smith.

Henry Atkins, manufacturer's agent, said that he employed Mr. Rosenberg as architect to prepare the plans for his buildings in Long-street. He was unable to use the premises from the 11th March to the 9th May while the alterations were going on. He could have had £30 a month for the premises. He lost more than £10 a week through the delay.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He returned to South Africa on the 6th February, 1902, and shortly after that the Town Council threatened him with proceedings. The original plans were for offices, but tenants were immediately put in. On a letter from the Town Council, he gave his tenants notice to quit.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He purchased the adjoining property on the 3rd February. The building was demolished at the end of April. The plaintiff had previously built a terrace of houses for defendant.

Re-examined by Mr. Gardiner: The Town Council withdrew their interdict proceedings on the 18th February. Had the plaster been all right he could have retained his tenants.

Louis Solomon, manager for the defendant, produced the bill of lading for certain columns and a verandah. They were entered for clearance on the 27th June. Forty-three out of fifty-two of the ironwork pieces were delivered by the 26th July, and the remaining nine by the 12th August.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: McKenzie's did not give any advice of the delivery. Witness could not produce any documentary proof of the delivery.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (for plaintiff): The real question in this case is as to the set-off; the question as to penalties was a mere afterthought. I am not prepared to contend that the granting of the final building certificate is a bar to claiming penalties, but it does raise a very strong presumption against such claim. Rosenberg's certificate shows that this building should have been finished by May 1. His memory seems to be very bad, but at last he did admit that he knew that the building material could not arrive till the end of July. Clause 18 of the contract shows that an extension of time was to be granted should any delay arise from causes not under the contractor's control, and there have been cases in which the Court has held that should delay in the completion of work arise from the default of the employer, he (the employer) could not recover damages. Lex non cogit ad impossibilia. It was impossible to complete the verandah till long after June 18. Rowe, Hendricks, and Charlie all say that the material was not delivered till September, and then it took time to fit up the verandah. Rowe says it took six weeks, and Rosenberg says four or five weeks.

[Kotzé, J.: What do you say about the warning to complete the building by May 12?]

The material had not left England by that time. Our witnesses are clear and positive as to their evidence, whereas Rosenberg is very uncertain. The architect did not give detailed drawings until two months after the work was started, and the columns were not received until two months thereafter. I must admit there was some delay on our part, but not for more than a month, and from that an allowance of 14 days for wet weather, etc., falls to be deducted.

There was rock on the ground, and the specifications said nothing about that. We did not make the ground. Then as to the claim for £60 on the ground that the plaintiff had been kept out of beneficial occupation during April and part of May, that was owing chiefly to his own fault. The contract between these parties never contemplated indirect damage. I do not know any case in which damages have been given for being kept out of occupation while work was being done. The owner of the premises waived any claim he might possibly have had for damages by his own delay. See Huntman and Scharder v. Dear (3 E.D.C.,.36), particularly the second part of the headnote. That case is very similar to the present, but here the case for the builder is stronger. Wells v. Army and Navy Co-operative Society (86 L.T.R., 764) shows how reluctant English Courts are to enforce penalties as liquidated damages. See also Dodd v. Churton (76 L.T.R., 438), cited in judgment in the the preceding case.

Mr. Gardiner (for defendant): By the 18th section of the contract the onus is on the builder to show the cause of delay. Admittedly there was a delay. The building was not completed till December 4th. The Town Council certificate does not show that the building had been completed, but only that it was fit for human habitation. It is true that some tenants entered the upper portion of the building on November 15, but there is no proof that the lower portion was occupied till December.

[Maasdorp, J.: Then you had the use of a portion of your property?]

Yes; but we claim liquidated damages for the whole building.]

[Kotzé, J.: When was the building to have been finished?]

In May.

[Kotzé, J.: Then if you have waived your right, how can you sue?]

We have not waived our right. The plaintiff gives three reasons for his delay, viz.: (1) That in the specifications no mention was made of the rock; (2) that the delay in executing the contract arose from the fact that material was not timeously delivered; (3) that specific details of plans of certain pillars were not supplied in due time. As to the second point, if the work can be carried on independently of the arrival of material, the builder must proceed with his work. The case of Huntman and Scharder v. Dear (3, E.D.C., 36) is not in point, as no builder's certificate was there required. As a matter of fact the builder did not stop work on account of the non-arrival of the material for the verandah. In questions of negligence, we must always look to the proximate cause of the delay. Here Rowe's evidence shows that in January the builders had made no request for material, and that fact is sufficient evidence that they were not prepared to go on with the work. If they were waiting for material, they should have called our attention to the fact. They were warned in April that the penalty clause would be enforced. It was not for us to put down the material on the ground until asked. It might very likely have been damaged. If the builders were waiting for material, Atkins might have got it out by mail boat. The non-arrival of the balcony has nothing to do with this case. I submit that the penalty should run from June 15. As to the third point raised on behalf of the plaintiff, nothing is said in the contract about our supplying details as to the columns. The builder should have asked Rosenberg for them. There is some conflict of evidence as to whether he did ask or not, but Rosenberg is quite clear that if he had been asked, they could have been supplied within four days. The letter of April 12th shows that the columns were not yet ready; why, then, did Hendricks not reply to that letter, if the architects were to blame?

[Kotze, J.: Some allowance must be made for delay in respect of the

Yes, but I submit that the Court can apportion the time due to this delay; surely the whole penalty clause cannot be dropped on account of it. The only questions now are (1) how much delay was there, and (2) who was to blame?

Mr. Searle in reply.

Judgment was reserved, pending the hearing of Atkins v. Delponte on Monday in which the plaintiff is suing for rent of the rooms from 15th January to the 28th February.

Postea (June 22nd).

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiffs in this case claim the sum of £188 11s. 3d. for work done and materials supplied in connection with a building constructed by them for the defendant, under a contract entered into by the parties on the 9th day of October, 1900. The defendant admits that this sum is payable to the plaintiffs as the balance of the price under the contract, but pleads that the plaintiffs are indebted to him in the sum of £250, as liquidated damages, arising from the failure of the plaintiffs to complete the building in the stipulated time, and £60 damages sustained by him by reason of the defective condition in which the building was delivered. The plaintiffs undertook by their agreement to begin the construction of the building immediately after the 1st of December, 1900, to proceed regularly with the work, and complete it by the 1st day of May, 1901. It is admitted that the work was not completed till the 4th of December, 1901. The defendant says that for this delay he is entitled to damages, by virtue of the 18th clause of the contract, which is to the following effect: "If the contractor fails to complete the works by the date named in clause 17, or within any extended time allowed by the architect under these presents, and the architect shall certify in writing that the works could reasonably have been completed by the said date, or within the said extended time, the contractor shall pay and allow to the employer the sum of £10 sterling per week as liquidated and agreed damages for every week beyond the said date or extended time, as the case may be, during which the work shall remain unfinished, except as provided by clause 17, and such damages may be deducted by the employer from any moneys due to the contractor, subject, however, to delays arising from fire, general strikes or combinations of workmen, or other causes over which the contractor could not in any possibility have control." The main issues in this case depend upon the construction of this clause, and its application to the facts proved in evidence. On the 23rd August, 1902, the architect gave the contractors his final certificate, certifying that £188 11s. 3d. was due to them on account of the work executed in and materials supplied for the building. And on the 28th of August he gave the employer the following certificate: "In terms of clause 18 of your contract, I herewith certify that, in my opinon, the works could have reasonably been completed by the 1st day of May, 1901, and I consider that if six weeks are added for rainy days and extra work (which cannot be legally expected or demanded by the contractors), your position in enforcing penalty for the remaining excess of the contract time will, in my opinion, be a fair and reasonable one." Upon this certificate, the defendant claims to be entitled to £10 a week from the 12th of June, 1901, to the 4th of December. There is no imputation upon the pleadings of fraud or improper conduct on the part of the architect, and his good faith in granting the certificate is not challenged. But the plaintiffs state in their replication that this certificate was not granted until the final certificate had been granted to them. And they add that the delay was not caused through any act or omission of theirs, but through the failure of the architect to supply them with certain details which were indispensable for the work, and delay on the defendant's part in furnishing the materials for the balcony, which he had undertaken to supply, and without which the building could not be completed. The plaintiffs contend that if they prove in terms of clause 18 of the contract that the delay in completing the building arose from causes over which they could not in any possibility have control, they would be exonerated from liability for the damage stipulated in that clause. The question arose whether upon the true construction of this clause the exceptions mentioned in the latter part of it are not matters which the architect had to consider in allowing extended time, and in granting his certificate, and must therefore be considered as disposed of by his certificate, so as to preclude the builders from availing themselves of the exceptions. But it seems to me the natural meaning of the words is too clear to admit of that construction. It is provided that if the architect shall certify that the work could have been completed within a certain time, the builders shall pay for their delay, subject to the exceptions mentioned. The architect is not an arbitrator to dispose of the matters connected with the exceptions, and his certificate has nothing to do with them. The plaintiffs also raise the wider question, and contend that in no case can the defendant take advantage of his own wrong, and claim damages for delays caused through his own fault in spite of the stipulations in clause 18. I am of opinion that, notwithstanding the architect's certificate, the question is now open for the Court to decide, whether the delays were caused by causes over which the builders had no control, or by the fault of the defendant himself. It appears that for the central support of the building certain cast iron columns were to be erected, for which the architect was to furnish details. I am satisfied upon the evidence that without these details, which the architect alone could supply, the columns could not be made. Mr. Rosenberg, the architect, admits that he has hardly any recollection of the circumstances attending the giving of the details. We must, therefore, rely upon the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs. From that it appears that the columns were required soon after the basement was completed, which took place two months after the work was commenced, and that if the details had been given when asked for the columns would then have been ready. Instead of that the details were only furnished after the basement was finished, two months were required for making them, and a fortnight more was lost through a mistake made by the architect in his details. The work was in this way delayed for two months and a half. I am not prepared to say that the architect must in this matter be regarded as the agent of the employer, in such a way as to make the employer responsible for the delay caused by his neglect. But I think this cause of delay was certainly one beyond the control of the contractors. Mr. Rowe,the architect, who was called by the plaintiffs, and who was in the service of Rosenberg, while the building was in progress, said that the contractors several times asked for the details, and that unless these were furnished by the architect the building could not proceed. This delay of two months and a half would have prevented the plaintiffs from completing the building by the 1st of May, but there is a far more serious difficulty in their way. An important feature of the work was a balcony to be constructed round two sides of the building. The materials for it were to be supplied by the defendant, and without them, the work could not be completed. It is quite clear that the materials were not supplied till towards the end of August. Mr. Rowe was of opinion that it would reasonably take about six weeks to put up the balcony. That would have given the builders till the middle of October to finish. I come to the conclusion that the delay in the completion of the work was, until the middle of October, undoubtedly due to the conduct of the defendant himself, and was in respect of a matter beyond the control of the plaintiffs. The building was taken by the parties as finished on the 4th of December, but it appears that on the 13th of November part of it was taken posession of and occupied by the defendant, and I say at once that, in my opinion, the defendant cannot claim the liquidated damages, which were stipulated, as compensation to him for being kept out of possession after he enters the building, even though he obtains only partial occupation. After that, only a month, from the middle of October to the middle of November, remains to be accounted for. It seems to me that even if there were authority for saying that in law the builder's liability for delay would revive when the delay caused by the employer ceases, however considerable it might have been, even then I should have hesitated to give relief for this trifling period. But the authorities cited seem to be all the other way, and to lay down that where the delay was partly due to the fault of the employer himself, he cannot recover under the penalty clause. I need refer only to the cases of Hansen and Schrader v. Deare (3 E.D.C., 36), Holme v. Guppy (3 M. and W., 387), Russell v. The Viscount Sa da Bandeira (32 L.J.C.P., 68). In the two former there was no stipulation in the contract referring the question of penalties to the architect; but in the last it was agreed that if the work was not completed in time by reason of any cause not under the control of the builder, proved to the satisfaction of a person named in the contract, the penalty should not be enforced for the time mentioned in his certificate. The work in that case was delayed through the fault of the employer, and although the person mentioned gave no certificate, the employer was held not to be entitled to the penalties. It seems tolerably certain that the contractors would in no case have finished the work within the stipulated time, but it is quite impossible to decide how much of the delay they are responsible for. In the view I take of this case, it is unnecessary to decide what would have been the effect of the penalty clause if the delay had been occasioned by extra work, rainy weather, or the plague. As to the defendant's claim for £60 damages, I think we must take it upon the evidence that the builders were to blame for the defective work, and were bound to rectify it, but I am not satisfied, in view of the difference that existed between the Town Council and the defendant, that the rooms, if properly finished, would have been available for tenants during the months of March, April, and May of 1902. And consequently no damages have been proved by the defendant. Judgment must be given for the plaintiffs for £188 11s. 3d., with costs on the claim in convention, and for the defendants in reconvention, with costs, on the claim in reconvention.

Kotzé, J., after reviewing the leading facts, proceeded to say: I will, in the light of the facts which I have already stated, first of all deal with the claim of £250, as and for liquidated damages, under clause 18 of the contract. The first delay of two and a half months was clearly caused by the architect, who did not supply the details as to length and weight of the cast-iron columns, and when, after several requests made by the plaintiffs, details were eventually supplied, they were found to be incorrect as to the length, so that the columns had to be lengthened, or, rather, added to, in order to obtain the necessary length. I put aside the fact of the extra eight weeks' delay caused by the ironfounder, for that cannot be attributed to the architect, nor can the contractor or builder derive any benefit therefrom. It being the duty of the architect to supply details, when asked by the contractor, it follows that if he does not supply details, or gives wrong details, which cause delay, this is a delay over which the contractor has no control. It is the fault or neglect of the architect, and, if there is nothing in the contract between the building owner and the contractor leading to a contrary conclusion, the default of the architect should be held to be that of the building owner, who cannot, under such circumstances, be allowed to take advantage of the clause in the contract entitling him to either liquidated damages or a penalty for delay in completion of the building. I do not attach any importance to the letter of the 12th April, 1901, written by the architect to the plaintiffs, reminding them that the work had to be finished by the 1st May, 1901, and calling attention to clause 18 of the contract, which provides for the payment of liquidated damages if the building was not completed by that day. The architect, when he wrote this letter, was well aware that there had been a delay of two and a half months caused by his own conduct, and that through his default the plaintiffs could not reasonably be expected to complete the building by the 1st May. He was, moreover, also aware that, according to the specifications, the verandahs were an important, if not an essential, portion of the building. These verandahs are very carefully described in the specifications, and he knew that the ironwork in connection with the verandahs would not be delivered before the 1st May, nor within anything like a reasonable time thereafter. He says that the verandah work could have been omitted by him, as he had the right under clause 9 of the contract to direct any alteration, omission, or addition, with regard to the work, and that without the verandahs the building would still have been a complete building. Assuming for a moment that he is right in this view, then he did not, as a matter of fact, direct that the verandahs should be omitted. On the contrary, the plaintiffs, who had contracted to build and complete a certain building according to certain plans and specifications, which contain and include the verandah work, were kept waiting, with the knowledge of the architect, for the iron in connection therewith. Doubtless the knowledge that the ironwork would not arrive within a reasonable time may have caused the plaintiffs, who had already been thrown over the time limit of the 1st May, 1901, by the default of the architect, not to proceed with so much despatch as they might otherwise have done, but there is nothing to show that, when the ironwork for the verandahs did arrive, and was actually delivered about the end of September, they were not ready at once to commence and complete the verandahs. The certificate of 28th August, 1902, given by the architect to the defendant, in which he certified that the work could reasonably have been completed by the 1st May, 1901, seems, therefore, to me to be quite worthless. It entirely ignores the two and a half months' delay caused by his own neglect in not supplying details for the iron columns when requested by the contractors, and the still longer delay caused by the non-delivery of the ironwork for the verandahs. This last delay is due to the defendant himself, who, it is common cause between the parties, had to supply and deliver the ironwork to the plaintiffs. The defendant clearly, therefore, cannot seek to derive the benefit of a stipulation under the contract, in the event of non-performance by the plaintiffs, where, by his own act, he is the cause of such non-performance. "It has been often laid down (says Lopes, L. J.) that where there is a provision that a contractor shall pay penalties for delay, no penalty can be recovered where the delay has been occasioned by the act of the person endeavouring to enforce the penalties." (Dodd v. Churton, 1, Q.B., 1897, p. 568.) Although the giving by the architect of the final certificate on the 23rd August, 1902, by which the sum of £188 11s. 3d. is stated to be due to the plaintiffs, does not take any account of the claim for liquidated damages for delay, now set up by the defendant, I do not think that, regard being had to the terms of the contract, and the position of the architect thereunder, the defendant is precluded upon that ground from making such a claim. He is, however, in my opinion, debarred from doing so by reason of the double default of the architect and of himself.

As to the second claim in reconvention for £60, as damages by reason of the improper and unskilful manner in which the lath and plaster work had been executed by the plaintiffs, I have already, in stating the facts, intimated that this portion of the work had not been done in a skilful and workmanlike manner. The defendant claims this amount of £60, by reason, as he alleges, of his having lost two months' rent through certain tenants having to leave the premises while the repairing of the plaster work was being done. This repairing covered the period from March 11 to May 9, 1902. It was said on behalf of the plaintiffs that all that they were bound to do by the contract was to repair the work at their own cost, and that they could not be held liable beyond that for any damages. I cannot adopt this view. It seems to me that, if through negligent or unskilful workmanship, the plaster had given way and damaged a valuable picture or other work of art, the plaintiffs would have been liable for the damage so caused. In the same way, if the repairs to the bad plastering necessitated the removal of the tenants, the defendant would be entitled to compensation for the loss of the rent which he has suffered thereby. But I am not prepared to say that the repairing ner in which the plaster-work had been executed caused the removal of the tenants. It is by no means clear that the reason for this removal was not due to the objection taken by the Town Council, and the consequent notice to qut given them by the defendant. The onus of this issue lies on him, and I am not satisfied that he has made good his claim. I am, therefore, of opinion that there should be judgment for the plaintiffs for the sum of £188 11s. 3d., and that both the claims in reconvention should be dismissed. The plaintiffs are entitled to the costs of this action.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C. K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

ESTATE THOMAS V. KERR AND ANOTHER. — 1903. June 18th. " 20th. " 26th. July 13th.

Lease — Cancellation — Nonpayment of rent for two years— Equitable relief against forfeiture.

The lessee of certain mining rights for a period of twenty years having failed to pay rent for three consecutive years, the lessor gave him notice that if the rent was not paid within twenty-one days an action would be brought against him for cancellation of the lease. The lesseee had, long before such notice, sublet his rights, as he could do under the agreement of lease, but had not given notice of the sublease to the lessor. After the notice he neglected to pay the rent, believing, as he did, that the sublessees were liable and would pay, whereupon the action was instituted against him, of which he forthwith informed the sublessees, who immediately tendered payment to the lessor of the arrears of rent and costs. The tender not being accepted, the sublessees were allowed to intervene as co-defendants, and repeated their tender in the plea.

Held, that the Court was not bound by any positive rule of law to decree a cancellation of the lease on failure by the lessee to comply with the notice, and that, as there was nothing in the conduct of the lessee to indicate an intention to abandon or repudiate the lease or to defy the rights of the lessor, it was competent for the Court, under all the circumstances disclosed in the case, to relieve the lessee against the consequences of his neglect.

This was an action instituted by the executors testamentary in the estate of the late James Thomas against John Kerr and the Fairview Coal Mining Company in respect of certain rent and leases.

The case was originally against the defendant Kerr, who sued by leave of the Court upon edictal citation. The plaintiffs were executors testamentary of the estate of the late Mr. Thomas, who died in 1900, and the defendant originally was John Kerr, who was formerly of Molteno, and at the time of the action of Bulawayo. The other defendant, the Fairview Coal Mining Company, claimed to be entitled as sub-lessee or assignee of the rights from other persons, who themselves were sub-lessees for Kerr of his rights under the lease in question. In May, 1899, Thomas, as lessor, and the defendant Kerr, as lessee, entered into an agreement, the former letting and the latter hiring certain coal prospecting rights on the farm Spion Kop, in the division of Albert, for a period of 18 months, with the right of taking up a lease for twenty years, the rent to be £5 a month, payable monthly. Subsequently Kerr entered into an agreement for the hire of the said ground for a period of twenty years at the said rental.

The plaintiffs' declaration said that the defendant had repeatedly broken the agreement, and had been in default by non-payment of rent due from December, 1899, to December, 1902, and that the sum of £180 sterling was due.

The defendants' plea said that the Fairview Coal Mining Company had been joined as defendant with Kerr, and admitted that there was due and in arrear a sum of £180, reckoned from the 1st December, 1899, to the 1st December, 1902. They said that by the terms of the lease granted to the firstnamed defendant it was provided that the lessee should have the right to sub-let his rights therein. Thereafter, on or about the 3rd April, 1901, the firstnamed defendant subleased one-half of his share and interest in the said lease to certain persons named Aitkins, Brown, Bell, and Atkinson, and he sub-leased his remaining rights to others. On or about the 9th April, 1901, the sub-lessees sub-leased or assigned their rights and interests in the lease to the Fairview Company. On the 8th November, 1902, plaintiff gave notice to the firstnamed defendant of the rent due and owing, and threatened to sue for cancellation of the lease on failure of defendant to pay the rent within 21 days. In January, 1903, as soon as the matter came to the knowledge of the second-named defendants, they tendered to the plaintiff to pay the rent then due, together with any costs that might have been incurred, and they now repeated this tender. Subject to the tender aforesaid, they prayed that the said claim should be dismissed, with costs.

The plaintiffs, in their replication, put the statements in the defendants' plea to proof, and they asked for judgment for £180, as against the firstnamed defendant Kerr, and for an order declaring that the said agreement and lease were cancelled, and directing ejectment from the said farm as against both defendants.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Russell) for the plaintiff; Mr. Benjamin

(with him Mr. Gardiner) for the defendant.

Mr. Schreiner said that he put it to the Court that really the plea did not disclose a defence to the case, and that the onus would rest upon his learned friend to show how it did. Kerr had taken no steps to pay the rent until after the action was instituted, and then the Fairview Company came in and tendered the rent. Plaintiffs would have been ready to accept the rent if it had been tendered within the stipulated period. He submitted that the onus rested with the intervening defendants to prove that they had any case at all.

Mr. Schreiner called

John Batterson, one of the executors of the estate of the late James Thomas, who stated that the latter at his death was aged 77 years. Before the death of Thomas witness held his power of attorney to manage his affairs. He had never received any notice of the assignment or sub-letting of the lease to the company. He had never seen any documents showing what rights Kerr had parted with to Fraser and Co., or to the Fairview Mining Co. Rent was last paid in November, 1899, and since then no payments had been made. Kerr never paid the rent; it was always received from Brown or Aitken. He took it that these payments were made on behalf of Kerr. On August 30, 1902, a letter was written by his agents, asking Brown, as the person who made the last payment, to whom application should be made for the rent of the farm? In reply Brown said that the mining rights should belong to the Fairview Mining Co., although it was difficult to definitely say who should pay. Witness took steps to sue for the rent from the Fairview Company, and subsequently received a letter offering to pay up to date, and to make all future payments. He did not entertain the company's proposal, and determined to pursue the action.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: So far as he was aware, no steps were taken to communicate with the Fairview Company's secretary in London. He thought that it would have been quite possible to carry on mining on the Spion Kop Farm even during the war.

Mr. Schreiner pointed out that that question did enter into the plea.

Continuing, witness said that indirectly he had heard that others were interested with Kerr in the farm, but he had received no notice to that effect. He would know of it if Mr. Thomas had received such a notice.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner, witness said that the late Mr. Thomas was illiterate, and he (witness) conducted all his correspondence for him.

Mr. Benjamin called

Joshua Samuel Hitchcock Atkinson, who stated that he and T. W. Aitkens, W. Brown, and J. W. Bell were interested in the farm. Certain "heads of agreement" were entered into between them. These provided that all Kerr's coal property should come into the syndicate, and that the syndicate should enjoy the benefit. Kerr was to have a four-eighths share in the syndicate. The capital of the company was to be £8,000. Kerr was to have one half, and each of the other members ⅛th. There was a provision likewise that each of the other members besides Kerr should contribute £1,000, making £3,000, out of which £1,500 was to be applied to working capital, the remaining £2,500 to go to Kerr. Kerr assigned one half his share to William Fraser and Co. At present witness held the power of attorney of William Fraser and Co., Ltd., and as such held an agreement which provided that Kerr should give up his share for £4,500. In 1901 William Fraser and Co. and the others ceded their rights to the Fairview Coal Mining Co., Ltd., which practically belonged to the same parties. So far as he knew, the company never received any intimation from the executors of the late Mr. Thomas that unless rent were paid the company would be ejected, until the letter was sent to Kerr at Bulawayo. He first received intimation of this letter by telegram. He replied to the letter on January 5, and offered, on behalf of the company, to pay the rent with costs of action, and to make all future payments. He wrote to Mr. Thomas at the end of 1895 or early in 1896, and asked that the rent should be reduced until such time as the company were in a position to produce coal. He never sent Mr. Thomas the "heads of agreement," as he was not at the time in South Africa. The Fairview Mines, upon which he had arranged extended lease, did not include Spion Kop. He had offered to sell Spion Kop for £5,000; he scarcely thought it would be worth £7,000. At the present moment the mine and the shaft were full of water. Since 1891 no work had been done on this farm. In 1895 he put a man to bore on Spion Kop.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner, witness said he looked at the question in this way, that so far as the Fairview Syndicate were concerned, they were joint owners with Kerr. With regard to the agreement, it vested Kerr with the right to sub-let.

This concluded the evidence, and counsel were then heard in argument.

In reply to the Court, Mr. Benjamin said that the position he took up was that until judgment for the amount of the rent had been given, the lessee could tender payment. It would have been sufficient if tender had been made by Kerr at the time the other defendant made the tender.

Mr. Schreiner argued that the case could not be treated as though Kerr had made the tender. The second defendant made the tender before the case was joined as defendant. Counsel further contended that the forfeiture could not be saved by tender up to the time of judgment.

De Villiers, C. J., intimated that he would like to read the papers again, and consider the authorities before giving judgment.

Postea (June 20th).

De Villiers, C. J., stated that in regard to this case some questions of very great importance were raised, and as the case was before himself sitting alone, he thought it would be well to hear re-arguments, more especially in regard to certain points. The Court would, therefore, order that the case be re-argued, and as Friday next would be a clear day, it would be set down for that day. His Lordship added that the Registrar called his attention to the fact that the lease that was put in was £40 under-stamped.

Mr. Benjamin said he intended to call his lordship's attention to that when he put in the lease, but he regretted that he overlooked the point. Counsel added that he believed the assignments were not stamped.

The Chief Justice said that these matters would be considered at the rehearing on Friday next.

Postea (June 26th).

Mr. Schreiner said that the action was for the recovery of £180 rent, for the cancellation of a lease, and for an order of ejectment, with costs. The action was really instituted against the defendant Kerr, who was the lessee under the lease. The Fairview Mining Company subsequently intervened by consent. The lessor, Thomas, who died in 1900, entered into an agreement in May, 1899, with Kerr, and by that lease Kerr obtained the sole right of prospecting free of charge on the farm Spion Kop for eighteen months for coal. It was provided that after the eighteen months the lessee might, if he chose, obtain a lease for a period of twenty years, reckoned from the 1st June, 1900. It was agreed that the lessee would have the sole right of entering into a lease for prospecting for coal for a term of twenty years from June 1, 1900, and he should, in consideration, pay to the said lessor £5 per month, payable monthly. In point of fact, a document seemed to have been executed between the parties, the lessee simply continued on under this document, and it was to be construed as an executed lease, which would have been executed for a period of twenty years. The lease proceeded to set forth that the lessee would have the right of a piece of ground of the extent of 300 yards by 300 yards, and the lessor agreed to enlarge the piece of ground if at any time it was found to be too small. Clause 4 of the lease gave the lessee the right to erect buildings, and the right to construct a tramway or railway in connection with the mine, and take it to the road. The lease further provided that the lessee should pay all rents and taxes on any buildings erected on the mine. Clause 9 set forth that the lessee shall have the right to purchase the farm during the term of twenty years, or during the subsistence of these presents for the sum of £4.000 sterling.

[De Villiers, C. J., said he was surprised that the option was not raised in the pleadings.]

Mr. Benjamin asked leave to amend his pleadings to read, "on the 27th February they tendered to purchase the property for the sum of £4,000," and to add a claim in reconvention for an order of transfer.

The amendment was allowed, and, proceeding, Mr. Schreiner said that the plaintiffs did not admit the offer of £4,000. Clause 11 gave the right of subletting, and clause 12 stipulated that the mine should remain as security for rent to the said lessor. It was stated that if the lessee should wish to purchase the said farm he should have the option. The prospecting for eighteen months was common cause on the pleadings, as also was the non-payment of the rent for three years. It would appear that one Mr. Brown, referred to in the pleadings, was one of the sub-lessees of a portion of the interest of Kerr, and appeared to represent the sub-lessees generally in the payments of rent. Down to December, 1899, he made payments of rent to Thomas, or his representative. The last payment was made by Atkinson, who was another sub-lessee, who took rights from Kerr under some syndicate arrangement. On the 9th April these two groups of sub-lessees sub-leased the farm with their interest and rights in the lease to the Fairfield Mining Company, who came before the Court as the sub-lessees. The evidence showed that Brown paid the rent. The plea went on to say that in November, 1902, the plaintiff gave notice to the first defendant, Kerr, and threatened to sue for a cancellation of the lease. On the 5th January, 1903, notice was given to the second-named defendants and they tendered to pay the rent and pay the costs, which offer the plaintiff refused to entertain. In November, 1902, they wrote giving notice to Kerr that the lease would be cancelled. The Fairview Mining Company wrote suggesting the cancellation of the lease, and the drawing up of a new lease to them. Kerr paid no attention to a letter in November, 1902, giving him twenty-one days to pay the rent with interest, or that otherwise they would institute proceedings for the recovery of the same and for the cancellation of the lease. In January, Kerr seemed to awaken to the inconvenience of an action, and wrote to Atkinson that the company must take the matter in hand. The company wrote on 5th January that they were prepared to pay the rent with costs, and would regularly pay the rent in future as assignees under the lease, which offer was refused by the plaintiff. After that the Fairview Company wrote a letter, in which they proposed to exercise the option of purchase, and tendered £4,000 as purchase price, and the rent that was due to the executors of the estate of Thomas. That offer was not accepted. So far as Kerr was concerned, the case would have gone by default, and it was only by the Fairview Coal Mining Company interposing and claiming that they had a right to interpose that the case became important. The documents on which the Fairview Company relied must, therefore, be carefully considered. It would appear that Mr. Kerr never executed any sub-lease at all; broadly speaking, he thought that was so. So that the plea wholly broke down on the documents not being substantiated in any way. The first document was that of 1891 as to certain heads of agreement These heads of agreement were put in as the very foundation of the company's right, and were put in by Mr. Atkinson No doubt they were recognised by Kerr, although no subsequent agreement was executed by Bell, who drew up the heads of agreement. From beginning to end, in these heads of agreement there was no reference to the lease from Thomas at all. Kerr was to cede his "mineral rights in certain properties in the Stormberg and adjacent territory," as set forth in the prospectus recently issued by the Aberdeen Coal Estates Co., Ltd. There was no schedule attached to these heads of agreement, and there was no reference whatever to any interest in the lease of Thomas. This document proceeded to constitute a syndicate with a capital of £8,000. The parties agreed to form themselves into a syndicate, to be called the Aberdeen Coal Estates Company, and Kerr was to have four-eighths, that was £4,000, and Atkinson and the other three one-eighth each, that was another £4,000. Kerr was a £4,000 syndicate partner. All these syndicators were to work together for the common good of the Aberdeen Coal Estates Co., and Kerr was to be managing director or general manager of the company. The next document was dated the 4th August, 1893, two years later, in which they found that Kerr entered into a contract with William Fraser and Co., Ltd., Ipswich, England, to whom he was indebted in a certain sum. Kerr sold his share in the Aberdeen Estates Co. to William Fraser and Co. for £4,500 sterling, but counsel contended that that document was neither a sublease nor a complete assignment, but simply a pledge for £4,500 for the debt owing by Kerr, and that Kerr, on the payment of the debt and interest, had the right to have his interest in the syndicate interest ceded back to him. Then they had a document of the 9th April, 1901, but counsel contended that they could not go into that as it was long after the default had been made in regard to payment of rent. As to the tender, he was quite prepared to say that so far as the tender was concerned, in view of the fact that Kerr, on the 5th January, asked the Fairview Company to attend to it, and in view of the tender that was made, the company were in the same position as if Kerr, on the 5th January, had made the tender himself. But he submitted that the rights of a party who wished to come in under the word "lessee" as to their option to purchase should be very carefully and strictly construed.

[De Villiers, C. J.: Practically all the parties are involved in the suit, and I put it to counsel what was to prevent Kerr coming now before judgment was given, and proposing to exercise the option?]

The letter of the option was not written for Kerr, nor did it purport to have been written for Kerr. It was simply for the company, and they proposed to exercise the option.

[De Villiers, C. J.: What is to prevent Kerr from saying now, "I accept it, and make the tender"? Should not that tender by them be considered an offer on behalf of Kerr?]

There is nothing to show that the Fairview Company had any right to purchase for £4,000; and Atkinson's letter of December, 1895, shows that there was no assignment to the Fairview Company. There is no evidence to show that we ever contracted with anybody save Carr; and what is the nature of our contract with him? It is a lease, and failure to pay rent for two years would vitiate that lease, unless specially provided for in terms thereof. There are cases which show that security for rent may be demanded if the lessee does not bring sufficient moveables on the property to serve as security.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Our difficulty is: does not the lease stand good, and with it the option of purchase until the lease is cancelled by the Court?]

I submit not. See Johns v. Colonial Government (8 Sheil, 290). The principles which apply to a private lease are the same as those which apply to a public lease; and a mining lease is on the same footing as a lease of land. The whole current of authorities is in favour of assimilating a mining lease to a lease of land and to establish the right of the lessor to cancel the lease on default in payment of rent for two years. See Digest (19, 2, 54, and 56) and Gronewegen's note on paragraph 56. He does not say that if a man pays his rent post denunciationem he cannot be turned out. A mere lessee has never been put on the same footing with a possessor or an emphyteuta.

[Kotzé, J.: But see Codex (4, 66, 2).]

I had not noticed the passage, but my whole point is that a lessee cannot, like an emphyteuta, come in and tender his rent post litis contestationem.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The law is as strict on an emphytueta as on a lessee.]

I submit not; the emphyteuta has a jus in rem, and resembles a quitrent tenant rather than a lessee. No doubt, if a landlord asks for ejectment, the tenant may set up the defence of a lease, but he must show that he has fulfilled his contract.

[Kotzé, J.: Cannot he escape eviction by paying his rent?]

Not post denunciationem, if he is two years in arrear. Codex (4, 65, 27) only shows that a landlord may not take the law into his own hands and evict his tenant, lest the public peace should thereby be broken.

[Kotzé, J.: Grotius (2, 40, 19) and Gronewegen on Codex (4, 66, 2) both say that the emphyteuta may come in at the last moment and pay his rent.]

Yes, the emphyteuta, but not the lessee.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If the parties are before the Court, surely the Court may exercise the same discretion as to a tender of rent which it will exercise in respect of any other tender?]

Gronewegen carefully distinguishes between the position of the lessee and that of the emphyteuta, and Grotius (3, 19, 11) lays down the general rule that a lessor may eject his lessee if the rent is two years in arrear. If a landlord has made a pactum de non petendo, no doubt the Court would refuse to harshly enforce the landlord's right. To return to Voet. In (19-2-16) he gives the landlord the right of entry in the event of the lessee being two years in arrear with his rent. In (19-2-18) he says nothing about two years, and in that passage is clearly not adverting to the case of a lessee two years in arrear. See also Huber (3-9-1 and 2) referred to the case of Johns v. Colonial Government (8 Shiel, 290). He certainly says that it is necessary to go to the Court in order to eject a lessee; but the right of the landlord does not depend upon the sanction of the Court, the Court merely aids him to exercise his right.

We gave the company ample notice, and asked them in August, 1902, whether they would continue to pay the rent. They could not tell us, and would do nothing till they got notice of the cancellation of the lease.

[Kotzé, J.: See Grotius (2, 40, 19, note 28).]

Either the emphyteuta who is two years in arrear has not the right to come at any time and tender his rent, in which case cadit quaestio: or if he has this right, he must have it in consequence of the peculiarities of his tenure. Another point to which I wish to draw attention is that the Company has now lain by a long time without improving the property; and this being so, I submit that the Court will not exercise its discretion in the Company's favour. The case cited in Coren would seem to have been a case of ignorance of obligations. Grotius (2, 40, 19, note 28) refers to the emphyteuta, but a lessee is not in the same position as a quit-rent holder. The emphyteuta, or quit-rent holder, can make tender of his rent at any time.

If a lessee is in default in payment of rent for two years and a demand for the rent is made by the lessor and not satisfied forthwith, then by common law the lease is forfeited. Take the case of an ordinary contract providing that a lease shall be forfeited if the rent is not paid within 15 days after it falls due; what then would be the position of the lessor should the lessee thereafter tender his rent?

[De Villiers, C.J.: The lessee would be bound by his contract.]

See Schorer's note (No. 236 to Grotius, 2, 40, 19). Also Consult. Holl. (Vol. 2, No 5). In that case the tender was made a few days after the time had expired, and relief was granted; but that was a case of a quit-rent holder and not of a lessee. As to the denunciatio. I do not say that the cancellation of the lease took place on November 30, 1901 (at the end of the two years), but at the time a reasonable opportunity for payment had been given after the denunciatio. As to the exercise of the option of purchase, if the lease was at an end (as I have contended it was), the option had expired; if it was not at an end, the option is still in force.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Surely you cannot contend that there could be a cancellation of the lease without an order of Court?]

I do not say there could be a decreed cancellation, but there would be a right to demand cancellation, and the order of Court, when made, would relate back to the date when this right vested. Only the lessee could exercise this option, and hence he could not exercise it if he had ceased to be a lessee. As to the forfeiture relating back, see Kersterman (p. 122, No. 183). Non-payment of rent is equivalent to abandonment.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Not unless there is an intention to abandon.]

The wire to Atkinson from Kerr shows that Kerr intended to abandon, but he thought that by doing so he could escape from his obligations. The Company also clearly intended to abandon. As to the cancellation of the lease, see Brooks v. Bond and Another (1 Kotzé's S.A.R. Rep. 5); Green v. Griffiths (4 Juta, 346); Parkin v. Lippert (12 Juta, 179); Van Leeuwen (Vol. 2, p. 155.; Kotzé's Tr., 4, 21, 7). As to the option, no doubt every contract must be construed so as to give effect to what is reasonably understood between the parties, but it is not reasonable to suppose that after two years' default in the payment of rent, and after the property had been practically abandoned, that the Company should still be able to exercise their option. See Town Council of Port Elizabeth v. Ring (13 C.T.R. 451).

Mr. Benjamin (for defendants): I will assume, for the sake of argument, that a mining lease is ejusdem generis with one of house and land; but I shall contend that these mining leases are in point of fact sui generis. Taking then the first supposition, I would say that at any time up to judgment of forfeiture being delivered, arrear rent may be paid. Johns v. Colonial Government (8 Sheil, 290).

[Maasdorp, J.: That case only says that an opportunity for payment must be given: and you have had your opportunity.]

I will come to that point directly. I admit that the Fairfield Company are in the enjoyment of the property, but as soon as they heard that forfeiture was claimed they tendered the arrears of rent, and I submit that the Court, looking at all the circumstances of the case, will exercise its equitable jurisdiction in our favour. Kerr was never willing to forfeit the lease, but when he knew that the matter was mooted, he very naturally communicated with the beneficiares under the lease. The case of Johns v. Colonial Government shows that in a matter of this kind the Court has equitable jurisdiction In this respect Scots' law and our own law are very similar. Erskin's Principles of Law (p. 149, latest edition). I submit that a distinction should be drawn between forfeitures provided for by conventional agreements and those which follow in common law. In the latter the Court has equitable jurisdiction, but not in the former. Schorer on Grotius (Note 236), and this distinction explains the decision in Brookes v. Bond (1 Kotzé, 5). There there was an express convention. See Lyser Medit. (No. 220, Section 2). But I would further submit that these mining leases are sui generis. Neebe v. Registrar of Mining Rights (1 Transvaal S.C. Rep., 65).

[Kotzé, J.: That was a claim licence.]

Yes, that case is not quite on all fours with the present, but it was there pointed out that these mining leases are sui generis. Under a mining lease the lessee can take away portions of the soil: he has the jus abutendi, an ordinary leasee has not Hence the incidents of an ordinary lease do not apply to a mining lease, and among these incidents is forfeiture for non-payment of rent. When Voet speaks of forfeiture of a lease he alludes specifically to lands and houses. I submit that this Court will not harshly enforce forfeitures at common law in any case. The lease still subsists, because its forfeiture has not been adjudaed by the Court, and if the lease subsists, so does the option. There is no authority to show that forfeiture dates back to the time when the two years during which the rent was in arrears expired, or when some notice which had been given expired.

Mr. Schreiner was heard in reply.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (July 13th).

[De Villiers, C. J.: This action was originally instituted against the defendant Kerr alone, as the lessee of the coal mines on the farm Spionkop, with the right of occupying a portion of the surface for the due exercise of his mining rights. The action was for three years' rent, and for a cancellation of the lease, and ejectment from the premises, on the ground that the lease had been terminated by reason of non-payment of rent for upwards of two years. The lease was for a period of twenty years, with an option of purchase for £4,000 during the interval, and the rent payable was at the rate of £5 per month. Under the agreement of lease, the lessee had the right to sublet, and he accordingly sublet his rights, which were ultimately assigned to the Fairview Coal Mining Company. It does not appear that the lessor was aware of the sublease or subsequent assignment, although the rent was regularly paid to him on behalf of the assignees until the month of December, 1899. From that date, however, no rent was paid to him, or to the plaintiffs, as his executors, after his death. On the 8th of November, 1902, the plaintiffs, by letter addressed to Kerr, who was then living at Bulawayo, demanded from him payment of £175, being arrear rents payable from 1st of December, 1899, and at the same time gave him notice that, unless the amount was paid within twenty-one days, legal proceedings would be taken for the cancellation of the lease. As he did not pay the amount within the time allowed, a citation was issued against him on the 24th of December, 1902. He thereupon gave notice of the citation to the company, and on the 5th of January, 1902, the company offered to pay the arrears of rent and costs, and undertook to make regular payments of the rents accruing due in future. The plaintiffs refused the offer, and proceeded with their action. The company was thereafter allowed to intervene as co-defendant, and by the plea filed on behalf of both defendants, the company has again tendered payment of arrears of rent and costs. The question to be determined is whether the Court is bound by a positive rule of law to decree a cancellation of the lease on the ground that the rent in arrear was not paid or tendered before the expiration of the notice, or whether, in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction, it is competent for the Court, under the circumstances of this case, to relieve the defendants from the penalty which, under the Roman law, attached to the non-payment of rent for a continuous period of two years.

That the penalty of forfeiture attached, under the Roman law, to the non-payment of rent by the lessee of a farm does not admit of any doubt, and for the purposes of our decision the lease in the present case may be regarded as if it had been a lease of the farm "Spionkop." The passage in the Digest (19, 2, 54§1), which established the existence of the rule is clear and precise in its terms. It sets forth the response of Paulus in answer to the question whether the lessor of a farm who is bound under a penalty not to eject the lessee before the expiration of the term may without incurring the penalty, eject the lessee on non-payment of the rent for two consecutive years. The answer was that, although nothing had been expressly said in the penal stipulation in regard to the payment of rent, the undertaking not to eject the lessee must be held to have been conditional upon his paying the rent This power of eviction the lessor could exercise without the intervention of a Court of Justice. The Dutch law, while accepting the general principle that non-payment of rent for two years justified the ejectment of the lessee, introduced the important qualification that he can only be ejected by the decree of a Court of Law. Groenewegen, in his note to the passage in the Digest, mentions this qualification, and he adds, in effect, that in his time the decisions of the Courts, when called upon to adjudicate between lessor and lessee, were by no means uniform. It does not, however, appear from any of the reported cases that the question was ever distinctly raised whether the Courts had the power to relieve a lessee from the penalty of forfeiture where he offers before final judgment, or, as in the present case, before litis contestatio, to pay the arrears of rent and costs. Under the Canon Law, which was instrumental in removing the harsher features of many rules of the Roman law, it would appear that the power could be exercised of relieving lessees from the consequences of their neglect for two years in the payment of rent. Certainly in the case of long leases of ecclesiastical property under emphyteutical tenure, this power was exercised, notwithstanding the rule of the Roman Law giving an absolute right to the dominus to put an end to the emphyteusis on failure by the emphyteuta to pay the quitrent for a period of three years. It is clear from the Code (4, 66, 2) that the Roman law was as emphatic on this point as it was in regard to the right of the lessor on non-payment of rent for two years, and yet it is found that in several states of Europe the Courts followed, in varying degrees, the lead of the Canon law on the subject. In Saxony, for instance, according to Leyser (Meditations, 103), the Courts relieved the emphyteuta against forfeiture if the non-payment of rent was not attributable to fraud, or at least gross negligence on his part, and in a subsequent passage (Medit.' 220) he places leases on the same footing in this respect as emphyteutical holdings. In Scotland the Courts seem to have gone a good deal further in regard to emphyteutical rights. According to Green's "Encyclopædia of Scotch Law (Forfeiture)" "a feu right may be lost by failure to pay the feu duty to the superior for two years in succession. The forfeiture, however, does not operate in virtue of the failure to pay, but requires a declaration of irritancy to make it effectual, and forfeiture may be saved at any time before decree is extracted." It becomes important, then, to inquire into the practice of the Dutch Courts in regard to the forfeiture of quitrent leases on non-payment for three years of the annual quitrent. Groenewegen, in his note on the passage in the Code already cited, says that his previous remark as to the necessity of a decree before a lessee can be ejected equally applies, according to Dutch and French practice, to the case of an emphyteuta not paying quitrent for three years. He proceeds thus: "Add (to what I have said) that the emphyteuta who before decree of forfeiture is pronounced, tenders the arrears of rent may at the present day be readily relieved from the penalty of forfeiture by the aid of a restitution. In support of this statement he cites a passage from the Canon law in the chapter relating to Letting and Hiring. He adds that it had been so decided by the Supreme Court of Holland in a case reported by Coren (Observ. 22), to which I shall presently revert. The learned author also cites Grotius (Introd. 2, 40, 19) who treats the matter with his usual brevity and conciseness, and says that the emphyteuta in the case of the actual tender of the money is released from forfeiture. Van Leeuwen (Cens. for 1, 2, 16, 11) says that the default may be most readily purged by means of a speedy tender to the dominus or otherwise before decree is pronounced. The views of Voet (6, 3, 36), are to a somewhat similar effect, but he adds that relief is granted against the consequences of negligence whenever there does not appear to be contumacy or contempt towards the dominus. All the writers to whom I have referred cite the case reported by Coren, and it is well, therefore, to state the facts of that case, and the grounds of the decision. The plaintiff had received a grant from the Emperor of the right to receive quitrent on certain lands leased to one Van Barri, and he sued the defendants, as the successors in title of Van Barri for a decree of forfeiture on the ground of non-payment for three years of the quitrent. The defendants, by their plea, denied that the tenure under which they held was one of emphyteusis, and they prayed that, in so far as it should be necessary, they might be relieved against the consequences of their negligence. I take it that they also tendered payment of the arrears of quitrent, but this does not appear quite clearly from the report. The Court gave judgment for the amount of the arrears, with interest at 10 per cent., but refused to grant the decree of forfeiture. Against this refusal the plaintiff appealed to the Supreme Court. Strangely enough, the judges of that Court appear to have come to the conclusion that it was not a case of emphyteusis at all, but assuming that it was an emphyteusis, they held that, under the circumstances of the case, the defendants had been properly relieved against forfeiture by the Court below. One of the circumstances relied upon by the Supreme Court was that the defendants were women, and that, as they could not transact business properly for themselves, they should not be made to suffer for the omission of their agent to pay the annual quitrent, but it is difficult to ascertain the true ratio decidendi of that case. The importance of the decision, however, consists in this, that the Supreme Court claimed the right to exercise a judicial discretion upon the question, whether it should decree a forfeiture of the quitrent lease. All the grounds of the decision would have applied with equal force to the case of a lessee for a long term who might be in arrear for two years. Stress was laid on the fact that there was no wilful contempt of the landlord's rights, and upon a maxim quoted from Clarus that where a penalty is sought to be enforced the leaning of the judge should be against a forfeiture.

The question now raised in regard to leases has never been directly decided by this Court, nor, so far as I can ascertain, by any other South African Court. The plaintiff's counsel, in the course of his full, lucid, and able argument, relied upon certain dicta contained in the judgment in Johns v. Colonial Government (15 S.C.R.), but these dicta read by the light of the facts of that case, do not support the plaintiff's contention that the Court is bound to decree a cancellation of a lease after the lessee has failed to comply with a notice calling upon him to pay the arrears of rent within a reasonable time. In that case the Government had, without a decree of the Court, declared a lease for 99 years of mineral lands to be cancelled by reason of the lessee's having failed to do any mining work. The lessee thereafter tendered the rent, and instituted an action against the Government to have it declared that the lease was still in force, and the Government then relied upon the non-payment of rent for more than two years as a justification for cancelling the lease. The Court, however, held that the Government had no power without the intervention of a court of justice, to cancel the lease, and that that was a sufficient ground for holding that the lease was still in force. The Court, however, went further, and finding that no notice of cancellation had been given to the lessee, expressed the opinion, on the authority of Huber (Hed. Rechtse., 3, 9, 1 and 2) that, in the absence of such a notice, the Court would not have ordered a cancellation if an action for that purpose had been instituted by the Government. Huber's observations apply to the law of Vriesland, where the departure from the practice and principles of Roman law was less marked than in the other provinces of the Netherlands, and if, according to him, an "opzogging," a notifiation putting an end to the lease was necessary, it would a fortiori have been necessary in the other provinces. But there is nothing in the remarks that fell from the Court to justify the inference that, under our law, where such a notification has been given, the Court is bound to give effect to it without regard to the circumstances under which the failure to pay rent occurred.

The remark has often been made that this Court is a Court of equity as well as of law, and the remark is perfectly just, although not in exactly the same sense in which it would apply to the practice of the Courts in England. In this country there has never been a separation between the two modes of administering remedial justice, but the power of the Court to exercise an equitable jurisdiction in so far as it is not inconsistent with the fixed principles of the Dutch law has been repeatedly recognised. Where the Court has to elect between the rigid application of a rule of the old law to a case not clearly contemplated by that law, and the application of an equitable principle which does not defeat the old law but prevents any injustice from its rigid application, the Court would be quite justified in choosing the latter alternative. The present appears to be such a case. The Roman law allowed a lessor to put an end to a lease, without the intervention of a Court of justice, on failure by the lessee to pay rent for two years. The Dutch law modified the rule of the Roman law, and required an order of Court for the cancellation of the lease, but it made no distinct provision as to the province of the Court where the lessee before the decree tenders payment of all arrears of inter · and costs. Where such a tender is made, and there is nothing to show that the failure to pay rent was intended as a repudiation of the contract, this Court is not, in my opinion, bound to decree a cancellation, but may relieve the lessee against the consequences of his neglect. The law confers on the lessor certain special rights, by means of which he may ensure the punctual payment of his rents. He enjoys a tacit mortgage for the rent on things brought on to the land and on fruits growing thereon, and this right the Court will always assist the vigilant creditor in protecting by the process of attachment (see Graaff v. Pretorius (12 Juta, 104), and even before the rent has fallen due, the Court will protect him, by ordering the lessee to give security if there is danger of the tacit mortgage being lost by reason of the lessee's departure or other just cause of apprehension (see Voet, 19, 2, 22). The object of the law which allowed the ejectment of the lessee on failure to pay rent for two consecutive years was to provide the lessor with still further security, and that object is fully attained where the lessee is prepared to pay all arrears of rent, interest, and costs. Of course, the conduct of a lessee may have been such as to amount to a virtual abandonment or repudiation of the lease, and in such a case it would not be equitable for the Court to relieve the lessee against the consequence of his wilful defiance of the lessor's rights. But in the absence of any special circumstanes of this nature I am of opinion that it would be an abuse of the old law, and not a just application of it to cancel a lease and eject the lessee, who is prepared to purge his default by placing the lessor in the same position as if the rent had been paid to him when it was originally due. In the present case the tender was made by the company after the notice given by the plaintiffs to Kerr had expired, and the plea raises the special defence that, as the plaintiffs were aware of the enblease and assignment, notice ought to have been given to the company, and that, in the absence of such a notice, the plaintiffs are not entitled to a decree of cancellation as again the company. This was really the only defence relied upon by the defendants' counsel at the first hearing, and it is wholly untenable. There is no evidence that the lessor or the plaintiffs were aware of any sub-lease or assignment, and they certainly never accepted the company as lessee in lieu of Kerr, the original lessee. There was consequently no obligation on the plaintiffs to give notice of their claim for cancellation to the company, and the case must be decided as if due notice had been given to all parties concerned. The plea does allege that a tender of rent and costs was made by the company, and that tender is repeated in the plea. The tender was refused not on the ground that it was made by the company instead of by Kerr, but on the ground that it was made too late. Under our law a payment may be effectually made by a third person even on behalf of an unwilling debtor. (Voet, 46, 3, 1.) The payment should, of course, be made in the name, and on behalf of the real debtor, but it is obvious that even if the company had stated in its letter that the tender was made on behalf of Kerr, it would not have been accepted. The case must therefore be treated as if the tender had been made by the lessee himself after the notice to him had expired. His failure to pay the rent as it accrued due and after he had received the notice, was occasioned by his belief that all his rights and obligations had been transferred to the company, and not by any desire on his part to repudiate the lease. He ought to have given notice of the sub-lease to the lessor, but his neglect was probably occasioned by his assuming that the requisite notice would be given by the sub-lessees. Be this as it may, he has, in my opinion, a sufficient interest in this case to take advantage of the tender made by the company, and to ask the Court to relieve him against the consequences of his failure to pay. The judgment of the Court will, therefore, be for the plaintiff for the amount of rent due, viz., £180, with interest from and with costs up to January 5, 1902, but there will be no order for cancellation of the lease or for ejectment. Costs incurred after January 5, 1902, must be paid by the plaintiffs.

Subsequently, De Villiers, C. J., said that the Court intended raising the question of the stamps. It would appear that the stamps on certain of the documents were not of the required value. Under ordinary circumstances the Court would have imposed a penalty for the non-stamping of these documents. Considering, however, that the Civil Commissioner himself was somewhat to blame for the short payments, the Court would impose no penalty, but no effect could be given to these documents before the proper stamps had been affixed. There would be no issue of judgment until this had been done.

Kotzé, J.: The plaintiffs claim judgment for £180, being rent due under a written contract of lease, the cancellation of the lease, and the ejectment of the second defendant. By a written contract the late James Thomas granted to the first defendant, John Kerr, for the period of twenty years, commencing from the 1st June, 1890, at a monthly rental of £5, the following rights over the farm Spioenkop, viz., the right to mine for coal and work coal mines, to erect buildings, graze cattle, and construct and use tramway or railways from the mines to the main Colonial line of railway. The said John Kerr, who is described in the contract as the lessee, is also given the right to purchase the farm "at any time during the said term of twenty years or during the subsistence of these presents," for the sum of £4,000. The lessee has further the right to sublet his rights and interests under the contract, and in 1891 he did so sublet his rights and interests, which are now held by the second defendant, the Fairview Coal Mining Company. From the 1st December, 1899, no rent has been paid to the plaintiffs, so that on the 30th November, 1902, the rent was three years in arrear. On the 8th November of that year the plaintiffs called upon the first defendant for payment of the rent then due, and notified that on his failing to pay within 21 days legal proceedings would be instituted for a cancellation of the lease. It does not appear whether James Kerr, who is domiciled in Rhodesia, received this letter. On the 24th December the citation was issued and the plaintiffs' intendit filed. Thereupon the defendant Kerr, on the 30th December, 1902, telegraphed to one of the sub-lessees that an action had been instituted against him for payment of rent and cancellation of the lease, and intimating that as he had ceded and parted with all his interests an endeavour should be made to stop further proceedings. The second defendant, the Fairview Coal Mining Company, Limited, as soon as the matter was brought to its notice, tendered payment of the rent due, together with costs incurred, but the plaintiffs would not accept this tender. The second defendant, on February 27, 1903, also offered to purchase, and tendered to pay the purchase price of £4,000, mentioned in the lease, but this offer the plaintiffs likewise refused to accept. The second defendant by his plea again tenders the rent due, and offers to purchase the farm. In reconvention the second defendant claims transfer of the farm Spioenkop on payment by him of the £4,000.

Regard being had to the fact that by the contract of lease John Kerr, as lessee, has only the right to sublet and not to cede and assign his entire right, and that it also appears from one of the letters put in that the late James Thomas, as lessor, would not consent to release John

Kerr from his responsibility under the lease, it seems to me that the Court should now deal with this case as if Kerr alone were before it. It has been said on behalf of the defendant that in this case we have not in strictness to do with a contract of lease, inasmuch as the jus abutendi, as well as the jus utendi, is granted to Kerr, who is given the right to mine and remove the coal from the farm. But the insertion of conditions of this kind, like the right given to a lessee to cut and remove wood, or use up the soil in the making of bricks, does not, as it were, create a separate class of contract. The contract in the present case, which occurs daily in practice, remains in its essential features one of lease, and must be so regarded by the Court. The important question then arises whether the plaintiffs can insist upon a cancellation of the lease by reason of the non-payment of rent for more than two years. On their behalf it was contended that as the rent was in arrear for three years, and the lessee had been called upon to pay this rent within three weeks on pain of cancellation, his neglect to do so ipso facto terminated the contract, and the Court has no discretion in the matter, but is bound to cancel the lease. On the other hand, it was argued for the defendant that the Court can at any time before judgment grant relief upon tender of the rent due. The question of the jurisdiction of the Court to relieve a lessee, who is sued for the cancellation of his lease, against the forfeiture thereof, has now been raised, I believe, for the first time, for I do not know of any reported case directly bearing on the point. Our Roman-Dutch authorities all lay down that among the different grounds, which entitle a lessor to terminate a lease before the expiration of the time agreed upon, is the non-payment of rent by the lessee for a period of two years. In support of this statement reference is made by them to two passages in the Corpus Juris, viz., Dig., 19, 2, l. 54, s. 1, and l. 56. Although the commentators have been much exercised as to the precise meaning of the time limit occurring in these leges, as will appear from Cocceijus (Jus. Civ. Controvers, 19, 2, Q. 18), and Gluck (Pandekten, S. 1,052), they are all agreed that by the Roman law a lease could be cancelled after the rent was two years in arrear, and that the lessor had the right under such circumstances to expel and evict the lessee. In like manner the grant of emphyteutis could be terminated if the rent (canon) had not been paid for three years, where the property was secular, and for two years where it was ecclesiastical. (Cod., 4, 66, 2.) The Roman law allowed no purgatio morae either to the conductor or the emphyteuta, enabling him to escape the penalty of eviction or forfeiture. (Perez, in Cod., 4, 66, n. 20; Gluck, d. sec., 1,052.) According to the Canon law, however, both the emphyteuta and the lessee (Conductor) could evade eviction by declaring themselves ready and willing to pay the rent in arrear before the matter had assumed the shape of a formal law suit, and in this respect, says Gluck, the equity of the Canon law is preferred. In the same way the acceptance of rent from the lessee, after being two years in arrear, would, by the Canon law, deprive the lessor of his right to eviction

There can be no doubt that the equitable spirit of the Canon law influenced Dutch jurisprudence so far as the contract of emphyteutis or erfpacht is concerned, which is defined by Grotius (2, 40, 2) as the hereditary usufruct of another's immovable property subject to the payment of a yearly rent or canon. It is, therefore, what we should call a perpetual quit-rent tenure. By the law of Holland such a quit rent grant or erfpacht could be forfeited if the rent was three years in arrear, but the emphyteuta or grantee, says Grotius, can readily escape forfeiture or purge his default by making payment shortly afterwards, or, if he excuses himself on the ground of ignorance, or actually tenders the money, and the right to forfeiture is barred if the grantor or owner has by his conduct waived it, as where he accepts rent which has become due subsequently, or even rent which was due before without any mention of his right to forfeiture. If, however, it can reasonably be inferred that the nonpayment of rent proceeds ex contemptu vel contumacia of the dominus directus (Coren Obs. 22), no relief will be granted. There are several early decisions of the Dutch Courts dealing with the matter, commencing as far back as four centuries ago. These decisions lay down that, where the grant contains an unequivocal condition that if the rent is not paid on the stipulated day it shall be forfeited, the Court will decree a forfeiture, but not where no such forfeiture clause exists (Sententien van der Hoogen, Prov. Raad Decis., 37, 53, 54, 83. Van Leeuwen, Com . (2, 10, 2.) Van Zutphen, Neerl Pract. (Sub., voce Hueringhe, N., 24). The reason appears to be that where the penalty is conventional, that is imposed by the parties themselves, and not by the law, the Court will not unmake a contract which has been deliberately entered into, and accordingly no relief will be granted (Voet, 6, 3, 36.) But, where no special agreement as to forfeiture exists, it is not generally, as Glick observes, in the nature of consensual contracts to sue for cancellation on the ground of mere delay, but only for performance. No decision of the Courts of Holland, nor any approved text writer, has been cited distinctly laying down that in the case of a lease, where a lessee, who is two years in arrear with his rent, tenders payment within a reasonable time thereafter, the Court is bound to cancel the lease at suit of the lessor, and cannot relieve the lessee against a forfeiture. So far as I have been able to consult the authorities, I have certainly not been able to discover any trace in support of such a proposition. Johns v. the Colonial Government (15 S.C., 245) was cited at the bar as an authority in point, but on examination I find that the decision does not go so far as that. A reference to the report of the case shows that the Government had granted certain mining leases to Johns for 99 years at a given yearly rental, payable in advance. The rent being in arrear, the Government, without instituting legal proceedings for cancellation, of its own accord terminated and cancelled the lease. Johns thereupon brought his action to have it declared that this cancellation was void and the leases still of force. The Court, citing a passage from Huber's Hedendaagsche Rechtsgeleerdheid, held that as a lease could not be cancelled without a judicial decree to that effect, so a notification must first be given by the lessor that if the rent in arrear be not paid, legal steps for cancellation will be taken. Accordingly, as the Government had not brought an action for cancellation, and no opportunity had been afforded Johns to prevent the forfeiture, the Court declared the leases improperly cancelled and still of force. Here the case stops. It is no authority to show that if a lessee, who is in arrear, is called upon to pay the rent on pain of forfeiture, and fails to do so before action brought, the Court in the absence of any forfeiture clause in the lease is precluded from inquiring into the particular circumstances of the case, and is bound, without more ado, to decree a cancellation. Groenewegen, indeed, after stating in l. 54, s.1, and l. 56, Dig. 19, 2, that a lessee, who has not paid his rent for two years, can be evicted by judical decree, says, (in Cod., 4 66, 2), that the same rule applies to an emphyteuta who is three years in arrear, and observes that an emphyteuta offering the rent before judicial sentence can at the present day easily escape the penalty of forfeiture by means of restitutio in integrum. It does not, however, follow that we must necessarily infer from this that only the emphyteuta and not also the lessee can be relieved against forfeiture. Groenewegen, therefore, can likewise not be regarded as an authority precisely in point. He relies entirely on the text of the Digest, and quotes no Roman Dutch decison or other authority to show that a lessee cannot, on tender of the arrear rent, escape the penalty of cancellation of the lease. The reason why the Roman law permitted the lessor to evict the lessee is not quite clear. It is suggested by Cocceijus (19, 2, Q. 18) that in the matter of rent the same reasoning should apply to both the contract of lease and emphyteusis, and that no greater indulgence should in this respect be allowed to the temporary lessee than to the perpetual emphyteuta. Others, again, such as Brunneman, Vinnius, and Van Leeuwen, observe that in the case of emphyteusis the rent represents the dominium and is paid pro recognitione dominü, whereas in the case of a lease the rent is paid for the fruits and other uses of the land. Consequently, Leyser, in his Medidationes ad Pandectas (Sp. 103), says that, as the rent is an acknowledgment by the emphyteuta of the dominus directus, its non-payment is considered equivalent to a denial of his right and an attempt by the emphyteuta to set up a right of his own, which is equivalent to dolus on his part. But whatever differences there may be between an ordinary lease and emphyteusis or perpetual lease, there appears to me to be no sound distinction in principle between them so far as the question of forfeiture for non-payment of rent is concerned. I can see no reason why, in the absence of express judicial decision to the contrary, these two kinds of contract should not in this respect be placed on the same footing. It seems right that this should be so, especially if we bear in mind that emphyteusis, while generally perpetual, may be only for a term of years, and that, by our law, a lease of land, although usually for a term of years, may be for ever. Again, a lease of land for ten years or more (in longum tempus) is considered tantamount to alienation, and becomes a contract of erfpacht, transferring utile dominium on the lessee. (Van Zutphen, Neerl. pract. sub voce erfpacht, 9; Utrecht. Consult., Vol. 2, cons. 75, and authorities there cited.) Moreover, courts of justice will always, where possible, lean against forfeiture. We find this illustrated in our own law from very early times. Indeed, its broad equitable spirit is one of the most noteworthy characteristics of Roman-Dutch law. It has, however, not gone the length of the English Courts of Equity in this respect, which, disregarding the free and deliberate stipulation of the parties as to forfeiture of a lease on non-payment of rent, have considered such a clause as a mere security for the due payment of the rent. It is, indeed, true that by our law a lessor has several remedies for his protection. He may not merely bring an action for recovery of rent due, but has, in addition, a legal hypothec, on omnia illata et invecta, and may even claim security from the lessee, but that is no reason for holding that when a contract of lease contains a clear forfeiture clause, the Court is to construe it as a mere matter of security, and take upon itself the task of declaring that such a forfeiture clause does not mean what the plain language imports, and so make a contract different from that which the parties have themselves voluntarily adopted. The case of the emphyteutical lease mentioned by Van Leeuwen, Com. 2, 10, 2, and more fully reported in Coren, (obs. 22), has a special bearing on the point now under consideration. There the Supreme Court of Holland, Zeeland, and West Friesland, in the year 1623, granted relief against a claim for forfeiture by reason of non-payment of rent for three years on, among others, several equitable grounds. It was held that the defendants might well have understood the grant to be not emphyteusis, but one of census, a kind of tenure not subject to forfeiture for non-payment of rent, and thus the default of the defendants might be excused on the ground of ignorance, and that, where such can in any way fairly be done, the Court should always hold against a forfeiture. Nor was there anything to show that the rent had not been paid ex contemptu vel contumacia, for the defendants, being women, had left the payment of the rent in the hands of their agent, who always in his yearly accounts had entered the rent as having been duly paid by him. This case, which is cited with approval by all the text writers, is of importance, for it shows that, in the absence of a condition of forfeiture for non-payment of rent occurring in the grant or contract, the Court will carefully inquire into the circumstances of the particular case, and, if satisfied that there is nothing improper in the conduct of the emphyteuta, will grant him relief. We have here, therefore, a sound practical rule, which the Court should not hesitate to adopt and apply in like manner to the case of a lessee. Such being the conclusion at which I have arrived, it remains for me to apply the rule which I have stated to the facts of the present case. The plaintiffs did not immediately, after the rent was two years in arrear, intimate to John Kerr, the lessee, that they would institute proceedings for cancellation of the lease. They allowed the rent to run on for a third year, and at the end of that period, by letter, of the 8th November, 1902, called on him to pay the rent within 21 days from that date, intimating that on his failure to do so an action for cancellation would be instituted. It does not appear whether Kerr, who lives in Rhodesia, beyond the jurisdiction of this Court, received that letter or not, and as the plaintiffs claim a forfeiture, and rely on this letter to place the defendant in mora, I think the Court should have been furnished with clear proof either as to the receipt of this letter by Kerr, or of circumstances from which it could have been satisfactorily inferred that the letter must have been received by him. Kerr, as lessee, had for several years ceased to pay the rent, which was satisfied by the sub-lessees, and received by the late James Thomas. The telegram of December 30, 1902, sent by Kerr to one of the sub-lessees, shows that he was both surprised and annoyed when the citation was served upon him. The citation, which issued on December 24, was presumably the first intimation he received of the position taken up by the plaintiffs. Kerr was evidently under the impression that payment of the rent was being continued by the sub-lessees. It cannot, therefore, be said that the non-payment of the rent arises ex contemptu vel contumacia on the part of Kerr, or that he has been guilty of improper conduct in the matter. I am accordingly of opinion that while there must be judgment for the plaintiffs for the sum of £180, arrear rent, with costs up to date of tender, no cancellation of the lease and consequent eviction of the lessee should be decreed.

Mr. Buchanan, moved as a matter of urgency, for a temporary interdict restraining the respondent from parting with certain cattle, and for an order to have them handed over to some disinterested person pending an action.

The applicant's affidavit set forth that in 1897, at Gastron, Orange River Colony, he entrusted to one Tafeni, of Herschell, certain two heifers to be handed over to Gonogonue, a brother of his. Tafeni did not hand the heifers over to Gonogonne, In the presence of Tafeni he exchanged one of the eight cattle for a mare, which was at present in the possession of Tafeni. Tafeni refused to deliver the cattle, declaring that they did not belong to the applicant. In March, 1903, he commenced an action against Tafeni for the restitution of the cattle, or to pay their value, viz., £75. On May 16 he found that Tafeni had parted with the cattle to Makumeni, and deponent believed that if the respondent were not restrained from parting with the cattle they would be done away with should applicant get judgment in the action.

An interdict was granted restraining respondent from parting with the cattle and the mare, pending the result of action instituted against Tafeni—with leave to Tafeni or respondent to move to set aside the interdict.

MITCHELL v. TRAMWAY CO. { 1903. June 18th. „ 19th.

Negligence—Collision on road.

This was an action brought by Archibald Mitchell, of Observatory, against the Cape Town Tramway Co., to recover £150 damages for injuries done to plaintiff's horse.

The declaration set forth that plaintiff was a livery-stable keeper, residing at Observatory-road. About 10th October, 1902, while a horse, the property of the plaintiff, was been driven along the Main-road, at Mowbray, a tramcar, the property of the defendants, was carelessly and negligently driven, and collided with the horse, which was severely cut and bruised. The defendant had expended £51 4s. 6d. on the horse, which he valued at £150 previous to the accident. The injuries had rendered the horse practically useless.

The plea admitted the formal allegations, but denied that the acoident was due to the careless driving of their servant, and attributed it to want of skill on the part of the lady who was driving the horse at the time.

Mr. Benjamin (with him Mr. Upington) for the plaintiff; Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Russell), for the defendant.

Mr. Benjamin called,

Archibald Mitchell, the plaintiff, who stated that he was a horse and cattle dealer at Station-road, Observatory. He remembered lending one of his horses to a Miss Black, who was a perfect horsewoman, and had often ridden his horses. The injured horse was an Irish hunter, which he bought from a dealer for £50. At the time of the purchase the horse was in bad condition, but he thought that he would improve. He had the horse for about six months, during which he fed it well. When the accident occurred the horse was in splendid condition, and he valued it at £150. When the horse was brought back to his stable after the accident, one of its legs—the near hind leg—was bruised, and there was a cut on the hock. The animal was under the treatment of a veterinary surgeon for about two months, and for nearly three months the horse was kept in slings. He paid the doctor £23 10s. for attendance. The charge for the keep of the horse came to 6s. 6d. per day for seven months, while he also had to pay a man to specially attend to the animal 5s. per day for a fortnight. The animal was now value for about £40 or £50, and he had an offer of £40, provided he would give a guarantee that the injured leg would not give way. He had worked the horse since its recovery, but it often broke down, and he thought it would never be completely sound. The horse was a most docile animal, quiet and well-mannered. He had taken him often in crowded thoroughfares—down to the Docks three or four times a day.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: The horse did not now look quite sound; it was swelled on the hock. Its value was not now half what it had been. The horse was standing in his own stable, and 6s. 6d. was what he charged other people for baiting. He used the animal for his own private purposes. If a tram were immediately behind him, the horse would not curvet or prance. The doctor may have been in attendance for only one month, as was shown on the doctor's account.

Re-examined by Mr. Benjamin: His usual charge for baiting horses was 6s. 6d. per day. At the time of the accident the horse was under order for a client.

[By Maasdorp, J.: He had been driving the horse the day previous to the accident.]

John T. Boase, called, stated he was a M.R.C.V.S., and had been practising in Cape Town for about seven years. The horse was suffering from a larcerated wound on the near hind leg. The injury was not serious, but was prolonged.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: Part of his account had been paid. He did not consider his charge high, as the horse needed a lot of attention. After about one month the animal had recovered.

Re-examined by Mr. Benjamin: The animal now appeared to be fairly sound. It was possible that there might be a permanent injury, but it was not probable.

Charles Eaton, manager for Mr. Palmer, at Observatory, said that he was in plaintiff's employ at the time of the accident. He was riding with Miss Black at the time of the accident. Miss Black was one of the best horsewomen he had ever ridden with. The horse was of a quiet disposition. At the time of the accident they were just beside the Presbyterian Church at Mowbray. The tram was going towards Mowbray, in the same direction as witness. The left side of the road was being excavated for gas pipes, and was closed to traffic. Previous to the accident they were riding on the tram line. There were Scotch carts coming towards them, some of which were on witness's right. When he saw the tram it was stopped at the junction between the upper and lower main roads. As the tram approached he heard the bell, and witness got out on to the sidepath between the two carts. The road was quite straight, but very narrow at that particular spot. The driver of the tram could plainly see the congestion in front of him. Witness went to the lady's assistance.

By Mr. Searle: He had not been asked anything about the accident, but he saw the whole affair. There was not room for the lady to get through, as she was riding a bigger horse. She took the line to get ahead, but got jammed by a cart coming in the opposite direction. Witness saw the car strike the horse. The tram was slowing down at the time. The horse was actually forced against a gas pipe after the car had collided with it. The tram dragged the horse along fully 21 feet. The lady remained on the horse all the time. The collision with the car did not actually cause any injuries, but the horse was forced against a pipe which was lying on the top of the excavation. He did not see the horse prancing before the accident. There was no room to get on in front between the Scotch carts.

Re-examined by Mr. Benjamin: They did not wait purposely till the tram ran them down.

[By Kotzé J.: The excavations extended to a further fifty or sixty yards in front.]

Archibald Mitchell, recalled, stated that he had measured the road, and found the width at the spot from the rail to the curb to be twelve feet.

Mr. Upington called,

Joseph Lightfoot, photographer, Mowbray, who said that at the time of the accident he had just come on to the Main-road from the cricket field. The tram was travelling at the rate of ten miles an hour. He saw the tram collide with the lady's horse. The tram carried the horse along about seven yards. Just before the accident occurred the motorman applied the brakes. Had he applied the brakes sooner he could have pulled up his tram.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: Witness was between seven and ten yards off the scene of the accident. He saw the last witness nod to the driver of the tram, and then spur on his horse between two Scotch carts. The lady's horse was not making any particular "fuss." When the last witness got through, the lady's horse swerved towards the gas pipe. The statement produced by the inspector was not quite correct, as witness gave him to understand that the horse and not the tram was going on slowly towards Mowbray. The tram, which apparently could have been stopped, ran into the horse and jammed it against the gas pipe.

Re-examined by Mr. Upington: It was quite clear that the lady was in difficulties, owing to the congestion. When the horse swerved, had the motorman applied his brake, the accident would not have occurred, Eaton had to rush through between the Scotch carts, and that brought him on to the side path. The tram drove the horse up against the gas pipe.

[By Maasdorp, J.: There were two Scotch carts immediately in front and others following on some distance up the road.]

[By Kotzé, J.: When the tram was forty yards off, it was travelling at the rate of ten miles an hour. The excavations ran for about another twenty yards from the scene of the accident.]

James Walter Ashley, said that he was about twenty yards from the scene of the accident when it occurred. The horses were travelling slowly. As a rule, the trams did not travel slowly over the excavated parts. Directly after the accident the traffic became congested. The tram was travelling at an excessive rate of speed.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He was about twenty yards from the footpath, and was behind the gum trees. It was true that he told the inspector that he had not seen sufficient of the accident. Witness told the inspector that it was a shame the way the trams travelled along, and the inspector agreed with him that the drivers were "no class," but added that he had to take what he got.

[By Kotzé, J.: The tram was travelling at about fourteen miles an hour before the brake was applied. The excavations continued about sixty yards further up the road.]

Mr. Benjamin closed his case.

Mr. Searle called,

Ernest Rivers Harvey, surveyor to the Tramway Co., who said that he made the plan produced in court. Several witnesses pointed out to him the scene of the accident. The width at the actual spot was 14 ft. 6 inches from the line to the curb.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He included the gutter in the 14 feet 6 inches.

Eli Pickington, motorman, said he had been in the employ of the Cape Town Tramway Company for two years. He never had any serious accidents during that time. He was driving the tram that ran into the plaintiff's horse. The car travelled at about four miles an hour over the excavation. When he was passing the gasometer, he first noticed the riders in front. The gentleman was on the tram line, a little in front of the lady, who was on the mountain side of the road. Witness rang the gong, and slackened down on reaching the excavations. The riders got off the line, but as he was 7 feet off, the lady's horse swerved across the line. There were no Scotch carts in witness's view at the time. He applied the brake and reversed, and the car only went a further 5 feet. The horse was pushed against the iron pipe. There was plenty of room for the riders to get out of the way. The horse swerved suddenly on to the line, and witness could not do anything to prevent the accident.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: If the rails were dry, a tram travelling at the rate of ten miles an hour could be stopped within 20 feet. The lady was riding on the right of the gentleman, but subsequently swerved on to the line. The lady was about 5 feet from the rails when witness rang the bell. When the tram collided with the horse, the animal swerved right across the line, and although the lady seemed quite calm, she apparently lost control of the horse. The horses were galloping slowly. They would be covering about four miles an hour.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: The riders had been changing positions, and when he noticed them first they were galloping and stopping alternately.

[By Kotzé, J.: There were not Scotch carts there at the time. There was nothing in front of the horse to frighten him.]

Andrew Galloway, in the employ of the Gas Company at the time, said that he was working alongside the spot at the time of the accident. The soil was very soft, and the motormen had to be cautioned to drive slowly. The tram was travelling at the rate of four or five miles an hour. When he saw them, the lady was nearest the tram lines. From 150 yards off he heard the gong ringing. The gentleman drew to the front. When the tram touched the horse, the animal sprang backwards towards the gas pipe. Witness was about 3 yards from the scene of the accident. The tram was driven along cautiously.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He had been two months in the employ of the Gas Company at the time. The accident occurred about 52 feet beyond the open excavation. He saw no Scotch carts. He did not see the gentleman on the sidepath. After the car struck the horse, the animal backed across on to the mound of earth on the left side of the road. They had had two falls of earth the previous week through the vibration of the trams.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: The lady must have lost control over the horse, otherwise it would have plunged forward.

[By Maasdorp, J.: When witness saw them first the lady and gentleman were on the right side of the road.]

William Kerr, a passenger by the tram, said that he was sitting on the top front seat when he noticed the riders about fifty yards ahead of the car. The tram was travelling at an ordinary rate. Both the riders were on the right side of the road, the gentleman riding on the right side of the lady, whose horse was restive and prancing. The lady's horse pranced across the rails. He did not think there was any carelessness on the part of the motorman. The lady jumped off within a minute of the accident. Immediately after the accident the Scotch carts appeared, but they did not cause the lady to take the horse across the line.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: His attention was specially concentrated on the riders. Witness could not say whether the gentleman rode on to the footpath. The lady was failing to manage the horse.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: The horse suddenly backed across the line.

[By Maasdorp, J.: There was nothing to prevent the lady taking the horse off the rails.]

William Alfred Humphreys, assistant manager of the gas works at Mowbray, stated that he was in charge of the works on the road. He arrived on the scene immediately after the accident, and saw blood and hair on the pipe lying on the top of the mound. He pointed out the spot to the surveyor. A man was kept on the spot to see that the rails were kept clear of earth, etc. The trams were only allowed to pass at a slow rate, and the men were specially warned on the point.

[By Kotzé, J.: The men were warned to go slow; that would be about two or three miles per hour.]

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: If a car did once go over the spot quickly, he could not say it would cause any damage.

Carl Trimmer stated that he was travelling on the car to which the accident occurred. He saw the carts, and the lady and gentleman riding. The lady was on the side of the tram, and when the motorman rank his bell, he saw the lady's horse first go off the track, and then it began to back across the line towards the gas pipes. He thought that the horse was shying. The tram was going quite slowly, and had nearly stopped when it struck the horse. He saw nothing blocking the way on the right-hand side. The motorman could not have avoided the accident, which was due to the horse backing.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He was sitting on the right-hand side in the front. The horse came over from the right-hand side. The tram was about twenty yards away when the horse backed. The tram had nearly stopped when the horse reached the line.

James William Crowhurst stated he was a M.R.C.V.S. He examined the horse after the accident, and saw a scar on its leg, but there was no apparent damage to the animal. He had the horse trotted, but saw no weakness in it. From what he could see, the horse was as valuable as before except for the scar, which, as it was sure to get smaller, would probably make a difference of only about £10 in its value.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He did not think that the result of the accident would have any ulterior effect upon the horse. He should look upon a stiffness in the animal after driving it as being rather suspicious. He thought Mr. Mitchell could have, without risk, given the guarantee which was asked for by the person who had offered to buy the horse. If the horse did go lame it would be risky to guarantee it. He would value the horse at about £90 or £100. It was a good-class animal. If the horse suffered from a slight lameness after two days' use Mr. Mitche.. might expect £45 to £60. He would give £60 for the horse as it stood on the day he saw it.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: The injury was severe, but not dangerous. The only effect he thought the accident had was the scar.

Donald McDonald stated he was superintendent of the tramway system. The motorman of the car which struck the horse was in the employment of the Tramway Company since January 6, 1901, and bore an excellent character. Had the tram, if it were travelling at 10 miles per hour, struck the horse, there would not be much of either lady or horse left. Both of them would have been killed.

Mr. Searle closed his case, and counsel were heard in argument on the facts.

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiff in this case sues the defendant for the recovery of £150 as damages sustained by him through an injury done to his horse by the negligence of the defendants' servants. The defendant pleads that the injury done to the horse was the result of negligence on the part of the person who was in charge of the horse. Now we have in this case the usual conflict of evidence which one would expect when an accident of this kind happens, and it is a conflict which does not arise from any bad faith on the part of any of the witnesses, but simply from the different impressions taken by persons who watch occurrences which rapidly take place. When an accident, such as the present, happens, it is natural that the parties themselves should be satisfied that they had done everything that was necessary, and that it was their duty to do to avoid an accident, and that they were not guilty of negligence. And then, as we know, when inquiries are made of the bystanders as to their opinion of the conduct of the parties, each party selects those witnesses on whom an impression has been made favourable to his case, and, as I said, there is room for difference of opinion. Under the circumstances, we have witnesses called into court who contradict one another, and they do it all in very good faith. I think we ought to bear in mind, in considering the circumstances of this case, that when the Legislature granted permission for the construction of this line, special provision was made that the road along which this line was constructed should be, along the general course, of the width of 30 feet. That shows that it was the impression of those who had to bear in mind what the traffic usually was upon this road, that it would require at least 30 feet to carry that traffic, if a tram line like this was constructed. We find, that at the time this accident occurred one-third of this line was occupied by works necessary for laying down gas pipes. The result of this was that the road was contracted to about two-thirds of the width which was thought requisite by those who had authorised the construction of the line. I mention that, because it seems to me that, in these circumstances, when a large amount of traffic was confined at the time to this narrow space, all parties who used this road should have used special care that this greater pressure should not result in injury or accident. It is clear that the space occupied by the line is not granted for the sole use of the Tramway Company. Notwithstanding the construction of the line, the general public have a perfect right to use this space for ordinary traffic, but it is provided that no one should go upon the line or take any animal upon the line in such a way as to wilfully obstruct the passage of the cars. If he does so, he commits an offence which is punishable under the Act, and it is also provided that if anyone should be on the line, notice should be given to him by the motorman by signal that he should move off the line, and upon such notice being given, any passenger upon the line is bound to move off as soon as practicable. It follows, therefore, that when this lady and her companion were making use of this tramway line on the day in question that they could not be regarded as trespassers. They had a perfect right to be there, subject to the conditions that upon signal being given them, they should as soon as practicable move off that line. Now the question arises: did they do their best to move off the line as soon as practicable, and the answer to that question would throw some light upon the issue as to negligence. It does not follow that if any passenger should neglect to move off the line as soon as practicable, that those responsible for the car would be justified in driving the car in such a way as to injure such a person. But I merely mention that duty of a passenger on the line for the purpose of testing the conduct of the parties in reference to their negligence. It is admitted by the witnesses for the plaintiff, that Mr. Eaton and the lady were riding upon this line some distance in advance of the car, and upon a signal being given by the motorman they quickened their pace with the intention of avoiding the car and getting out of its way. The account they gave of their movements was, that upon receiving this notice and upon conceiving the intention of getting out of the way of the car, they found on the right of them the road was occupied by a number of carts, and that it was impossible for them to move off the road in that direction. They consequently moved forward, but they found that the car was approaching too rapidly, whereupon. Mr. Eaton made a dash out of the road between two carts and got on to the sidepath. The lady could not follow him because the carts were obstructing her, and, consequently, she moved along the road until the car moved up against her. It is well to bear in mind what happened at the time the car jammed the leg of the horse against the gas pipe. All the witnesses agree that when the horse was standing there fixed up, it was in a perfectly quiet condition. It was not restless, and did not seem nervous and frightened, that the lady continued to sit upon it and that she was evidently very calm, and nothing in her conduct showed that the horse was beyond control immediately before. Now, in these circumstances, I am inclined to accept the evidence for the defence that Mr. Eaton and this lady tried to get out of the way of the car as soon as practicable, that they made an effort to do so, that they moved on more rapidly than they were doing a short time before, and moved at the rate of five miles an hour. If we take that to be so, then if the car was following her at a very slow pace it must follow that the car could easily have been checked before it actually pushed up against the horse. If this is the conclusion we come to, that it was impossible for the lady to get out of the road, that she was using every effort to do so, and that the car was a sufficient distance behind in which to be checked, when the motorman ought to have observed she could not get out of the road, then we must come to the conclusion that the injury was caused through the negligence of the servant of the defendants. But I do not think it is absolutely necessary in this case to find that the witnesses for the defence have given us an incorrect account of the occurrence. I think, on the whole, it amounts to this, that they also saw the lady ride upon one of the rails, that the car was following her, that for some distance she pursued her way upon the line, and that at one spot she got off the line and very soon got on to it again. Now, the reasons given by the witnesses for the defence for the action of the horse is, that the horse, for some little while as it was coming along, had been beyond the control of the lady, and being beyond her control it curvetted and pranced, and remained on the line for some time, and that when she managed to get it off it returned, and got on to the line again. I will take Mr. Harris's evidence, because it is said that Mr. Harris, being a disinterested witness, would give us a correct account. This is the impression his evidence made on me. That when the lady was riding along the line the horse got restive, that she could not manage it very well, and that for some time she struggled with it; and after it had gone some fifty yards or more the accident happened, because the horse got beyond her control. If we take that to be the state of the case, it would still lead to the conclusion that the defendants are not absolved from negligence. Mr. Harris says that he could see that an accident was likely to happen, because of the way the lady was riding the horse. Now, there is no doubt that this was a quiet horse, and there is no doubt also from what the witnesses state that the lady was a good and a very courageous rider. If a person rides a quiet horse in this way along a public thoroughfare, and it suddenly becomes frightened and restless, and beyond control, the person who is riding such horse is not guilty of negligence in the management of that horse. The action of the horse must be regarded as an accident which could not have been anticipated. Here we have consequently a quiet horse suddenly frightened by the tram, and said by the witnesses to be then beyond control. The question then arises, could the motorman, if he had been careful, and used proper diligence, have avoided the accident. If he had observed the action of the horse in the same way as Mr. Harris, he must have come to the conclusion that there was a person ahead of him who was riding a horse which was at that moment beyond control, and he should certainly have stopped his tram before he came up. I think that was the duty of the motorman, and under all the circumstances, I come to the conclusion he had an opportunity of stopping his car, because he says himself he was going at the rate of four miles an hour, and he could stop his car within four or five feet. If we refer to the evidence of Kerr and Zimmer, we find one of them says that when the lady, with this unmanageable horse got back on the line, she was then some seven yards from the car, and the other says some 20 yards away from the car. If, consequently, the motorman had used due diligence, he could have stopped the car before he got up to her. It was his duty to do so, and he was negligent in not doing so. Whether the negligence arose from travelling too fast, or whether it arose from stopping too slowly, makes no difference. In the result he was guilty of negligence. Even if we take the witnesses for the defence, the injury to the horse was not caused through any negligence on the part of the rider, but through negligence on the part of the motorman, who was the servant of the defendant company. Under the circumstances, the defendant is liable to pay the plaintiff damages suffered through the injury. It was proved that the plaintiff had to pay the veterinary surgeon £23 3s. for attending to the horse and curing it, and then he was at the expense of keeping a useless animal, which he might have used or sold and the cost of keeping it is stated to amount to some considerable sum. I think he has put that sum at too high a figure, and a less amount will meet the case. On the whole, we come to the conclusion that the horse has deteriorated in value to the extent of £10, and the damages should be assessed at £50. We cannot estimate the damages too nicely in a case like this kind. We might take the cost of the horse while it was useless about £17. Giving £23 for the doctor's services, £10 for the deterioration in value, and £17 for the cost of keeping a useless horse, would bring the damages up to £50. I think the plaintiff should have judgment for £50, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

MCKENZIE V. HARBOUR BOARD. { 1903. June 19th.

Bailee of goods—Landing agent—Proof of loss—Invoice.

In an action against a landing agent for the alleged loss of certain articles from a case landed by the defendant, the plaintiff failed to produce the person who packed the case nor did he produce the invoice relating to the goods, but he produced a pencil memorandum made by his own clerk at the time when the case was opened in the presence of the defendants' claim's clerk, such memorandum not being signed or initialled by the latter. The claims clerk stated that he never saw the memorandum, and that, as the invoice was not produced at the opening, he could not make a note of the articles alleged to be missing.

Held, that there was not sufficient proof of the loss of the articles.

This was an action brought by McKenzie and Co. (Limited), of Cape Town, against the Table Bay Harbour Board, to recover two sums of £33 5s. and £5, loss and damages to certain goods landed by the said Board, to be delivered to the plaintiff as consignee.

The declaration set forth that the plaintiff company was a duly registered company, carrying on business in Cape Town, and the defendant was the Table Bay Harbour Board. In March, 1902, there were delivered from the Union-Castle steamer Kinfauns Castle 23 packages of merchandise, in good order and condition. The defendant received the said packages for the purposes of delivery to the plaintiff. Defendant, in breach of his duty, delivered only 22 of the said packages, and thereupon the plaintiff issued a summons for the delivery of the missing package or damages. Thereafter the missing case was delivered to the plaintiff, but not in the condition in which the defendant received it, some of the contents having been abstracted and others damaged, whereby the plaintiff suffered damage to the amount of £5, value of abstracted articles and £33 5s. damage to the contents. Plaintiff had prepared a list of the damaged and lost articles, which comprised sewing cotton, suit of clothes, electro-plate, boots and clothing, cigars, etc.

The defendant's plea admitted the formal paragraphs of the declaration. It denied that there was any breach of duty on the part of the defendant in connection with the delivery. The defendant said that the case, in the condition in which he received it from the ship, was lawfully handed over to the Customs officials at the Docks, and that the said cases remained in the care, custody, and control of the said officials for a period, during which the defendant had no control by law over the said officials. The said officials took charge of the said packages, which were subsequently handed over to the defendant, who delivered them to the plaintiff in the same order and condition as they were received in from the Customs officials. The plaintiff signed a clean receipt for the packages, and accepted notice from the defendant of repudiation of liability. The defendant duly and lawfuly delivered to the Customs officials the packages as he received them on or at the steamship Kinfauns Castle. Subject to the above, the defendant denied the remaining paragraphs of the declaration, and said that if any of the said goods were lost or stolen, they were not so lost or stolen when in the defendant's custody or control, and that the defendant was not therefore liable for the said claim.

The plaintiff's replication said he admitted that the case was taken to the searcher's office. He said that the opening and sealing of the case was done by the defendant for the plaintiff. He refused to accept the case when first tendered, and pointed out a list of articles damaged and missing. He afterwards accepted the case, subject to the articles on such list being replaced, or the values paid. The plaintiff denied that the defendant repudiated liability at the time for the missing articles, but said that, on the other hand, he actually admitted liability.

The rejoinder was general.

Mr. Buchanan (with him Mr. Alexander), for plaintiff; Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Close), for defendant.

Mr. Buchanan said the point at issue seemed to be that the Harbour Board agreed that, as their agents, they received this package in good order or condition, but said that they were not liable for any damage, firstly, because they parted with possession and control of it to the Customs Department for the time; and, secondly, they said the plaintiff gave a clean receipt for the case, with notice that any damage therein should be immediately notified, and so he took it that the defendant meant they were now estopped from making any claim for damage.

[D Villiers, C.J. I understood their case to be that the damage was done by the Customs authorities.]

Mr. Buchanan: That seems to be their first contention—that the damage was done by the Customs authorities, and then they go on also to say that we gave a clean receipt when we took the goods later on.

Mr. Close: We make it a little more general than that; we say the damage was done, if any, while the package was in the searcher's office, under the control of the Customs.

Mr. Buchanan called

Warren Bradford Sexton, one of the directors of McKenzie and Co., who stated that in March, 1902, he received a bill of lading for some goods consigned to him by Wheatley and Co., London. He passed his delivery and clearing orders to the Harbour Board on March 13. He first saw this particular package on a wagon in front of the company's store between March 20 and 22. He knew that it had gone to the searcher's office. The package showed signs of having been tampered with, and witness sent over for a Harbour Board clerk to come and examine the case. The messenger came back with the message, to return the case to the Docks. It was a common practice for clerks to come to make such examinations. On April 8, the case was re-delivered to the company. The Harbour Board seals were intact. A few days later a clerk, Mr. Simpson, came to examine the case. A storeman broke the seals in Simpson's and witness's presence. Witness had a manifest of the goods which the case should contain. The goods in the case were checked with the invoice, and Mr. Simpson and witness agreed as to the articles missing. Witness's claim for £33 5s. was based on the invoice price, with duty and other charges incurred. Mr. Simpson remarked that the goods must have been taken while in the dock. Witness later saw Mr. Graves, who was in charge of the Claims Adjustment Department. Mr. Graves gave witness to understand that if he sent in his claim it would be paid. It was the custom that when a case was sent to the searcher's office for examination, it was brought up and off-loaded into the examination store, where it was entered up by the Customs officials. The case remained in the searcher's office until the consignee's agent came and had it opened by the Harbour Board men, who were paid for this work. The articles were checked by the examining officer. The consignee's clerk signed the book as having taken over the charge of the case. The Harbour Board held that delivery to the searcher's office constituted a second delivery, and charged extra for these services accordingly.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: It appeared from the pro tem. order that case No. 310, the case in question, had been ordered to the searcher's office for examination by the Customs. On examination of the case it was found that there was a discrepancy, according to the declaration, and the case was delivered about March 20, short four packages, which were detained by the Customs. Although Mr. Simpson might say that he was incorrect, witness adhered to his statement that the manifest had been produced at the examination on the occasion of the second delivery. It was incorrect to say that he claimed for the full value of the case, while he alleged to be claiming for only part of it. Witness always kept a clerk at the searcher's office. He knew that under regulation 24, the Harbour Board refused all responsibility for goods in the King's warehouse, or the searcher's office. He did not know what had become of the original invoice, as it had been mislaid, and he had not received a copy of it from London.

Re-examined by Mr. Buchanan: As a rule the Customs detained the whole of a case of goods if there were any discrepancy.

By De Villiers, C.J.: He did not think that the damage could have occurred while the case was in the possession of the Customs. On the 20th March the case went back to the Harbour Board. If there had been any discrepancy when the examination was held it would have been noticed either by the Harbour Board or the plaintiff's own clerk. The case passed into the hands of the Harbour Board, and they signed a receipt for it.

In re-examination, witness stated that rent was sometimes charged for goods in the searcher's office. He had since received claims from several persons for the missing articles. A Mrs. Sauer had claimed £12 10s. for plate. He never received the plate, only two dozen spoons being left in the package. Mr. Devereux claimed £8.

By De Villiers, C.J.: He also received claims from Mr. Fry for £5 for machinery; from Walters, for 10s., for sewing cotton; from Sutherland, for £5 5s., for a suit of clothes; and a claim of £2 for cigars. The charges for duty and other charges incurred here came to about 33 1-3 per cent. of the invoice value. There was little left in the case of any value.

[De Villiers, C.J. (to witness): It is a great pity that the invoice is gone. It is just the thing we want. What have you done with it?]

Witness replied that he had been totally unable to trace it. It was a very unfortunate thing for them in proving their case.

A storeman in the employ of Messrs. McKenzie and Co. stated that about March 20 the case was brought to the store. It appeared damaged, and he called Mr. Sexton, who sent him to the Harbour Board office. He did not know which clerk he saw. He could not say definitely if the clerk was in Court. The clerk told him to return the case to the Docks.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: He distinctly remembered the number of that particular case, although he could not recollect the number of any case he had previously taken in.

George H. Guest, baggage clerk in the employ of the Harbour Board, said that in March, 1902, he was the clearing clerk employed by McKenzie. Witness cleared through the searching office all goods that came there for his firm. The Harbour Board brought the goods there and removed them on witness's instructions. It was necessary to produce the invoices when the searching took place. Witness could not particularly remember case No. 310. He remembered inquiries being made. If the articles in the case were not in accord with the invoice when the searching took place a note would be made of it. Witness was the only man employed by McKenzie in the searching office at that time.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: Witness could not remember whether any articles were taken out of the case before it was closed at the searching office. When the case was opened the articles therein corresponded with the invoice; witness could not say whether they corresponded or not when the case went off.

Mr. Buchanan closed his case.

Mr. Close called

William Thomas Anthony, who said he was a Customs examining officer at the Docks in March, 1902. When a case of goods arrived, per the Harbour Board wagon, at the searchers' office, the Customs searchers dealt with McKenzie's men, or whoever the consignee might be. A bill of entry was always produced, and it was necessary that the articles on the documents should correspond with the articles in the case, and that the value given should be in the searcher's opinion correct. When the articles did not correspond, those upon which duty was paid, were usually sent to the importer for convenience, and the others were retained. If the box of cigars had been in the case it might have been passed by, the duty on it being added to other items. So long as the duty on all articles in the case was covered in this way, goods not shown in the documents would be passed.

By Mr. Buchanan: The building in which the searching took place belonged to the Harbour Board. The Board brought the goods there, and unpacked them for search. Witness's only concern was to satisfy himself that the correct duty had been paid. It was the business of the Harbour Board to remove the goods after they had been examined.

By the Court: If goods were short according to the invoice, and duty had been paid on them, witness would make a note of it in case the importer applied for a refund. If articles were short upon which no duty was paid, witness would not take a note of it.

Re-examined: Nothing could be done to the case by the importer while it lay in the searching office.

William Edward Morrell, claims clerk at the Table Bay Harbour Board, stated that boys were kept at the searchers' office for the opening of cases, but only under the direction of the importer. After the examination the case was nailed up under the supervision of the importer or his agent.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: The consignee was charged 6d. per package for the services of the boys in the searchers' office. Once packages were delivered to the searchers' office they were under the charge of the Custom's officials until they had been examined.

George Marrell Simpson, examining officer, under the Harbour Board, stated that at the examination of the case referred to by Mr. Sexton, he did not see any invoice produced. He made a rough list of the articles in the case, which he had now mislaid.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Supposing you found some articles were missing, would you not have drawn up a formal document signed by Sexton and yourself? Surely you would not make out a list in that slipshod way?]

Witness replied that he would have made a note of the missing goods and sent in a report to his superiors.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Even after the lapse of a year he was quite clear that he had not seen any invoice at the examination. He sent in a written report to the Harbour Board, but he could not say if that report could be found. He did not think he saw any document in Mr. Sexton's hands at all. He could not be certain if he had asked Mr. Sexton for the invoice. He made a list of the goods in the case, because he had no invoice by which to ascertain what was missing.

By De Villiers, C.J.: The seals ought to have been put on the case when returned from McKenzie's store, but he could not say if this was actually done.

Further cross-examined, witness said that it was apparent that some articles were taken from the case.

Re-examined by Mr. Close: It would be difficult to say whether the state of the case was due to the Customs examination or to the abstraction of some articles.

Walter Grave, chief claims clerk, in the employ of the Harbour Board, in March, 1902, said he instructed Mr. Simpson to make an examination of this case. After witness was informed that McKenzies had returned the case. Witness had some difficulty in tracing it. It had apparently not been delivered to any responsible employee of the Harbour Board, but had been placed on the dumping ground, whither witness had it traced. Mr. Simpson made a written report to witness. This had been mislaid, and could not now be found.

[De Villiers, C.J., directed that a further search should be made for this report during the lunch interval.]

Continuing, witness said Mr. Sexton told him that it was difficult to state the exact value of the goods, as the papers had not arrived from England. Witness asked Sexton for a detailed list of the goods missing. Witness never agreed to fix a value on the articles. Witness never received a detailed list.

Mr. Close closed his case, and after Mr. Buchanan had been heard in argument, the Chief Justice intimated that it would be unnecessary to hear the argument for the defence.

[De Villiers, C. J.: The plaintiff claims damages from the defendants on the ground of short delivery of articles which the plaintiff alleged were in a certain case at the Docks when they were delivered to the defendants and were removed from the case while the case was in the possession of the defendants. The defendents do not admit that these articles were in that case, and it lies upon the plaintiff to prove that at the time when the case came into the defendant's possession these articles were in the case The best evidence of that fact would be the production of the person who put them into the case. There has been ample time—a year has elapsed—more than a year—and there have been ample opportunities to have a commission to examine the person in England who put the articles into the case. Nothing of the kind was done, and to-day, when we come to trial, not only is there no evidence that the articles alleged to be missing were put into the case, but the next best evidence is wholly wanting, viz., the invoice. But then it is stated that as the Customs authorities made no entry of short delivery all the articles must have been in the case at the time when Customs duty was paid, and that as the defendants handled the case after it left the Customs, the articles must have been taken while the case was in their possession. But if at the Customs there was the same negligence as there was on the part of the plaintiff and the defendant it is extremely likely the Customs authorities would not have done what it is assumed they would have done. A clerk from the Customs admits there is not extreme strictness there, and that such a matter as cigars, a small number in respect of which duty would be paid, would not appear as cigars, but would be added to some other item. In that way the Customs would get what they were entitled to, but it would not be necessary for the purpose of statistics to have it down very strictly. Well, of course, with such a loose practice, anything done by the Customs will not necessarily prove that these articles were there, when they passed the Customs. The Customs clerk also admits that if there was short delivery and Customs duty was not paid, it would not necessarily appear. Of course, the Customs would take good care that goods imported which did not appear on the invoice would be noted down, so that the duty would be paid on them. Then, in regard to what took place when the claims' clerk was present and the seals were broken and the boxes were opened, there is a direct conflict of testimony between Mr. Sexton and Mr. Simpson. According to Mr. Sexton, who made out this memo of what was missing he showed it to Mr. Simpson, the claims' clerk, and the claims clerk took down what he said. Now, I find there is a formal notice given by the claims clerk that the seals are not to be broken until the arrival of the claims clerk. One would expect that Mackenzie and Co. would then draw up a formal document stating what was missing, according to the invoice, and have asked the claims clerk to sign that document as a proof of what had taken place. Nothing of the kind was done. According to the claims clerk, the bill of lading was not produced. There is no proof that the goods were missing, and the Court surely cannot take this memo as proof conclusive. The defendants have also been equally careless. They did not seem to take much pains in the matter. A report is sent by the claims clerk, and that report is also missing. It lies upon the plaintiff to prove his case; although there is probably equal negligence on both sides. He has had ample time to produce the best evidence. He has not produced the next best evidence, and he relies on this pencil document, not initialled by anyone on behalf of the defendant. If that document had been verified by the signature of the defendants' claims clerk there would have been an admission on their part, which would have dispensed with the necessity of more formal proof. In the absence, however, of clear proof of the loss of the articles, the Court would not be justified in giving judgment against the defendants, and there must consequently be absolution from the instance, with costs.

MOTION.

SUSVEILA V. GARDINER AND EASTON.

Mr. Benjamin moved, as a matter of urgency, for the appointment of a commissioner to take the evidence of Mr. Ernest Storni, Consul for the Argentine Republic, in the case Susveila v. Gardiner and Easton. Mr. Storni was leaving for Johannesburg to-morrow night.

Application granted, Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers being appointed as the commissioner.

SUPREME COURT

HEYNES, MATHEW AND CO. V. BLACK AND CO. { 1903. June 20th.

Lights—Servitude—Party-wall—Interdict.

This was an application to have made absolute a rule nisi restraining the respondents from building on certain ground in Buitenkant-street, Cape Town, in such manner as to obstruct certain lights in the applicants' premises.

The affidavit of Mr. Mathew stated that petitioners were chemists and druggists carrying on a wholesale business in Cape Town and elsewhere, and in connection with the said business they acquired a three-storied store in Buitenkant-street. Abutting on two sides was ground owned by the respondents. In the respondents' title deeds a certain servitude was registered providing for lights on the south-east side of the store now owned by applicants. For many years there had been window openings in the wall overlooking the land of Joseph Black and Co., whereby light was furnished to the applicants' store. Joseph Black and Co. had pulled down their old premises, and were rebuilding, and applicants had received notice from respondents' solicitors that it was their intention to take steps to close the lights, which applicants said were protected by the said servitude. If the windows were so closed, applicants' stores would be deprived of light, and they would be seriously prejudiced, hence they prayed that respondents should be interdicted from obstructing the lights aforesaid.

Several affidavits on behalf of the respondents admitted the servitude, but stated that the windows in the south-east wall were considerably less than 8 feet from the ground level, and were thus contrary to the conditions of the servitude. It was also stated that the windows in the said wall were considerably enlarged in 1884, and a number of additional windows had been put in since the said year. It was denied that there had been a threat to interefere with any lights that were protected by the servitude. The objection of the respondents to the lights was that, owing to the nature of applicants' business, there was serious danger to the respondents' property. The wall separating respondents' property on the north-east side from applicants' was a party wall. Other deponents spoke to the increase of lights in the wall by the applicants' predecessor in title, Wm. C. Cooper.

The replying affidavit of Mr. Mathew stated that the respondents had built up all the windows, with the exception of two, on the Albertus-street side. The windows now blocked by the respondents had been in existence about five years. As to the allegation that the windows were not of the required height from the ground level, deponent could only assume that the ground level had been raised since the windows were put in.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., for the applicants; Mr. Searle, K.C., for the respondents.

Mr. Searle called their lordships' attention to the case of St. Leger v. The City Council (5 Sheil, 264).

De Villiers, C.J., however, pointed out that the cases to his mind were not on all fours.

Mr. Searle, K.C.: The case raises a very important question. The only case I have in point is St. Leger v. Town Council of Cape Town (5 Sheil, 264), where Voet (8, 2, 11) is referred to. This wall was to be a party wall, and that would have been meaningless if windows could be opened in it. See the servitude in the old title. We are entitled to build against these party walls, but must not obstruct existing lights.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Does the deed say "light" or "lights"?]

"Lights"; if it had been "light" it would have been very different.

[Maasdorp, J.: You did not object to the party wall, or to the windows?]

No; the wall was erected between 1877 and 1884.

[Kotzé, J.: Are you not estopped by your acquiescence?]

No; a negative servitude cannot be lost by mere acquiescence.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What was the object of that party wall?]

There is nothing on the record to show, but if this is a party wall, we can put a reasonable weight against it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You can build against it, provided you do not interfere with their rights.]

If they may put windows all over the wall, all our rights in the party wall go.

[Kotzé, J.: May you not have waived your rights by conduct?]

No, this is no question of acquiescence.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Might it not be better to submit the matter to arbitration?]

That would be desirable, and if the parties cannot agree, I would suggest that the matter should be decided by action.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for applicants): Under Section 20 of the Arbitration Act the Court has power to appoint an arbitrator. As to costs, we, and our predecessors in title, have been in possession since 1834. They ought not to write to us stating that they mean to take the law into their own hands. We are spoliati. They have come on our wall and blocked up our windows.

[Maasdorp, J.: A party wall?]

We do not admit that. The character of a party wall may be lost by prescription. The case of Edmeades v. Scheepers (1 Juta, 334) shows that a right may be lost by lying by.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (in reply): I cannot admit that we have not used the party wall; it has been used quite recently. They did not put it clearly that this was not a party wall. I submit that we have a fair case, and I would ask that the question of costs be allowed to stand over.

De Villiers, C.J., pointed out to counsel that the matter seemed one for arrangement between the parties themselves.

Mr. Searle agreed that it would be best to try to come to a friendly settlement. If the parties could not come to some arrangement, then the matter could be decided by the Court.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is impossible with the information before the Court to decide the rights of the parties to the property. The Court directs that an interdict be granted pending an action, but the Court suggests that, instead of fighting it out to the bitter end, the parties should come to a settlement.

Mr. Schreiner suggested that an arbitrator be appointed by the Court.

De Villiers, C.J., thought it would be better if the parties could come to a mutal arrangement. An interdict would be granted pending an action, costs of the case to stand over.

Mr. Schreiner submitted that as regards the costs, as the respondents had summarily set about blocking up the windows, they should bear the costs which were occasioned by their taking the law into their own hands.

De Villiers, C.J.: But if the Court subsequently finds that they are entitled to do what they have done?

Respondents have put the blocking obstruction before the windows.

De Villiers, C.J., pointed out that there had been no trespass. The respondents had only built against a party wall.

I question whether it is a party wall. I maintain that by prescriptive right it has ceased to be such.

Mr. Searle said that respondents had used part of the wall, and he submitted that the question was one which should stand over, as it might be found that the respondents were right. If respondents were made to pay the costs, it might be used as a lever against them that they had no case at all.

De Villiers, C.J.: The case is not perfectly clear, and it is because of that that an interdict has been granted. The fact that the wall was a party wall may have an important bearing on the result, and it is well that the question of costs should stand over.

NEL V. ESTATE NEL. { 1903. June 20th.

Joint will—Construction—Adiation.

By their joint will N. and his wife, married in community, before proceeding to the appointment of heirs, directed that on the death of the survivor the landed property should be put up to public auction between their three sons, and that the proceeds should belong to the estate of the survivor. Proceeding to the election of heirs, they nominated the children as heirs of the first dying subject to a usufruct in favour of the survivor of the entire joint estate, "and directed that upon the death of the survivor the joint estate shall be equally divided among the children." N. died first, and his wife remained in possession of the joint estate in terms of the will. By agreement between her and the three sons the landed property was sold during her life time.

Held, that on her death the proceeds formed part of the joint estate and should be divided equally among the children.

This was a special case stated arising out of a contemplated action to be brought by Johannes Abraham Nel against Elias Albertus Nel, sole executor testamentary of the estate of the late Susanna Francina Nel (born Louw), for a declaration of Court as to his rights under the said will.

The statement of the case set forth that the plaintiff was a farmer residing at Achterplaats, in the division of Calvinia, and the defendant was also a farmer, residing at Reitfontein, in the said division. The late Susanna Francina Nel (born Louw) was married to Jacobus Gideon Nel, of Reitfontein, in community of property, and in September, 1868, the said spouses executed, in Dutch, a mutual will. By the said will it was provided inter alia that all landed properties of whatever nature possessed or to be possessed by the testators, should be put up to auction after the death of the survivor, between their three sons, Jacobus Johannes Gideon, Johannes Abraham (the plaintiff), and Elias Albertus (the defendant), and that the sum or sums of money for which the said landed properties should be sold should belong to the estate of the survivor. The testators also declared in the said will that they appointed the children of the said marriage as their sole and universal heirs, and as such to all property to be relinquished by the first dying on demise, movable as well as immovable, on condition that the survivor should during his or her lifetime remain in the sole and entire possession and control of the joint estate and enjoy the usufruct and profits thereof, the said estate to be equally divided amongst the said children upon the death of the survivor. On or about January 17, 1873, the testator died, leaving the said mutual will of full force and effect, and leaving both movable and immovable property, and thereafter the testatrix, who, together with eight children of the marriage, survived the testator, proceeded as executrix under the said will to administer and distribute the said joint estate, and on or about March 21, 1874, she filed with the Master of the Supreme Court an account of such administration and distribution. Endorsed upon a copy of the said account was the following declaration in Dutch, signed by the said eight children of the marriage: "We, the undersigned heirs in the estate of the late Jacobus Gideon Nel, declare to have examined and found correct the annexed account, as also to have received from the executrix in this estate the shares of inheritance due to us, for which we hereby discharge her from all further claim and responsibility." The testatrix duly received and enjoyed the share awarded to her in the distribution of the said joint estate, and having paid the shares awarded to the eight children, remained in the full and undisturbed possession, enjoyment and control of the remainder of the said estate until such time as her possession thereof was affected by the events and in the manner hereinafter referred to. On or about December 29, 1877, the testatrix being unable to keep in proper order or repair the farms and buildings thereon, which constituted the landed properties in the said estate, agreed with her three sons that, instead of waiting until after her death, the said properties should be sold to the highest bidder of the three sons on the said 29th day of December, 1877. The said properties were accordingly put up to auction on the said date, and were duly sold to the defendant for the sum of £1,535, the said sale being ratified on or about April 1, 1878, by the three sons. On or about September 22, 1880, the said properties were duly transferred to the defendant, who, on the same date, passed a deed of hypothecation in favour of the testatrix upon the said properties for the amount of the said purchase price. On or about December 10, 1886, the testatrix made, in Dutch, another will, whereby she revoked all previous testamentary acts, gave and bequeathed to the defendant the sum of £800, and, further, nominated all her said children as her sole and universal heirs, and appointed the defendant as her executor. Thereafter, on or about February 18, 1899, the testatrix executed, in Dutch, a codicil to the said last-mentioned will, whereby, in addition to the said sum of £800, she bequeathed as a free gift to the defendant, a further sum equal to the amount of interest which he might be owing to her at the time of her death upon the said deed of hypothecation, or on any other bond or bonds. On or about January 21, 1902, the testatrix died, leaving her said eight children surviving her, and leaving effects to the value of £1,598 10s., as shown in the inventory framed by the defendant. The sum of £1,535 secured by the said deed of hypothecation was included in the said inventory, being portion of the sum of £1,585 described therein as "cash outstanding." The testatrix was fully aware when she executed the said will and codicil thereto, and also at the time of her death, that if payment were made to the defendant after her death, of the bequests in question, such payment would have to come almost entirely out of the proceeds of the sale of the said properties. The questions which the parties were desirous of having determined were whether under the circumstances the said will and codicil were valid and effectual in so far as the bequests therein made to the defendant were concerned, and whether the defendant in his capacity as executor of the testatrix was entitled to give effect to such bequests out of the proceeds of the said properties.

The plaintiff's contention was that the testatrix had no right or power by the execution of the testamentary acts referred to, to revoke or alter in any respect the joint disposition of the said joint estate as it was provided for in the said mutual will: that the said will and codicil constituted such an alteration, as aforesaid, and were, therefore, null and of no force or effect in so far as the bequests to the defendant therein contained were concerned; and that the defendant in his capacity as executor of the testatrix was bound to distribute the proceeds of the said properties without making any deduction therefrom in respect of the said bequests contained in the said will and codicil, and that the plaintiff as one of the heirs, was entitled in the said distribution to his full one-eighth share of such proceeds without any deduction as aforesaid.

The defendant contended that the proceeds of the sale of the landed properties were by the joint will directed to belong to the estate of the survivor and not to the joint estate; that the survivor was entitled by her last will and codicil to dispose at her pleasure of the proceeds of the said landed properties; and that the bequests made by the survivor in her said will and codicil were valid and effectual against the proceeds of the said landed properties.

The parties, therefore, prayed for judgment upon their respective contentions, with costs out of the estate of the testatrix.

Mr. Burton (for plaintiff): The documents referred to show that in this case the points which the Court is asked to decide lie within a very small compass. See the will as to the disposal of the property and the election of heirs. The question is whether, the landed property having been disposed of in the lifetime of the survivor, she was entitled to dispose of the proceeds. The plaintiff holds that there was a massing of the joint estate under the mutual will. The survivor accepted benefits under the will and the plaintiff says that therefore she could not dispose of any part of the joint estate.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Was the money paid out to the heirs?]

Yes; but the survivor remained in full possession of the landed property for some four years, and thereby accepted benefits under the will. The accounts do not deal with the landed property, and she had no right to deal with it save in terms of the will. She, however, makes a free gift of whatever interest was owing on the mortgage bond, which represented the landed property.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for defendant) I call attention to the fact that the pre legacies of the farm are inconsistent with the subsequent language of the testatrix used in making the general bequest. In such a case, preference must be given to the pre-legacies, and because they are specific in detail effect must be given to them. The purchase price of the farm never formed part of the joint estate. The intention of the testators was clearly to provide for the survivor, and the price of the ground did not come into her estate till her death. The will ordered that the land should be sold on the death of the survivor, and the money was to go into her estate; and hence she could dispose of it by will. Something has been made of the supposed adiation of the survivor, but there was no adiation. She never took the usufruct of the property, and she divided the estate among the children. The plaintiff signed a document which shows that he resigned all right to the money for which the property was sold.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The whole question turns upon the construction of the will.]

Surely the legal point as to adiation must be considered?

[Maasdorp, J.: Why did the survivor remain in possession?]

The will said she was to do so.

[Maasdorp, J.: Then she adiated.]

She remained in possession of land which had been taken out of the joint estate. The case of Watson v. Burchell (9 Juta, 2) does not go so far as to say that by taking half the joint estate a spouse is debarred from accepting a prelegacy. The heirs fully discharged the survivor from all further claims, and therefore they could not impeach her will. The children acquiesced in our construction of the will, and yet the plaintiff now wishes to impeach that will.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is impossible to say that the will was very clearly worded. We find in this will, as in so many of the Dutch wills that come before the Court for construction, that the testators have used very vague and ambiguous language, and it becomes the duty of the Court, upon consideration of the whole will and the terms used in different parts of the will, to decide what the testators really meant. In the present case there is, first of all, the clause which is referred to as the pre-legacy clause, in which the testators express the desire "that all landed properties now possessed by us, or which may yet be possessed by us, whether farms, houses, or of whatever nature, shall be put up to public auction after the death of the survivor between our three sons in such manner as the executor or executrix of the estate of the survivor shall deem fit, and the sum or sums of money for which the said landed property shall be sold shall belong to the estate of the survivor of us." Then comes the further clause by which the testators appoint the heirs. They appoint as heirs the children, and then there is this provision: "It is our express wish and desire that the survivor of us shall have the power and right to keep the entire joint estate under his or her sole and entire direction and administration, and to remain in full and undisturbed possession thereof, and in the enjoyment of usufruct," and so on, and "upon the death of the survivor of us, the joint estate shall be equally divided amongst our aforesaid children, who shall then be living." The joint estate here referred to is the joint estate which has just been mentioned, the "entire joint estate." Included in that joint estate was undoubtedly all the landed property, and it would include the estate also of the survivor, which formed part of that joint estate, and therefore the mere fact that the proceeds of the farm were to be given to the estate of the survivor would not prevent the operation of the further clause that the whole of the joint estate, including, of course, the estate of the survivor, should be distributed as directed. Then it is said that the children during her lifetime received their share of the paternal inheritance, and that the plaintiff, who was one of them, is now foreclosed from putting forward this claim, but the receipt which has been put in is only a receipt in respect of the account in the administration upon which the sums coming to the children appear. In that account the farms do not appear at all, and inasmuch as these farms were to be kept by the survivor, and only to be sold after the death of the survivor, it is impossible to hold that, because the children expressed their acquiescence in that account, they are to be foreclosed from saying: "Now that the survivor is dead, and the money is to be distributed, we are entitled to claim what the will gives us." It is unnecessary to enter into the question of adiation, because if the will is to receive the construction which might and ought to be put upon it, it appears to me that the survivor has acted under the will, she has had the whole of the farms in her possession during her lifetime, and she has, therefore, had the full benefit of the will. But counsel for the defendant also relies upon the terms of the agreement signed by the three brothers on the 1st day of April, 1878. By that document the previous will is recognised; it is recognised as binding upon all parties. It does not appear whether the testatrix herself was a party to it, but I suppose she must have been aware of the document of 1878, where the joint will is recognised as binding. In that document they say: "We approve and ratify the same on condition that the said purchase price shall be secured by first mortgage on the said properties, and that the money shall be paid into the estate of our said mother upon the death of our said mother." There was a condition made, but it must have been made in their favour. It would only be a condition in their own favour if ultimately, when the distribution of the survivor's estate comes to be made, the survivor's estate is treated as part of the joint estate, and the money is paid out. For these reasons, I am of opinion that although something might be said in behalf of the defendant, the reasonable construction of the will is that which the plaintiff contends for, and judgment, therefore, must be for the plaintiff. Judgment will be in terms of the plaintiff's contentions, with costs out of the joint estate.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

TRIAL CAUSES.

WOLTERS V. GOODMAN. { 1903. June 22nd.

Brokerage.

This was an action brought by F. C. Wolters, who is a licensed broker carrying on business in Cape Town, to recover £87 10s., with interest a tempore morae, as brokerage upon the sale of a house on behalf of the defendant, also of Cape Town.

The declaration stated that on or about the 17th October, 1902, the defendant employed the plaintiff as broker, and instructed him to negotiate the sale of a certain property for £3,500. The defendant, in consideration thereof, agreed to pay to the plaintiff, in the event of the said house and ground being sold, the customary and usual brokerage, 2½ per cent. on the purchase price, and the plaintiff entered upon the employment, advertising the property widely, and expending time and labour. Thereafter, the plaintiff, in the course of his said employment, introduced one Lewis as purchaser of the property to the defendant, and subsequently in November, 1902, and in consequence of the said advertisements, introduction, and labour, the said property was sold to the said Lewis for £3,500. Plaintiff thereupon became, and was now, entitled to the sum of £87 10s. as brokerage in respect of the sale, which sum was a reasonable remuneration. The defendant refused to pay this sum. The plaintiff prayed for judgment for £87 10s., with interest a tempore morae and costs of suit.

The defendant's plea admitted the formal allegations. The property in question, he said, belonged to his wife, to whom he was married without community of property. An arrangement was entered into between the plaintiff and other brokers if any one of them effected the sale, such broker was to be paid the usual brokerage of 2½ per cent. He said he had no knowledge of, and he did not admit plaintiff's allegations as to his entering upon the employment and advertising and so forth. It was not customary to pay brokers any remuneration if no sale were effected by them, and no such agreement was made between the parties. The defendant admitted that the said property was, on the 26th November, 1902, sold to one Lewis for £3,500, but he denied that the said sale was effected directly or indirectly through the agency, introduction, or advertisements of the plaintiff, and said it was effected solely through the work of one Fisher. He admitted that he refused to pay brokerage.

The replication was general.

Mr. Upington for plaintiff; Mr. Buchanan for defendant.

Mr. Upington remarked that the sole issue seemed to be whether the sale was effected through the introduction of the plaintiff or through the agency of the broker Fisher.

F. C. Wolters (plaintiff) said that in the month of October last the defendant approached him with regard to the property. The defendant put down the figure at £3,750, giving witness a margin of £250. If witness succeeded in disposing of the property for £3,500, he was to have his usual commission of 2½ per cent. Witness was told that if he promised to advertise the property, he would be the only broker to have the right to dispose of it. Four insertions were put in the "Cape Times," and witness interviewed several clients, amongst others, Mrs. Lewis. On the 17th November Mrs. Lewis was given a list of properties in the vicinity of the South African College, including the one in question. On the 24th November Professor Lewis called and asked for a card to view "Effenburen" from the inside. He mentioned that the price was rather high, but witness said that he could come down on £3,750. The same day witness wrote to the defendant, who had instructed him to send all letters to his wife's address while he was out of town. On the 16th December witness met the defendant in St. George's-street, and he seemed very much annoyed when witness asked him who purchased the property. The defendant refused to divulge the purchaser's name. Fisher's name was not mentioned. Witness subsequently discovered that the property was sold to Professor Lewis on the 26th November. Witness knew nothing of other brokers, and understood that he had sole control of the property. On the 12th December witness wrote to the defendant enclosing his account, and asking for a cheque for £87 10s. On the 15th December defendant's attorneys, replying to a letter of demand sent by the plaintiff's attorneys, stated that the defendant instructed them that the property had been introduced to Professor Lewis by one Fisher.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: The defendant had known witness for a long time, and had put a lot of business in his way. The defendant gave him a net and a sale price, and witness was positive of £3,750. The usual meaning of "net" was that, if possible, the brokerage was to be paid by the purchaser. The defendant told witness that there were no other brokers concerned in the property. The custom prevailing was that the broker who sold the property got the brokerage. Witness took up the position that he was the first person who introduced the property to Mrs. or Professor Lewis, and he admitted that if he was not the broker who first introduced the purchaser he would have no claim. Mrs. Lewis called three times at witness's office. Witness did not notice the property advertised by other brokers. Professor Lewis called and inquired particularly about "Effenburen." He asked whether it was still for sale, and said he would like to see it inside. The first intimation witness had of the sale of the property was from Mrs. Goodman's letter. Subsequently, witness met Mr. Goodman in the street, and was informed that Professor Lewis was the purchaser.

By Kotzé, J.: Witness's instruction from the seller was to sell for £3,500 net. The seller required to be paid £3,500. and if the property realised this, witness would have to get commission from the buyer if he could. Witness did not at any time tell Professor Lewis that he would be liable for the commission.

Mr. Upington closed his case.

For the defence,

Alexander Goodman, the defendant, was called. Witness stated that about October 17 he gave the property to Wolters for sale. He had given the property to other brokers, including Mr. Fisher, Mr. Steer, Sibbett, and Stephen, Mr. Cohen, and Mr. Herbert. He made no special agreement with Wolters. It was incorrect to say that he had given the property solely to Wolters to sell. The price was to be £3,500 net; there was no mention of brokerage or commission. He paid no brokerage; Mr. Fisher got his charges from the purchaser. Mr. Wolters had not asked him if he gave the property to any other broker. He then went up-country, where, on November 26, he received a wire from Mr. Fisher stating that the property had been sold for £3,500 net, purchaser paying brokerage. Witness telegraphed to his wife.

Mr. Upington objected to the latter telegram being put in.

The Court held that it was not evidence.

On December 6 he returned to town, and met the plaintiff, whom he told that the property had been sold. He received no letter stating that a viewing order had been issued to Professor Lewis.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He did not remember telling plaintiff anything about Fisher; he thought it unimportant. He did not remember asking Wolters to advertise the property; it was probable that he did so. He never saw the letter of November 24, which Mr. Wolters stated he sent him apprising him of having issued an order to view the property. He was away at the time, but his wife would have opened the letter and sent it on. With regard to some land at Somerset Strand he had made an arrangement with Wolters to allow him commission if he sold the ground for £1,000. Afterwards, he saw the property listed in Wolters' books at £1,200. On pointing out this to Wolters he remarked to witness that that was a common practice, and witness then agreed to accept £1,000 net for the land.

Mrs. Goodman, wife of the last witness, denied the receipt of a letter from Wolters on the 24th November to the effect that Professor Lewis had been given a viewing order. On the 25th November witness gave her husband's address to Fisher, and on the 26th November she received a communication from her husband. Next day she wrote to all the brokers her husband had employed, informing them that the property had been sold. Witness did not know to whom the property had been sold until she received the broker's note from Fisher.

Professor Charles Edward Lewis stated that he purchased the property, Effenburen, through Mr. Fisher. There was a house in Fisher's list at £3,500, but he could not say if it was Effenburen, as he took no particular notice. He received a number of property lists from Mrs. Lewis. On Monday, November 24, he called on Mr. Wolters, about two houses in Faure-street. Mr. Wolters told him Mrs. Lewis had been there a few minutes before. He received no viewing order. He could not have asked Wolters if Effenburen was still in the market, as he did not at that time know of its existence. With Mrs. Lewis he visited the houses in Faure-street, which were unsuitable. Coming away from Faure-street, he and Mrs. Lewis saw the outside of Effenburen. He asked Mrs. Lewis where he could get an order to view, and he immediately proceeded to Mr. Fisher's, where he received the order. He went back by tram to Effenburen, saw the interior, and returning to Fisher's, concluded the purchase.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He had never had any business transactions with Fisher. He instructed Mrs. Lewis to see Fisher, as witness not knowing any other brokers, thought that Fisher would protect his interests. Mrs. Lewis also called on the plaintiff, and brought witness a list of properties, including Effenburen. Witness was prepared to say that Mrs. Lewis had not put the lists before him. When witness heard of Effenburen, he immediately asked Mrs. Lewis on whose list she got it first, and she replied "Fisher's." He did not remember seeing the document from Wolters, and when he spoke of the prices he was comparing them with what Mrs. Lewis had told him. Witness paid Fisher the brokerage. Witness did not receive any viewing orders from Wolters.

Re-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He never considered the purchase of Effenburen until he visited it with Mrs. Lewis.

Mrs. Lewis, wife of Professor Lewis, stated that she visited Mr. Fisher before she visited any other broker. That was before she called on the plaittiff. On Fisher's list Effenburen appeared at £3,500. Her husband said that that price was out of the question. She had called on other brokers, and Effenburen appeared on almost every list.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: She called on Wolters for viewing orders for the properties in Faure-street because they appeared on his list at a lower rate. She saw the plaintiff twice after she called on Fisher. Her husband never troubled about the lists, and when she mentioned £3,750, Professor Lewis said that the sum was too high. If she said £3,750 it was a mistake, as she meant £3,500.

Re-examined by Mr. Buchanan: She only discussed with her husband the properties of from £2,000 to £2,500.

By Maasdorp, J.: Professor Lewis had not a viewing order from the plaintiff in his possession.

Adolph Fisher, broker, said that in the early part of October Mr. Goodman gave him the property for sale. Early in November Mrs. Lewis called on him with reference to property in the vicinity of the South African College, and witness recommended "Effenburen" very strongly and gave her a list of other properties. On the 24th November Mrs. Lewis and Professor Lewis were given an order to view the house.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: Between the first interview and the 24th November Mrs. Lewis had not been at his office about the properties. He was aware that other brokers had the property in hand.

Mr. Upington having been heard in argument, the Court intimated that it was unnecessary to hear counsel for the defence.

Maasdorp, J.: In this case the plaintiff seeks to recover from the defendant a sum of £87 10s. as commission due to him upon the sale of a property belonging to the defendant for the sum of £3,500, commission being reckoned at 2½ per cent. upon this price. The plaintiff and the defendant agree that the property that was sold was placed by the defendant in the hands of the plaintiff for sale, and the plaintiff was instructed to sell this property for £3,500 net. It might have been of importance to decide what construction was to be placed upon the term "net" used in the contract. The plaintiff says that it was stipulated that the property was to be sold for £3,500 net, and he expected that there would be no reduction for charges on that amount. We find an entry in the plaintiff's book, which corroborates the defendant's statement, which there states that the property had been placed in his hands to sell for £3,750 or for £3,500 net. Now, the ordinary construction of these words would be that the plaintiff had instructions to sell the property for £3,500, which sum the defendant was to receive without deduction of any charges or expenses of any kind. The plea rather causes a difficulty in this matter, because it is admitted there that the commission was to be paid by the defendant, and I must say that that admission upon the plea would have caused great difficulty if the Court had now to decide whether the commission was to be paid by the seller or by the purchaser in this case. In the view I take of the case upon the evidence, it will be unnecessary to decide that point. We have now to decide whether this sale was brought about through the efforts and agency of the plaintiff, and whether he is, consequently, entitled to his commission upon it. If we take the evidence as given by the plaintiff, he has made out a fairly strong case, because he says that when Mrs. Lewis came to see him on the first occasion he mentioned to her the different properties he had for sale, and gave her a list, including this property, and that, subsequently, when she came to see him again, he gave her two viewing orders for two other properties, and shortly after he had done so Mr. Lewis came to see him and specially requested him to let him have a viewing order for this particular property, "Effenburen," and, upon Mr. Lewis's request to provide him with a viewing order, a letter was addressed to Mrs. Hofmeyr, who occupied the premises at the time. That certainly would show, if it is taken to be correct, that efforts were used by the plaintiff to sell this property, and to find a seller, and it would almost seem, if the case rested there, that this viewing order which was given on the 24th November must have been the one which was acted upon by Mr. Lewis upon his inspecting the premises. But, unfortunately for the plaintiff, his case is unsupported by the evidence of any other witness, or by documentary evidence. In referring to the documentary evidence adduced by the plaintiff, it seems that the documents are not of such a character as to afford any support to his case. He states that he gave Professor Lewis this viewing order, and he certainly, at one time, left the impression on my mind that he put in a document which was a copy of that viewing order. The document that was put in is marked as a copy, and it certainly impressed me very strongly as an important document, because, if it actually was a copy, the plaintiff must have had in his possession at the time the original from which he copied it, and if he could have established that point I think he would have gone very far to show that he had actually given Professor Lewis a viewing order. That evidence entirely breaks down, because it appears he merely from memory wrote out a document as the probable contents of some document he alleges he handed to Professor Lewis. Then there is a letter which also might have been of great assistance to him if it was substantiated. That is the document put in which purports to be a copy of the letter written at the time to Mrs. Goodman informing her that a viewing order had been given to Professor Lewis. That letter was never received by Mrs. Goodman, and one would have expected that if it had been written she would have received it. And here again this letter is put in as a copy of what was sent to Mrs. Goodman, and upon inquiry it turns out it was merely written from a recollection which plaintiff had of what that document contained. In these circumstances the plaintiff is unsupported by other witnesses, or by any document which he has put in. Now, when we refer to the evidence for the defence it is of importance to inquire what view the purchaser took as to the introduction he received, either to the seller or the property in question. We have it from Mr. Lewis that he did not purchase the property through any efforts used by the plaintiff. He denies absolutely that he received any viewing order from the plaintiff in this case, and I think the conflict of evidence upon that point is very important, and the decision on that point will go largely to decide this case. On the one side we have the statement of the plaintiff that he gave Mr. Lewis this viewing order, and on the other side, the contradiction of Mr. Lewis, and I must say, considering all the circumstances of this case, I cannot help coming to the conclusion that I must accept the evidence of Mr. Lewis, and that this viewing order was never given by the plaintiff to Mr. Lewis. If we decide that point against the plaintiff, it would go very far to upset the rest of his evidence, for if the viewing order is once set aside, the only efforts which the plaintiff exercised in this matter was handing a list of these different properties to Mrs. Lewis, and we hear from Mrs. Lewis that that is no more than several other agents, who include Mr. Fisher, have done. She had been to several other agents, and these agents had, all of them, mentioned "Effenburen" as a property for sale. When it was first mentioned by Mr. Fisher, she would not entertain the question at all, and consequently it could not be considered that in the first instance Mr. Fisher actually introduced her to Goodman, or was the means of bringing her to conclude the purchase of this property. Whenever this property was mentioned by the other brokers, it was set aside as a matter which could not be entertained, and that was the effect it had on the minds of Mr. and Mrs. Lewis after the interview with Mr. Wolters. While they were inspecting the two other properties, the matter arose in Mrs. Lewis's mind again, not through anything that had been done by Mr. Wolters, but simply because she was then in the neighbourhood of the property, and what brought it to her mind was that it had been mentioned by several brokers and several people as a desirable property, and there was then a good opportunity for Mr. Lewis to see the property. One would have fancied if they had the viewing order of plaintiff in their possession, they would have gone forthwith and inspected it. When Mrs. Lewis mentioned the property again, she referred to Fisher as a likely person to put the whole matter through for her, and they thereupon went to Fisher to get a viewing order for the property, which they could have seen without going to Fisher if they had had the plaintiff's viewing order in their possession. Under all the circumstances of this case, I come to the conclusion that the plaintiff had done nothing more than several other brokers in this case, and what they had done did not tend to an introduction of the purchaser to Mr. Goodman, or negotiations to bring about the purchase. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that what really brought about the sale of this property was the general information which Mrs. Lewis seemed to possess at that time, and which induced her to go to Mr. Fisher, and through the instrumentality of Mr. Fisher, brought about the sale subsequently. The plaintiff is not entitled to any commission in the matter, and judgment will be given for the defendant, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZÉ.]

MCKENZIE AND CO. v. THE "HYDASPES." — 1903, June 23rd, " 24th, " 29th

Coal—Discharge—Custom of the port—Negligence.

The plaintiffs sued the defendant in respect of damage by breakage done to a certain cargo of house coal occasioned by its having been negligently delivered into lighters by means of shoots and not in bags according to the alleged custom of the port.

Held, that as neither the custom of the port nor injury to the coal done by the mode of discharge had been sufficiently proved, and as discharge of coal by shoots was no evidence of negligence; judgment must be given for the defendant with costs.

This was an action for £250 damages, alleged to have been sustained through the improper delivery of a cargo of house coal consigned to the plaintiffs.

The declaration set forth that by order of this Court there was an attachment of the S.S. Hydaspes granted, but it was not put into execution, as security was given. On or about the 24th October, 1902, the plaintiff company entered into a contract with the defendant, by which a certain cargo of house coal was to be conveyed from the Port of Glasgow to the Port of Cape Town, according to a bill of lading. The coal, then in a fit and proper and merchantable condition, was received and brought in the steamship to Cape Town. The defendant undertook to deliver the coal in like good order and merchantable condition from the ship's tackle. The customary, usual, and proper manner of delivering house coal was in bags, but, contrary to the customary, usual and proper manner, the defendant did not deliver the said coal in such like condition, but, through his servants and agents, by having it shot or thrown down from the ship's side, the coal was greatly broken in pieces and damaged: large quantities of it becoming practically useless and unmerchantable. The defandant was warned against this manner of delivering the coal, but persisted therein. The plaintiff claimed £500 damages and costs of suit.

The defendant's plea admitted the contract, and said that the coal was received on board the steamer in the usual manner by being tipped from coal trucks from a considerable height direct into the hold. He admitted the allegations as to the delivery of the coal in like good order and condition, but referred to the bill of lading, and said that the coal was in a diligent, lawful, and proper manner discharged from the ship into lighters lying alongside, the work being done by the Harbour Board, who were necessarily engaged according to the custom of the port. Defendant admitted that the coal was frequently delivered in bags at this port, but he denied that it was the only and proper mode of delivering house coal. He denied negligence, and specially denied any liability to the plaintiffs. The coal was discharged into the lighters from the ship in like good order and condition as that in which it was received, and was not more broken than it naturally would be, having regard to the condition of the coal when received, and the manner of unloading the ship. He denied that the plaintiffs had sustained any damage through his mode of delivery.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Buchanan) for plaintiffs. Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Benjamin), for defendant.

Mr. Schreiner applied for leave to amend paragraph 8 of the plea by adding after "specially denies that he is liable." the words "under the bill of lading." and adding at the end of the paragraph, "or by any act or negligence whatsoever of the stevedores in the loading, towing, unloading, or delivery of the coal."

No objection was raised, and the plea was amended accordingly.

Sir H. Juta said that the issues raised were that plaintiffs said that the coal was received on board at the port of Glasgow in a proper and merchantable condition. The defendant did not admit that. Evidence was taken on commission in Glasgow, and would be read to the Court, but he would submit that it amounted to this—that the coal was loaded in the usual way in which coal was loaded at Glasgow, that the vessel arrived here, and that the captain or his agents appointed the Harbour Board as his stevedores. The plea said that the Harbour Board was "necessarily engaged according to the custom of the port to effect such discharge." The evidence would be that in stevedoring the ship could employ any stevedores that it pleased.

Mr. Schreiner: That is so.

Sir H. Juta said that that was an error. The vessel arrived here, and the captain engaged the Harbour Board as stevedores. The discharge began in this way. The ship was a very big one, and she had some coal for the Railway Department. This coal was discharged in bags into trucks on the quay. On the other side of the ship were lighters in the water, and the ship brought the coal out from the hold, and then had a chute from the deck projecting out, from whence it was shot for a distance of 30 feet or more into the lighters. As the lighter was filled in one place, it was moved about, so that the coal was continually dropping into it. That was the mode of discharge from the ship that was complained of. The result was that a large part of the cargo could not be sold as house coal, and had to be sold as dross. Half of the cargo was in a fit and merchantable condition, and realised the full price. Instead of the amount set down in the declaration, the damages should be set down at £250. On 50 per cent. of the coal the price realised was 30s. to 32s. 6d. per ton, instead of 52s. 6d., which was the market price for house coal.

Hermanus Johannes Niehouse, manager of the sales department of the plaintiff's firm, stated that he had been two years with the firm, and during that time they had imported large quanties of coal from Glasgow. Up to the present they had never received any coal in the same condition as the coal in question. Witness went down to the Docks to see about the coal from the Hydaspes early in December. There were about forty tons in the lighter. He found the coal being lifted up in a basket, which was swung round to an iron chute and dropped down about 30 feet into the lighter below. The lighter was shifted along in order to get filled. They were discharging coal in bags on he other side of the ship. For the purposes of sale, house coal should be in lumps, and when it got broken up, it was useless for the purposes of sale. The usual way of discharging house coal was to fill the bags in the hold, and lower them on to the quay side. He had never seen house coal shot down into lighters. Witness saw the coal when it was in the basket, and it was then in a good condition. If the coal had been in a bad condition, the matter would have been reported, He did not see the captain on board, and he immediately reported the matter to his employers. When the coal was delivered at the store it was very fine, and they had to screen it. Out of the 500 tons they got about 250 tons of good stuff, which they sold at 52s. 6d. The rest was disposed of for 30s. and 32s. 6d. The plaintiffs lost £1 a ton on all the fine stuff. The coal was brought to the stores in bags. They had never received any coal in such a broken, damaged condition as that of the Hydaspes. He watched the coal dropping from the chute and becoming smashed up as it rebounded off the lighter's side.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He would not be surprised to know that the chute was thirteen feet long. He would swear that the drop was more than twenty feet. He had never seen coal shot into lighters. He could not remember complaining to Mr. Seddon that the wind was blowing the dust of the coal about. He was on his oath, and he could not repeat what he said to Mr. Seddon. He might have complained of the dust blowing about. He had no knowledge that McKenzies had previously used chutes to discharge coal. Roughly speaking, he had sold from 250 to 300 tons of the best coal, and from 250 to 280 tons of the other. Fifteen tons were sold to Bordsiens, which was not a branch of McKenzies, at 47s. 6d., but that was unscreened coal. He could not say what the coal cost them freight paid at Cape Town. He could not say that Cheese was a branch firm of McKenzies. The plaintiff firm had no interest in the firm of Cheese, to whom the coal was sold at 41s. a ton. Fifty-six tons were sent to Cheese direct from the Docks. That would make 420 tons that were delivered to the plaintiff's firm. He could only explain the statement that he had disposed of from 250 to 300 tons of one class and from 250 to 280 of the other class by the probability that the Harbour Board scales were incorrect. He must have got more from the ship, as it very often happened that they got from thirty to forty tons over from the ship. The coal was not by any means in the same condition in the lighter as it was in the basket.

Re-examined by Sir Henry Juta: Five hundred English tons equalled 560 Colonial tons.

Wm. Beattie, a director of McKenzie and Co., Ltd., said that he had many years' experience of shipping coal. Their agents in Glasgow often shipped the same class of coal as that of the Hydaspes. He had 22 years' experience of delivering coal at the Docks. He had never seen house coal shot down into lighters. When witness saw it in the stores it was more like dross than house coal. In consequence of a report by Mr. Niehouse, witness went down to the Docks. There would have been a drop of twenty feet from the chute into the lighter. The coal was in a good condition in the basket. Had he seen it in the basket in the condition it arrived at the store he would have had a survey. Witness complained to the captain that the coal was being destroyed, and the captain rather agreed with him. The captain had said that Mitchell Cotts and Co. were the agents, and that he had nothing to do with the stevedores, who were put there by the agents. Witness reported the matter to Mr. Sexton, who went to see Mitchell Cotts and Co. The captain admitted that the coal was being handled improperly.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The captain told him he would go up to Mitchell Cotts and Co. about the matter. He believed he told Mr. Sexton that the captain had said that the coal was not being properly treated. He never saw house coal discharged by chutes in the docks or in the bay while McKenzies were in the docks. He had seen steam coal so discharged. The only purpose for which McKenzies used chutes was for coaling ships' bunkers. Witness could not say what was the present custom of the port in this respect for the past two years. He certainly maintained that the coal was broken by the fall into the lighter. There was a great difference between the coal in the baskets and that in the lighter. There were other means by which the coal could have been discharged. The coal could have been landed on the quay and stacked in bags. Witness did not object to the coal being lightered, but it was the manner in which it was done which he took exception to. Had the coal been lowered into the lighter in bags or baskets it would have been all right. He had heard no complaints of the method of discharging by bags in use in McKenzies' time. McKenzies sold coal by Colonial tons.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: Up to two years ago witness, with Mr. Dent, was in joint charge of the stevedoring at the Docks.

By Maasdorp, J.: There would, in the ordinary way, have been about 10 per cent. of fine coal in the cargo.

By Kotzé, J.: McKenzies used in their time to supply the bags for discharging.

William Keegan, member of the firm of Wilson, Son and Co., of Cape Town, said he had had a considerable experience in regard to the importation of coal. Witness saw the coal of the Hydaspes in the store. He knew the class of coal; it was a good house coal. Witness had never known house coal to be discharged by chutes. It was not the custom of the port to discharge house coal by chutes. Witness was not aware that the Harbour Board did so. He had seen the Harbour Board discharging house coal in bags. Witness saw this coal on the 9th January. He found it exceptionally small. Witness had never seen coal in anything like the condition. His firm was constantly having coal from Glasgow. The usual percentage of dross was about 12½. Witness saw two heaps of this coal. In the one there was about 30 to 35 per cent. of lump; in the other—the larger—about 40 per cent. There were no big lumps. People would not buy this small coal. The ruling price in November was about 52s. 6d.; the bad stuff was worth about 30s.

Mr. Schreiner asked to have the other witness recalled, so that he might be examined as regards the inspection of the coal mentioned by Mr. Keegan.

Hermanus Johannes Niehouse, recalled, stated that the screening was commenced on the 18th December, and was finished on the 11th February.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Witness did not identify the coal as that of the Hydaspes to Mr. Keegan, but there was no other coal in the store. He could not account for the coal being classed in two different heaps when Mr. Keegan saw it.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: When the coal was screened the dross was put to the one side. What Mr. Keegan saw was not dross that had come from the Hydaspes mixed with the house coal.

The witness Keegan was recalled, and under cross-examination by Mr. Schreiner, he stated it was only when they dug into the heaps that they found lumps of coal. To all outside appearances it was dross. He did not know that coal was discharged with chutes. He found the coal in heaps in Hyland's stores, and he was aware that it had been sent up in bags.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: He was quite clear that the coal he saw was house coal.

Frank Bishop, broker, said that for many years he was Dock Superintendent for the Union Company up till the amalgamation with the Castle S.S. Co. It was only in cases of emergency that they used chutes to discharge coal. In the ordinary course of business they would object to that mode of discharge. He had never known of house coal being discharged by chutes. The ordinary way of discharging house coal was to pack it in bags and lift it from the hold.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: At present he was a broker, and had nothing to do with the discharge of coal. He ceased to have anything to do with coal before McKenzie's work was taken over by the Harbour Board. He was not aware that McKenzie's had chutes; in fact, they borrowed chutes from the Union Company. Even steam coal was not usually discharged by chutes. Within recent years chutes were only used under special circumstances. Generally speaking, the bags were emptied into the lighters. If the bags were dropped down a chute there would not be the same breakage as if loose coal was shot down. There was more breakage through using chutes than trucks. Ten or twelve per cent. was a fair average of the amount of coal broken through discharging by bags, and about double that amount would meet the loss through chutes. Trimming was not usually carried out on lighters.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: Since the war pressure lightering had been on the increase, and for some fifteen years lighters had been used in discharge.

William Dent, coaling superintendent for the Union-Castle Co., stated that steam coal was never discharged through chutes except when it was impossible to discharge by bags. He had never known of house coal being discharged by chutes; he considered it an improper way.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: McKenzies had got chutes about the time of the war, but these were used in coaling ships. All coal put into the bunkers was shot down through chutes, either on deck or at the ship's side.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: He had twenty years' practical experience of discharging coal in Table Bay.

Warren Bradford Sexton, one of the managers of Messrs. McKenzies, stated that he had experience of the Docks. His firm imported house coal. He had never seen house coal discharged except in bags. On a report from Mr. Niehouse, he went to Mitchell Cotts and Co. He told a gentleman there, whom he now believed was Mr. Cotts, that the coal was being discharged by chute from the Hydaspes. He was told that the matter would be seen to. The mode of discharge was not, however, altered, and he again called on Mitchell Cotts and Co. When the coal was delivered into the stores there was a very large percentage of fine dust in it.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He had received a letter from Captain Lee, of the Harbour Board, stating that no trucks were available for the discharge of the coal. He never saw the coal in the lighters; he did not see it until it was brought into the stores, when its condition was bad. Most of the coal for his firm came by the Clan Line steamers. Mr. Cotts promised he would remedy the matter when witness spoke to him about the chutes being used. He did not know Mr. Cotts was now out of the country.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: He thought that the Clan steamers were generally speaking as large, and as high out of the water as the Hydaspes. His firm had received coal by several of the Clan boats without the coal being inordinately damaged.

By, Kotzé, J.: Mr. Cotts certainly gave him the impression that he would have the matter of the chute remedied, although he could not remember the exact words.

Sir. H. Juta closed his case.

Mr. Schreiner called for the defence

Captain Sampson, marine superintendent of the Houston line of steamers, who said that he arrived in Cape Town on the 8th December, and the next day the plaintiffs objected to the mode of discharge from the Hydaspes. The Hydaspes was also discharging railway coal. When the vessel arrived she was from twenty to twenty-one feet out of the water. As she discharged she took in ballast, so that she never rose much out of the water. The lighter was drawing about two feet of water. Witness continuously watched the discharge of the coal. The chute and the basket were provided by the Harbour Board. The chute would be about thirteen feet long, and there would be about ten to twelve feet of a drop. After the complaint was brought to his notice he paid special attention to the coal coming up in the basket, and it struck him as being a rather small coal. There was no material difference when the coal dropped into the lighter. Witness would call it small house coal. Discharging by bags was peculiarly a Cape Town practice. Unloading by trucks was a most wasteful way of dealing with coal. A dozen of bags dropping to the lighter would undoubtedly cause more breakage than slipping the loose coal through the chute. Invariably in practice where bags were used the bags were emptied into the lighter. Once it went into the lighter the Harbour Board were the agents of the consignee. He preferred the method of discharging by chute, and in other parts of the world it was the only method he had seen. Witness never heard of any different ways of landing house and steam coal. The Harbour Board would not allow any coal to be stacked on the quay. They had no other alternative than to lighter the coal. Witness's experience was that chutes were used here when coal was lightered.

By Kotzé, J.: All the dross left in the ship's hold would be delivered to the consignees.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He had been connected with Table Bay since September last, and during that time he had dealt with about twenty coal carriers. The Hydaspes was the only ship carrying private coal that he had dealt with. The other ships had carried coal for the Railway Department, and, although the chute system was such a desirable one, they could not use it into the trucks, as there would be no trucks left.

When he arrived on the 8th December the discharging had not commenced. In consultation with the Harbour Board, it was decided to discharge the coal by chute. Witness could not be certain whether the suggestion of the chute came from him. He was anxious to release the ship, and the chute would slightly expedite matters. Mr. Cotts must have known the case was coming on when he left the Colony. The complaint was made on the 9th December, and witness consulted with the stevedore and the captain. They decided that the plaintiffs had no just cause for complaint. Witness took particular notice after the complaint, and he considered his notice more thorough than that of anyone else. He did not go down to the hold, nor did he go on board the lighter. About the time he got the letter of complaint he brought it to the notice of the stevedores. The reply stating the coal was being discharged in the usual way was the result of information obtained from people working at the Docks. Witness would call a good deal of the coal in the basket dross, and he would have called the consigness to look on at the discharge, but that he considered the complaint frivolous, in face of the fact that the coal had been dropped into a hold of thirty or thirty-five feet.

[Kotzé, J.: According to your theory, it would be difficult to obtain good house coal in Cape Town.]

Continuing, witness said that steam coal would depreciate in value when broken either through bags or a chute. The discharge by bags by the Union-Castle Co. witness would consider a stupid policy. Witness added: It is an antiquated method that has continued here from the days of sailing ships.

Sir H. Juta: It is a stupid method?

Witness: Yes, I think so, and I believe men from other parts of the world think so too.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: It was impossible to discharge the coal on the quay, and they had to use a lighter. Personally, witness did not see Mr. McKenzie's objections. It was never suggested that any remedy would be put into force. Steam coal depreciated more in value when broken than house coal.

By Maasdorp, J.: If he had thought the discharge obviously wrong, he would at once have stopped it, and substituted other methods. As marine superintendent for the company he had full control of steamers. The chute was the general method of discharge. He had seen bags used elsewhere. The captain was present during the operation, and he had the same opinion as witness with regard to this being the proper method of discharge.

Richard George Jackson, partner in the firm of Wilson, Jackson and Co., stevedores and contractors, Cape Town, stated that he had nothing to do with the case, and as a rule chutes were used on outside berths for discharge into lighters, and also with vessels lying in the bay. The discharge by chutes would entail about the same breakage as that by bags. The discharge by chutes was more expeditious.

[Kotze, J.: You are speaking from a stevedore's point of view.]

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He could not name any ships that discharged house coal by chutes. He had never seen house coal discharged into lighters; it had always been on to the quay. It was the quickest way to discharge through chutes. He would never use bags; he would use baskets, which would save him sixpence a ton on the bags. It was the quickest and the cheapest method.

Captain Attrey, master of the Courtfield, which was at present discharging coal at the Docks, said that he had been thirty years at sea, and had discharged coal in every part of the world. The chute was the general custom except in some coast ports, where you had to discharge into small lighters. The mode of discharge by bags was unusual in his experience. He had only come across that system on the Indian coast, where the coal had to be taken into small lighters in bags through the surf. He could not say that there was any difference between bags and chutes in the way coal was landed in this port; in fact, he thought the way it was done by bags at this port would cause more breakage than by the chute. He was now discharging his boat on to the quay. As to house coal, he had carried a few loads in the Mediterranean.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: The Docks here were similar to others. He had said he could not use chutes in these docks. It was a matter of the height of the dock walls. He had never discharged coal in a dock.

Sir H. Juta: So that your great experience of discharging is not discharging into docks at all?

Further cross-examined, witness said the dock walls here were very high—higher than in the Mediterranean. He should have to use a stage if he discharged by chute here. He had not previously brought a cargo of coal to this port. The last cargo of coal he had was seven years ago, when he took the cargo to a desert. He had discharged five cargoes of coal into lighters by chute in Venice. He had only had two cargoes of house coal that he had carried. He had not had any house coal discharged by bags, though he had discharged steam coal by that method.

By Maasdorp, J.: In his observation the common method was to discharge by chute.

Captain Bennett, of the St. Quintin, which was at present in the Docks with a general cargo, stated he had been twenty-two years at sea, and had been master for five years. He had discharged coal all over the world, and the coal was always discharged through chutes. He would use a chute if he had drop enough on to the quay side. A couple of months ago he discharged a cargo of house coal at Boston, where shore derricks were erected and the coal dropped through graded chutes of forty or fifty feet high into trucks below. If no berth was vacant, the same method would be applied for discharge into the lighters.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: As to carrying out by chutes where there was not enough drop, he had seen stages rigged up on the ship. He did not think it would be possible to fix up a similar method at this port. What he meant by the "graded chutes" at Boston was that the coal came through bends, and did not go down at one rush, a depth of about 40 or 50 feet. He had heard no complaints about the coal as it came out of the chute.

Sir H. Juta: I suppose you saw the coal as it came out?

Witness: Well, when there is coal about you generally get out of the way as much as possible.

Sir H. Juta: Perhaps you did not stay long enough at Boston to hear any complaints?

Witness: Well, I stayed there as long as the ship did.

Sir H. Juta: Yes, but as long as you and the ship remained there you received no complaints about the coal being broken?

Witness: No.

Sir H. Juta: Just one more question. Have you ever brought a cargo of coal to this port before?

Witness: No, and I hope I never will again, the way they are working it.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The last drop through the graded chute would be eight or nine feet.

By Kotzé, J.: The reason he said he hoped he would never bring a cargo of coal to this port again was on account of the very wasteful way the discharge was carried out. The bags always seemed to bump up against the ship's side; the bags became torn, and a lot of coal went overboard. They never seemed to have the correct drop.

Wm. Peter Seddon, shipping clerk, in the employ of Houston and Co., said that he had been formerly with Mitchell Cotts and Co., when they had the contract. He had had seven years shipping experience. The transference of the agency was no reflection on Mitchell Cotts and Co., as Houstons had opened their own agency. The Harbour Board would only allow discharge by bags on to the quay. McKenzies' coal was completely discharged by the 12th December. He first heard of the complaint on the morning of the 9th December. Witness had called at plaintiff's office about the discharge when Mr. Niehouse first made the complaint that a great deal of it was being wasted by the dust being blown away. There was no mention of breakage. The following morning Mr. Sexton called to see Mr. Cotts, and witness was present at the interview. Mr. Sexton complained that the coal was being damaged by being shot down into the lighter. Mr. Cotts made no promise to rectify the matter, and it was arranged that the captain should meet Mr. Beattie on board. He was unaware of any other interview. The firm attitude was taken up that the method of discharge was quite in order. He had not much practical knowledge, but he would say that there would be quite as much breakage with bags as with chutes. After the complaint he was frequently on board the Hydaspes. The stevedores appeared to be doing their work properly. The coal in the lighter was not visibly smaller than that in the basket.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: Personally, he dealt with about fifty cargoes, including several of house coal. During his experience he could not say that house coal was discharged through chutes. There was no definite system at this port. They could not discharge by chutes at the knuckle berth on account of the height of the quay. Mr. Sexton may have complained that the chutes were not the ordinary method of discharge. It was merely as a matter of etiquette that the captain should meet Mr. Beattie.

By Kotzé, J.: They might just as well have given Mr. Beattie a letter to the officer.

Further cross-examined, witness said that it was not for the purpose of looking into the matter that Mr. Cotts suggested that Mr. Beattie should go down on board wih the captain.

Theodore Seymour, a coloured stevedore, said he was working as a contractor under the Harbour Board. He discharged the coal from the Hydaspes. He first took the coal out in baskets, which were raised to the yardarm, and then put into the chute. Witness had often discharged into the lighter from a ship by chute. He had done this while employed by McKenzie. He had discharged house coal by lighter, but had not used chutes for this. When house coal had to be discharged, the people interested supplied sufficient bags to fill the lighter. Witness had known stevedores to use chutes in connection with house coal.

By Sir H. Juta: Witness first started to discharge by basket direct into the lighter, but finding this did not work well, he used the chute. Witness's instructions were to discharge by basket and chute.

By the Court: Witness was paid by the ton; so that the more quickly he discharged the sooner he got his money.

Thomas Hogan, stevedore, said he had had to do with the discharge of house coal by chute. He had so discharged the "J. G. Pendleton" in November, 1901, using the same chutes as the Harbour Board now used. There was another instance witness remembered where discharge was made by chutes. This was the "H.B.I."

By Sir H. Juta: These were the only two cases in which witness had discharged house coal. The cargoes of the two ships he had named were heated. One bound for San Francisco had to discharge part of her cargo here on account of it being heated. There was, however, no need to discharge these two ships hurriedly, and the men did not work overtime.

Harry Densford Stacey, a foreman on the C.G.R., stated that since last November he had been receiving coal at the Harbour Board weigh-bridge on behalf of the Railway Department. He had observed the methods of discharge. The only other way in which the Hydaspes could be discharged was into trucks, if they were available; the coal could not have been stacked on the quay. In McKenzie's time he had seen coal discharged by bags, but as the ship rose, and the necessary height was obtained, chutes were used. Coal could not possibly be discharged by bags without considerable breakage.

Thomas Webb, dook superintendent in the employ of Mitchell Cotts and Co., said he had been employed formerly by McKenzies. Coal was generally discharged into lighters by chutes by McKenzies. This was the case in regard to house and steam coal. Baskets were only occasionally used. Witness was employed by McKenzies for fourteen months. Witness considered the coal was more knocked about when the bags were used to convey the coal to the lighter than when a chute was used.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He could not remember specifically cases in which house coal had been discharged by chute. He made a daily report to McKenzies, in which he stated that certain lighters had been sent to certain ships These reports he could not lay hands upon. If Attwell and Co. would state that none of their coal was discharged by chutes except in the case of heated coal he would not contradict them, as he was speaking from memory.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: On his oath he was certain that house coal had been discharged by chutes.

Further cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: If Anderson and Co. would say that during thirty-seven years they never had house coal discharged through chutes he would be very much inclined to contradict them.

By Mr. Justice Maasdorp: He made no difference between house coal and steam coal, and there was never any objection raised to his method of discharge.

Wm. Keery, assistant coaling officer to the Table Bay Harbour Board, stated that he was on board the Hydaspes when she was discharging McKenzie's coal. The chute was being worked in the usual way. Previously he had had seven years' experience with the plaintiff firm, and since May, 1901, he had seen that firm discharge house and steam coal in the Bay. The plaintiffs had a special chute for that. To his knowledge, coal was also discharged through chutes into lighters when a vessel had an outside berth. The usual thing was that house coal was discharged in bags on to the quay. It was only when the consignee made special request that bags were used in the lighter. When the stevedoring was taken over by the Harbour Board, McKenzies were only allowed to finish certain cargoes. The Cadogan, which was discharged by McKenzies, had a cargo of house coal, but witness could not say if chutes were used Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: If ships had an outer berth the coal would be lightered. He had never seen chutes used in the dock. The stevedores started with baskets, but Mr. Small was instructed to use chutes. Witness could not give a single case of house coal being lightered by chutes.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He was quite certain that chutes had been used irrespective of the class of coal.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (for plaintiff): My first point is: was this coal received in good condition in Glasgow? House coal has been loaded there for years in the way in which this cargo was loaded. If the coal was so badly loaded in Glasgow would any firm like Wilkinson, Son and Co. continue to deal with the consignors? No coal has ever been before received here in such a condition.

[Kotzé, J.: To what do you attribute that?]

To the shoot. But that is the ordinary way in which coal is delivered, and yet there have been no complaints for years. Keegan says that the coal arrived in bad condition. There is no evidence as to any damage having been done to the coal during the voyage by rough weather, shifting of cargo, etc. The coal when loaded was good coal, and nothing happened on the voyage to make the coal small. There is a conflict of evidence, and if the consignees had anything to complain of they should have called in a surveyor. The defendants only say that they were discharging in accordance with the custom of the port. They do not show that the coal was bad when it arrived, and the only thing that could have injured it was the shoot. The rule is that discharge must be in accordance with the custom of the port. See Carver on Carriage by Sea (p. 459).

[Maasdorp, J.: The question is whether the coal has been injured by a discharge not in accordance with the custom of the port.]

Quite so, and I will first take the point as to the custom, and then the point your Lordship raises. As to the first point, no witnesses were called to prove the custom of the port. No witness could give a single instance of house coal being discharged by shoot, save under pressing and extraordinary circumstances. Carey denied that house coal was ever discharged by shoot, and that is the evidence of independent witnesses.

[Kotzé, J.: Is it necessarily negligence not to discharge according to the custom of the port?]

I am coming to the question of negligence. There are many cargoes in respect of which there must be a certain amount of wear and tear. Apart from that, the defendants are bound to deliver goods in the condition in which they received them. It lies upon the defendants to show that something, not covered by a bill of lading, has happened to prevent them from doing this. If a ship discharges in an unusual manner the onus of showing she was not guilty of negligence is thrown upon her. Sampson gave evidence as to the custom of other ports, but that has nothing to do with us. The ship tries to shelter herself behind the stevedore, but they do not prove negligence on the part of the stevedore. My chief point is to show that they did not deliver the coal in the same order and condition in which they received it. If the defendants wish to shelter themselves under the exception of negligence (see Kay on Shipmasters and Seamen, p. 367), the onus lies on the defendants to show that they fall under this exception in the bill of lading. Their case is that the coal was delivered in bad condition by reason of the neglect, act, or default of the stevedore, but on this point see Scrutton on Charter Parties (p. 110) and Carver on Carriage by Sea (sec. 16). It would be most absurd if an owner professed his inability to control the acts of his stevedore or could shelter himself under such acts.

Mr. Sohreiner, K.C. (for defendant): The usual mode of delivering household coal at this port is by bags. In this case it was not so delivered, and, therefore, the onus rests upon the plaintiffs to prove the custom of the port. The contract embodied in the bill of lading says "weight and quality unknown, captain not liable for breakage or for negligence." It might well be that the stevedore was to be liable for negligence, but here the evidence does not show that either we, the Harbour Board, or the stevedore were guilty of any negligence. Shipowners constantly contract themselves out of liabilities of various kinds, and there they contracted themselves out of liability for damage by breakage. It has been argued for the plaintiff that we must fail in this action unless we could prove the negligence of the stevedore; but we have nothing to do with that. We are responsible only till the cargo has left the ship's side. I do not, however, wish to base my defence on this point, but on the fact that we have covenanted ourselves out of liability in respect of "breakage." No doubt the coal has been broken, and the plaintiffs say that that was done by our default; but shipowners are not liable for the acts of stevedores. See Masterman v. Bailey (72 L.T., 677), Baerselman v. Barr (87 L.T., 656).

The stevedore was not mentioned specifically, and no doubt it may at first sight appear unreasonable that a carrier should be able to contract himself out of liability for the consequences of his own negligence: but see Carver (p. 101). As to our own law see Act 8 of 1879, sec. 1. In this case, however, the facts in evidence do not disclose any negligence. An attempt was made to discharge the coal by means of baskets, but that plan did not work. It was found necessary to lighter the vessel, and, in order to do so, shoots had to be used. Surely a consignee cannot come to the shipmaster and complain of the way in which the stevedore is doing his work. The special clause in our bill of lading (as to stevedores) was intended to obviate anything of that kind.

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiffs allege in their declaration that the defendant received on board the steamship "Hydaspes" at Glasgow certain house coal in a fit, proper, and merchantable state, which he undertook by bill of lading to convey to Cape Town, and there deliver to them in the like apparent good order and condition. They say it was the duty of the defendant to deliver the coal in the like apparent good order and condition in which he had received it, and to deliver it in the usual and customary way of delivery by means of bags, but that, in breach of his duty, and contrary to the customary and usual manner, he, through his servants and agents handled the coal carelessly and negligently, and delivered it by having it shot and thrown down from the ship's side, so that the coal was broken and damaged, and large quantities of it became practically useless and unmerchantable; that the defendant persisted in his negligence, notwithstanding being warned by the plaintiffs; and that they have sustained damage in the sum of £500, which they now claim. The defendant states in his plea that at Glasgow the coal was delivered by means of railway trucks, out of which it was tipped from a considerable height into the ship's hold; he does not admit that the coal when received by him was in the condition described by the plaintiffs, but says the quality and condition were according to the bill of lading unknown; that it was agreed that the coal should be discharged from the ship as soon as she should be ready to unload into hired lighters, if necessary, and that the coal was delivered in a diligent and proper manner lawfully by means of shoots into lighters. The defendant denies that delivery by means of bags is the customary and proper manner of delivering house coal, and also denies that his servants were guilty of negligence. The plea further alleges that the coal was delivered in the like good order and condition in which it was received, with such breakage as takes place in due course of discharge, and denies that the defendant is liable under the bill of lading for damage sustained through the breakage of coal in the course of delivery, or for any neglect of the stevedores in unloading the coal. Under the bill of lading in this case, the defendant could discharge the goods into hired lighters, if necessary, and the fact that he did so is not a ground of complaint on the part of the plaintiffs. It is therefore unnecessary to go into the circumstances which rendered the discharge into lighters a proper proceeding on the part of the defendant. It is only the manner in which the coal was put out of the ship into the lighters which is called in question. The plaintiffs contend that, in accordance with a custom established at the port of Cape Town, house coal, when put into lighters at the ship's side, whether in the Bay or in Docks, should be discharged by means of bags. That process consists of filling the bags with coal in the ship's hold, hoisting the bags, swinging them over the ship's side, and then letting them down into the lighters. In the lighters the coal is either emptied out of the bags and carried in bulk, or the full bags are placed in the lighters, and taken to the quay. It is said that this manner of delivering house coal has become the established custom of the port, and a point is made of it that, by custom, house coal is handled differently from steam coal. The plaintiffs have sought to prove that, although it is a very common practice in the case of steam coal to discharge by means of shoots into lighters, whenever house coal is discharged, that mode of discharge is never adopted, except under circumstances of great stress and emergency. It is necessary for the Court to determine whether the practice of delivering house coal by means of bags has been so general and constant as to have grown into an established custom, and if it is consequently to be taken as a condition binding on the parties under their contract. The custom is not mentioned in the bill of lading, but it has been held that the absence of reference to the custom of the port is of no great importance, because it is obvious that the contract is always made with regard to the custom of the port of discharge, and that it is contemplated that the discharge must take place in accordance with what is the usual way of performing the operation. It is necessary to determine the question of custom in this case, although it does not follow that the decision on that point will dispose of the rights and liabilities of the parties. It appears that the firm of McKenzie and Co., which was afterwards floated into the plaintiff company, was largely employed in the discharge of coal of all kinds for a long course of years, and I should have thought the plaintiffs would have experienced little difficulty in obtaining evidence in support of the alleged custom from the many servants whom they have had in their employment, if such custom existed. Several of the stevedores who used to work for them are still engaged at the Docks, but none of them have been called for the plaintiffs as witnesses in this case. Instead of that three witnesses, engaged mainly in the office work of the plaintiffs, were called, two of whom, Mr. Niehouse and Mr. Sexton, admitted that they had little to do with the practical work of discharging coal. Mr. Beattie, the other employee, a director of the plaintiff company, says he has had 22 years acquaintance with the discharge of coal, and he has never seen house coal discharged by chute at this port. Mr. Regan, of the firm of Wilson, Son, and Company, says he has never known house coal to be discharged by chute, and he adds "I know the custom of the port, it is not the custom even now to discharge house coal by chute." Bishop and Dent, who were Dock superintendent and coaling superintendent to the Union-Castle Company, say it was not the custom to discharge house coal by means of chutes, and that it was only done in case of emergency, and when they could not help themselves. This is the substance of the evidence for the plaintiffs on this point. And in my opinion there is an absence of general and varied experience in this evidence, especially if it is taken that the two last witnesses speak of their observations chiefly in the business of their own company. Some of the witnesses called for the defence say that house coal was commonly discharged in bags, but at times chutes were used, others say they used chutes irrespective of whether they were engaged in discharging house coal or steam coal. It seems to me that it is not very difficult to explain the conflict of evidence in this case. On the whole, the evidence for the plaintiffs amounts to this that coal was commonly discharged in bags, except in cases of emergency and when they could not help themselves and possibly these cases of emergency may have occurred so frequently that in the opinion of others they constituted a serious obstacle to the establishment of the custom contended for. What was regarded as an exception by some was looked upon as a common occurrence by others. I think Mr. Seddon was right in saying that with respect to the discharge of house coal there was no defined custom. It must also be borne in mind that until lately house coal was more commonly discharged at the wharf, where chutes cannot be used, and where discharging must therefore take place by means of bags. I think this circumstance must have influenced the plaintiff's witnesses when they spoke of the constant use of bags. Lighters have come into more frequent use lately, and with the more frequent use of lighters the practice of discharging by means of chutes has increased within the last few years. The onus of proving that it is a custom of the port that house coal should be discharged by means of bags only was on the plaintiffs, and in my opinion they have failed to prove such a custom. It is of course always open to the parties to a bill of lading to make the mode of discharging coal one of the stipulations of the contract if they desire to do so. Proof of custom having failed, the defendant was at liberty to use chutes in discharging house coal, if that is a proper mode of discharge. Even if the custom were proved, the plaintiffs must have failed if they did not trace the damage done to the coal to the deviation from the custom. I am quite satisfied upon the evidence that the use of chutes for the discharge of house coal, as well as other coal, is a common practice in all parts of the world, and that there is no objection to it as a mode of discharge. As to the comparative merits of the two systems in question there seems to me to exist such an honest divergence of opinion that possibly there is really nothing to choose between them, provided they are properly employed. It is quite clear that coal is not gently handled anywhere, and that those who deal in it make their calculations accordingly. Rapid loading and unloading is expected and desired by all parties, and the consequent rough handling is contemplated when people deal in coal. But it is quite true that there must be a limit to this. If undue breakage of coal occurs through negligence the person injured is entitled to redress. Here again we come face to face with a conflict of evidence, but on the whole there is no proof that the chutes of the "Hydaspes" were used in a negligent manner, nor is it satisfactorily proved that more breakage occurred during the process than must generally be allowed for in such cases. Witnesses for the defence say that the coal when it came out of the hold was fine and small, and Captain Sampson, who superintended the discharging, says he took special notice after complaints were made, and he could see no material difference in the condition of the coal after it got into the lighters. Unfortunately the two witnesses who were called to survey the coal in the plaintiff's stores on behalf of the plaintiffs saw it for the first time a month after it was unloaded, and after a considerable portion of it had been screened and sold. Witnesses called in Glasgow say the coal was in a good condition in the wagons before it was tipped into the hold, but none of them speak as to its condition in the hold of the ship, and it must be confessed that the coal received very rough usage at Glasgow, where, when the hold is empty, a fall of nearly forty feet takes place. I think we must come to the conclusion upon the evidence that this shipment was not as good as the plaintiffs usually received from the same shippers, or as good as they expected, but I am not satisfied that the condition of the coal when it reached the plaintiffs was due to the negligence of the defendant. Under the bill of lading, the defendant "is not liable for loss or damage occasioned by breakage." As pointed out by Mr. Justice Wills in the case of Phillips v. Clark, "if those words were not in the bill of lading the carrier would be liable for the delivery of the goods as they were delivered to him. When those words are introduced the meaning of the contract by the shipowner is, 'I shall take all care in the carrying of the goods, but I shall not ensure the delivery of them in the same condition, if the difference be caused by breakage.'" Notwithstanding those words, the defendant would still be liable if the loss was consequent upon his own negligence or that of his servants. In this case, however, the defendant further protected himself from liability for loss or damages occasioned by the stevedores in unloading. It might, therefore, be said that it was unnecessary to go into the question of negligence, for in any case the defendant was exempt from liability under the exception in the bill of lading. But if negligence had been proved another question would have arisen not free from doubt as a question of fact upon the evidence, and one upon which there is no direct authority. There is no doubt that Captain Sampson, who is marine superintendent of the Houston line of steamers, took a very active part in the discharging of the coal, and it would have become necessary to decide, in case negligence was proved, whether he was not responsible for the negligence, and in that case it would have been necessary further to decide whether the defendant was protected by the clause absolving him from liability for the negligence of the stevedores. The plaintiff having failed to prove negligence, it is not necessary now to decide upon the legal consequences of Captain Sampson's interference in the unloading. Upon the whole, the plaintiffs have not succeeded in showing that they have suffered damages for which the defendant is legally responsible, and judgment must be given for the defendant, with costs.

Kotzé, J., after reviewing the pleadings and evidence in the case, proceeded to say: When the "Hydaspes" got alongside the Knuckle berth at the South Arm in the Table Bay Docks, she was about 15 feet above the water line, and did not at any time while discharging rise to an additional 6 feet. The chute running from the ship's side to the lighter was about 13 feet in length, and at an angle of about 45 deg., and the lighter was drawing when empty about 2 feet of water. Consequently the drop of the coal from the end of the chute on to the bottom of the lighter would at the most have been about 14 feet, and would gradually have diminished, as the lighter got filled, to about 8 feet. This being so, it is difficult to come to the conclusion that the breakage caused by the use of the chute would be greater than that caused by the mode of loading at Glasgow, where the drop of the coal into the hold of the vessel was at least double that of the drop from the end of the chute into the lighter. Of course, regard being had to the breakable nature of coal, each separate handling thereof would cause additional smalls or waste, and it follows that, when, on discharging cargo, coal was first taken out of the hold and placed into lighters, and then afterwards removed again from the lighters for delivery in bags on the quay or wharf, it could not be expected to arrive at the plaintiff's stores in exactly the same condition as when it was put on board the defendant's ship. The moment the coal left the ship's side or tackle the responsibility of the shipowner ceased, and upon the evidence it seems to me that the probability is that the coal, when delivered into the lighters, was, allowing for necessary waste or smalls resulting from the handling of the coal in order to complete delivery, practically in the like good order and condition as when it reached and was stowed away in the tank or hold of the ship. The receiving of the coal by the master on behalf of the shipowner was not actually completed until the coal was put into the ship, and the shipowner is not responsible for the breakage caused by independent stowage of the coal, which was according to the custom of the port of loading, and beyond his control. There is also the fact that 250 of the 498 tons were disposed of by the plaintiffs as good house coal. The last of this consignment of coal reached the stores of the plaintiffs about the 15th December, 1902, but no independent examination thereof was held until the 9th January, 1903, although the summons was issued on the 22nd December. This delay has not been explained, and is not a satisfactory circumstance in the case. Upon the whole, therefore, I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs have failed to establish that the coal was not delivered over the ship's side in the like apparent good order and condition in which it was received, allowing for fair and reasonable breakage necessarily caused by the discharge of the coal, an allowance which the plaintiffs admit should be made in favour of the defendant. The plaintiffs contend further that, according to the custom of the port, the usual and proper mode of delivery is by placing the coal in bags, and not by means of a chute. Assuming that in a case like the present the shipowner would, as regards delivery, be bound by the custom of the port, in the sense of the settled and established practice of the port, then it has not, to my mind, been satisfactorily proved that at the port of Cape Town house coal has been and is always discharged from the ship by bags, and not by means of a chute. There is evidence to show that house coal has not merely been discharged by means of a chute under special circumstances, where expedition was necessary, as where, for instance, the coal had got heated or had taken fire on board, but also ordinarily where no special circumstances requiring despatch existed. Several witnesses state that the discharge of all kinds of coal by means of a chute is not only more expeditious, but also causes less, or at least not more, breakage than by delivering by means of bags. They also add that in other parts of the world where they have been, the use of a chute is the usual and general mode of discharging both house and steam coal. There can be no doubt that the use of a chute is more expeditious than the employment of bags, although I am slow to believe that there is less breakage by using chutes. But be this as it may, I am not prepared to say that the delivery of coal by means of a chute is contrary to the custom of the port, nor that a chute is not a proper means of discharging house coal. I think that with the exercise of due and proper care in the using thereof, the employment of a suitable shoot is a proper means of discharging house coal as well as steam coal. Both methods of discharging coal seem to have been adopted at the port of Cape Town, and when more than one suitable method exists, if the shipowner selects one of them, it cannot be said without more information that he has acted negligently or failed in his duty. There is, moreover, nothing to show that, while using the chute, the stevedore and his men were guilty of any negligence or want of due care in handling or dealing with the coal. The conclusion at which I have arrived renders it unnecessary to consider the exception in the bill of lading protecting the shipowner against liability for negligence of the stevedore. I agree that judgment should be for the defendant, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

MULLER V. MULLER. { 1903. June 24th.

Mr. Wilkinson moved, as a matter of urgency, for an interdict restraining the General Estate and Orphan Chamber from paying over certain money to the respondent, against whom an application was pending by his wife for alimony to enable her to pursue her suit for divorce. If the money were paid out, it was feared that any order which the Court might make would be fruitless.

An interdict, restraining the company from parting with the money until a further order of Court was granted.

SUSVIELA V. GARDINER AND EASTON.

Mr. Benjamin moved for judgment for the plaintiff, the defendants being in default. The affidavit of service of notice of trial was put in. The action was for an account, calling upon the defendants to render an account of the fine received for certain cows and calves which they undertook to sell on behalf of the plaintiff at Johannesburg. They had rendered a partial account, showing a sale of a portion of the cows and calves, and the plaintiff had called upon them to furnish a full account, showing the money received for the sale of the cattle.

Judgment was given in terms of the motion, the account to be rendered within a fortnight.

TABLE BAY HARBOUR BOARD v. MILLER. 1903. June 24th.

Negligence—Rule of the road—Collision — Ordinance 4 of 1846, Sec. 3—Act 27 of 1882, Sec. 7.

The plaintiff's waggon which was being driven along the proper side of the road, as provided by Ordinance 4 of 1846, Sec. 3, and Act 27 of 1882, Sec. 7, Subsec. (1), collided with the defendant's waggon, which was coming down the wrong side of the street.

Held, that by not keeping to the proper side of the street defendant's servant had been guilty of negligence, and that judgment must be given for plaintiff, with costs.

This was an action brought by the Table Bay Harbour Board against William Miller, a resident of Cape Town, to recover the sum of £36 6s., being £35, the value of a horse of the plaintiffs, which was killed through the negligence of the defendant's servant, and £1 6s. expenses for removing and burying the horse.

The declaration set forth that on the 6th February, a wagon drawn by two horses, the property of the defendant, was wrongfully, unlawfully, and negligently driven down Parliament-street, and as a result collided with a team, the property of the plaintiffs, and killed one of their horses.

The plea admitted the formal allegations, but set forth that on the 6th February, in Parliament-street, a wagon drawn by two horses, the property of the defendant, was being lawfully driven on the proper side when the wagon drawn by four horses, the property of the plaintiffs, was wrongfully and unlawfully driven on the wrong side of the street, and ran into the defendant's team, the pole of the wagon striking the horse on the chest. The defendant did not admit the value of the horse, or that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover any damages in connection with the matter.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Bisset) for plaintiff; Mr. Buchanan (with him Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers) for defendant.

For the plaintiffs,

James John Dreyer, inspector of wagons under the Harbour Board, was called. He stated that he met the wagon in question opposite Claridge's Hotel. He was on horseback. Witness went down Plein-street, and the wagon went down Parliament-street. As he passed Lelie-street he looked towards Parliament-street, and saw one of the horses which were attached to the wagon rise up on its hind legs and then fall. He immediately spurred his horse through Lelie-street, and he saw the horse on the ground. There was a pool of blood by the wagon. The road was muddy, and he saw the track made by the wagon as it came along. The track ran straight down on the left-hand side, quite close to the wall. The other wagon was standing in front of the office of the Commissioner of Public Works. He saw the track of that wagon, too, and as far as he could see the wagon had come up the street at the wrong side. Witness valued the horse at £35. The pole had struck the animal right in the chest, and had penetrated the body for about one foot.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He merely saw the horse jump up and drop right down dead. The harness was then off the horse. Witness found the horse lying by the kerb at Lelie-street corner. The Harbour Board wagon was by the railings of Parliament House. The blood ran in a trail right across the road from the wagon to the kerb, where the horse lay. The road was damp by the wall, and he traced the tracks of the wheels. The horses were good horses, but not spirited; the leaders were good leaders. There was no brake on the wagon. The hole was in the middle of the horse's chest.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: He sent for Mr. Pattison, who examined the spot on his arrival. Nothing had been moved in the meantime.

By Kotzé, J.: Two wagons could easily have passed in the street.

Alphonso Pattison, chief inspector under the Harbour Board, stated that he arrived on the scene at about 5.15 p.m. He traced the tracks of the wheels, which ran down quite parallel to the wall about three feet from it. The Harbour Board wagon was standing parallel to the wall. He traced the blood from the harness across to where the horse was lying dead. Witness traced the track of the other wagon across the street, but he could not follow the track down the street. The value of the horse was £35; cast-off horses would fetch nearly that amount. The width of the road was about 26 feet.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: The left wheel of the Harbour Board wagon was about 3 feet from the wall. The wagon stood in the same spot where the accident occurred. He was quite surprised to observe from the tracks how carefully the driver must have driven. The driver had left the Board's employment about six week's ago, as a consequence of an accident which occurred to his cart while going to Camp's Bay.

John Abrahams, the driver of the wagon in question, stated that at about ten minutes to five o'clock, he was driving slowly down Parliament-street, on the left side. The horses were going quietly. He saw the other wagon about 25 yards away, coming along on the same side. When the other wagon was about five yards off, witness stopped his horses. He shouted to the other boy to hold his horses, but the horses continued to come on, and the pole of the wagon struck one of witness's horses in the chest. Before the accident, the police van was coming up the street on the left hand side, and Miller's wagon passed it on the outside.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Friday was pay day, and when he arrived back, he would have got his pay. Five o'clock was the time for paying. There was only a slight slope in the road. Witness drove the whole way down the street close to the wall.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: Witness was now working for Mr. Berry.

William Pick, a storeman in the employment of Geo. Findlay and Co., stated that he was standing at the middle gate of the grounds of Parliament House, and saw the accident. He saw the Harbour Board wagon come slowly down the street, about two feet from the wall. He also saw the police van come up the street on the left-hand side. Miller's wagon passed him, and witness then went into the grounds of Parliament House. He heard the Harbour Board driver shout, "Keep to your side." Miller's wagon was then on the right side of the street going up. He saw the pole strike the horse. The horse was unharnessed and led out, but it fell dead on the other side of the street. Between the time of the accident and the arrival of the Harbour Board "baas" (Mr. Dreyer), the wagon was not moved.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Miller's cart was going pretty quickly. The driver did not rein in his horses at all. Witness was standing about 20 yards off when the accident occurred.

Mr. Searle put in certain correspondence, and closed the case for the plaintiff.

For the defendant, Police-constable John Jones was called. Witness was sitting in front of the prison van at the time in question. Miller's wagon passed the van out on the right, and then veered in towards the left. There was room on the left of Miller's wagon, so that the van could have passed between it and the pavement; but on its left, the whole of the street was vacant, and any cart could have passed. The Harbour Board wagon at the time of the accident was coming along on its wrong side. The day was very windy and dusty. His impression of how the accident occurred was that the Harbour Board wagon was coming along on its wrong side, and when approaching Miller's wagon, the driver tried to cross to his proper side. Miller's driver, too, seeing the Harbour Board wagon, in order to avoid a collision, tried to cross to his right hand side—which was actually his wrong side of the road—with the result that both horses, heading to the same side, collided.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle. The horse that was struck was as near as possible to the centre of the street. He did not see the Harbour Board wagon move after the accident.

By Maasdorp, J.: The Harbour Board wagon was across the street, so that the prison van could not pass.

The wound was right in the middle of the horse's chest. When the collision occurred, witness was 60 yards off. Miller's wagon was going somewhat less than six miles per hour.

Re-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He was sitting pretty high on the van so that he had a good view of the wagons. The back of the Harbour Board wagon was about 7 feet, at the most, from the pavement.

By Maasdorp, J.: He did not look for the tracks of the wagons, but he was convinced that the Harbour Board wagon was on the wrong side.

Henry Mullins stated that he witnessed the accident. He was walking down Parliament-street, and the Harbour Board wagon passed him at a full trot. It was evident that the driver could not manage his horses. The wagon was in the centre of the road. Miller's wagon came up the street about 1½ or 2 yards from the pavement. He saw the accident take place. The Harbour Board driver could not hold his horse, and the leader bumped twice off the pole of Miller's wagon. The wound was a little to one side of the horse's chest. Mr. Meyer did not come up Lelie-street at all; he came up Grave-street. Witness did not hear the Harbour Board driver shouting, "Keep to your side."

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: The prison van could not have passed between Miller's wagon and the pavement. There was a pool of blood where the horse was outspanned. He did not take notice of the tracks of the wagons. The wagons pointed straight along the street, not across it.

By Maasdorp, J.: The policeman was wrong in saying that the wagons slanted across the road.

John Tuck, a driver in the employ of the defendant, stated that he was the driver of the wagon to which the accident occurred. He had considerable experience of driving in the city, and was in the service of Mr. Miller for about eight or nine months. He was driving the wagon, to which two horses were attached. He saw the police van and passed it about half-way in the street. After passing the van he saw the Harbour Board wagon coming down. He was going at a walking pace. He drove on the left-hand side at a walking pace. He drove on the left-hand side at about a yard or a yard and a half from the pavement. There was plenty of room on the right for two more wagons to pass. The plaintiff's driver ran into him near the corner of Lelie-street. Witness was driving very carefully, and did not hear the other driver shout. The other men did not pull up at once. At the first bump the pole did not penetrate the horse; the second time it entered the animal's chest. There was plenty of room for the other driver to pass on witness's right. There was room for even two other wagons.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He was quite close to the pavement at the time of the accident, and it was quite wrong to say that the prison van could have passed between witness's wagon and the pavement. The other wagon was coming straight down. He had nearly stopped at the moment of the collision. When the horse struck the pole the first time it swerved the pole somewhat across the road, but the wagon remained unmoved. The Harbour Board wagon was shifted after the accident.

By Maasdorp, J.: He drove straight on. He could not get nearer the pavement owing to the gutter.

By Kotzé, J.: He went slowly past the police van.

William Samuel Miller, son of the defendant, stated that he was driving on his father's wagon, and when they passed the prison van they were going at a slow trot. He saw the Harbour Board wagon coming along. It was going at a fast trot, and the leaders were going from side to side. The Harbour Board driver did not shout, but the previous witness held up his hand to stop. The accident took place on the pavement side of the street.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He could see blood all the way. The Harbour Board wagon was coming down in the middle of the road, but the two front horses zigzagged, otherwise they could have passed them. Witness's wagon did not take a turn to the right. The police van could not have passed between witness's van and the pavement.

Re-examined by Mr. Buchanan: When they were driving up they were close to the pavement.

By Maasdorp, J.: After the accident witness drove up the street a little bit.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts.

Maasdorp, J.: The Court has to determine in this case whether the injury to the plaintiff's horse was caused through the negligence of the defendants' servant, or through that of the plaintiffs' servant. It is of importance in cases of this kind to ascertain in the first place whether the drivers were careful in observing the rules of the road, and if each kept to the proper side of the road at the time the accident took place. The rule of the road is very concisely laid down in Ordinance No. 4 of 1846, section 3, where it is provided that if the driver of any wagon which, when meeting or being followed upon the public road by any other wagon, shall not keep upon the left or near side of the road, he shall be liable to a penalty. Well, it is quite clear here that where the driver of a wagon passes a a wagon, or expects to be overtaken by another, he should keep on the left or near side of the road, and I may at once refer to that portion of the evidence of the policeman, in which he says that it appeared to him that when the defendants' driver had passed him, he seemed to keep in the middle of the road, in order to allow the prison van sufficient space to pass him on his left if necessary. In doing this, he did what was wrong, because his duty was to go as near the pavement as possible, and if the prison van had to pass him, it should have passed him on his right side. It is useful also to refer to the Police Offences Act, No. 27 of 1882, in which it is provided that any driver of any vehicle injuring any property by negligence or driving on the wrong side of the road, shall be liable to a penalty. Now it is quite clearly indicated here that a driver in driving on the wrong side of the road is acting improperly, and his conduct in law is classed with negligence. In these circumstances, it is quite true that the bare fact of a driver being on the wrong side of the road is not conclusive evidence on which a question like that raised in the present case has to be decided, but it is certain that a driver who is on the wrong side of the road puts himself so far in the wrong that he has to justify his conduct and to explain how it was that he was not on the proper side. Now the Court has first to decide whether the plaintiffs' driver kept to the proper side of the road when he was coming down Parliament-street. The case of the plaintiff is that his driver carefully kept towards the left all the way down, and that is what the driver himself says he did. The plaintiff has called two witnesses, Mr. Dreyer and Mr. Pattison, who were on the spot immediately after the accident, and it is said when they arrived there, they found the wagon exactly in the same spot in which it had stopped after the collision. Upon arriving there, they set about ascertaining what line both these wagons had taken in their course up and down the street, and they traced the tracks of each wagon back from where it was standing. They both say the track of the plaintiffs' wagon was quite clear for a long distance down the street, and they found it within 3 feet of the left-hand wall, for a considerable distance before it arrived at the spot at which the accident took place. They also traced back the track of the defendants' wagon, and found it came from somewhere near the right hand of the road going up, and they could not trace it much further, because of the nature of the ground; but just after the accident happened, in their opinion, it must have passed from the right hand side of the road towards the left, where they found it standing when they arrived there. Another witness was called who states he saw the plaintiff's wagon coming down the street on the left hand side, and that at the same moment defendants' wagon was on the same side of the street. If we accept that evidence, it is clearly proved that the plaintiffs' wagon was driven on the proper side of the road and the defendant's on the wrong side. The question now arises whether evidence has been adduced by the defendant to rebut and upset that evidence. When the policeman was called, it struck me he would be a very important witness in this case, because he was a disinterested witness, and it would be his duty to ascertain at once who the party was that was to blame, but unfortunately, though he is a disinterested witness, and though in performing his duty he ought to have ascertained the exact circumstances of the case, we find in most material points he is contradicted by other witnesses for the defendant. The policeman says he saw the defendant's wagon going up the road running towards the middle of the road, but somewhat to the left, and just before the collision took place, the driver must have observed that the other wagon was approaching it on the same side, and thereupon the driver turned to the right, and that after the defendant's driver had turned to the right the collision took place He also says that when he came up to the defendant's wagon with the prison van it was far enough away from the pavement for him to pass it on the left, and the only thing that blocked the way of the driver of the prison van was the wagon of the plaintiff's, which was too near the left side of the road going up. These would have been very important points if they had been proved, because it would have proved that the defendant's wagon went to the left and that the plaintiff's wagon was directly in its way, but we find from the other witnesses for the defence, amongst them the driver himself, that he did not upon approaching the wagon of the defendant turn to the right, but that he kept straight on Here, therefore, the policeman is wrong. and wrong in a very material point, because the effect of his evidence would have been that the defendant's wagon swerved to the right because the plaintiff's wagon was on the wrong side. Then again, young Miller contradicts the policeman in saying that it was not the plaintiff's wagon which hindered the prison van, but that after the accident he had driven defendant's wagon alongside the plaintiff's on the left, where there was room enough for it to stand. The policeman was one of the witnesses of whom I expected a great deal of useful evidence, but he is contradicted by the other witnesses for the defendant. Now, the other witnesses for the defendant state that the defendant's wagon was going up towards the middle of the road, about a yard and a half from the pavement, and the driver says that was as near as he could possibly go. Well, that in itself cannot possibly be accepted. I come to the conclusion that the plaintiff's wagon was on the proper side of the road and the defendant's on the wrong side. The question of the position of these different wagons having been disposed of, it is necessary to ascertain whether, when the accident actually took place, either of the parties was to blame in such a way as to be guilty of negligence. Now if we accept the evidence of the plaintiff's driver, it would appear that he was quietly driving down the road on the left-hand side when the defendant's driver approached directly in front of him. This resulted in a serious impact between the breast of the horse and the pole of the wagon, which caused the injury, and this evidence would satisfactorily explain the wound received by the horse. That circumstance is quite consistent with the statement of the plaintiff's driver, but if we take the evidence of the defendant's driver it would be difficult to understand how the injury could have taken place. He says he was driving up towards the plaintiffs' wagon when the front horses of the plaintiff came into contact with the pole of his wagon, which was slewed round, and that it was after the pole had been slewed round that the horse in rearing came into contact with the point of the pole, which pierced its breast. I must say I cannot accept that statement. If the pole had slewed round it would follow that the position of the horse would be such that when it reared its breast could not come into direct impact with the pole. Under all the circumstances of the case I come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs' driver was driving carefully on the proper side of the road, and that his evidence satisfactorily explains the manner in which the injury was inflicted on the plaintiffs' horse, and the evidence given by the defendant's driver is inconsistent with a fact established beyond doubt by the other evidence in the case. If we accept the evidence of the plaintiffs' witnesses we come to the conclusion that the injury was done through the negligence of the defendant's servant. The question then arises, what damages ought to be allowed. We have the evidence of the plaintiffs' witnesses, which estimates the value of the horse at £35, and the other necessary expenses incurred in consequence of the injury at £1 6s. This is not denied by defendant's witnesses. The Court will, therefore, allow the plaintiff damages in the sum of £36 6s., with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice, the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.]

ADMISSION. { 1903. June 25th.

Mr. Benjamin moved for the admission of Ernest Frederick Hendrikz as an attorney.

Application granted, oaths to be taken before the magistrate at Somerset East.

GENERAL MOTION.

WEINTROB V. SCHAVERRIN.

This was a motion to have a rule nisi made absolute, interdicting the respondent from interfering with property and materials at Lady Grey-street, Paarl, pending an action to be brought by applicant.

The affidavit of the petitioner set forth that in September last he purchased certain property near Lady Grey Bridge from one Isaac Jacob de Villiers, and that immediately after the sale he framed plans of alterations which he proposed to make in fulfilment of the conditions of the agreement which was executed between seller and purchaser. The plans were approved by the seller. The agreement was that the property should be sold to the applicant for £2,000, subject to his making improvements at a cost of £500, the whole of the purchase sum could remain on mortgage at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, otherwise £300 sterling was to be paid in cash, and a bond passed for £1,700 sterling, from the date bond was passed, interest to be paid for six months, otherwise to be paid monthly; transfer to be taken from the 1st April, 1903, after six months; all costs to be paid by the purchaser. Deponent had deposited a quantity of stone and other materials on the premises. The said I. J. de Villiers had collected rents on the property up to the end of April on behalf of petitioner, in part payment of interest, and applicant had paid to him £2 15s., being the balance of interest due on the said purchase price to the end of March. Applicant had always been ready and willing to fulfil the conditions of sale, and take possession at due date, and pass a mortgage bond for £2,000 in favour of the said seller. He had not received transfer, and the said seller now refused to sign the necessary documents. He understood that the said seller had since disposed of the property to the respondent, Morris Schaverein, who had broken down, and was still breaking down, a portion of the said premises, and was effecting certain alterations on the said premises without the consent and against the wish of the said applicant, although he had been warned to desist from so doing.

The affidavit of the respondent stated that the property had been sold to him by the late owner, De Villiers, and that he was informed, and verily believed, that the sale of the property to the applicant had been cancelled by mutual consent. He added that he had taken considerable materials to the premises, and that if he were restrained from using the same, pending the result of the action, he would suffer considerable damage owing to the rainy weather.

The affidavit of the said I. J. de Villiers said that the applicant had failed to comply with the conditions of the sale, and that he subsequently approached deponent, and asked to be released from the agreement, as he was without money. An affidavit by the seller's son was to a similar effect.

The replying affidavit of the applicant denied that he had asked to be released from the agreement of sale, and said that he had tendered the full purchase price of £2,000 to the said De Villiers, and that he was being financed by the Paarl Board of Executors. He denied that he had given notice or otherwise for the said sale to be cancelled. His attorneys had written to the seller, tendering the amount of the purchase price. The said I. J. de Villiers granted him an extension of time for four months, in order to complete the said sale, and it was agreed that he should be given full possession on the 15th May, 1903, and that in consideration thereof he was to pay a sum of £15.

Mr. Close for applicant; Mr. C. W. de Villiers for respondent.

De Villiers, C.J., asked why De Villiers was not joined as a party to the application.

Mr. Close said he did not know.

Mr. Close contended that his client was prepared to carry out the first agreement, and that it was owing to De Villiers' refusal that he was unable to get full possession of the premises. There was no mention of time within which the £500 for alterations was to be spent. The mention of time was as to the interest to be paid every six months, otherwise it was to be paid monthly. It was owing to De Villiers' failure that the applicant was not allowed to complete the property. In that way De Villiers cancelled the contract. They had his own receipt for the interest of the money payable under the contract. There was absolutely no ground for cancelling the agreement.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers said that it appeared from the statement of I. J. de Villiers and his son that no improvements at all had taken place, and the applicant himself had admitted that he had done nothing but cart materials to the place. It is common cause that an extension of time was asked, and that the applicant was allowed until the 15th April. Then, according to Mr. I. J. de Villiers, Weintrob asked for the agreement to be cancelled. Weintrob never paid anything. All he did was to cart soil and materials to the property; he did not take any bricks there.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Yes, but he tenders the full purchase price?]

Quite so, my lord; but that was after the second sale had taken place. The applicant had never had transfer of the property, and, in fact, he never seemed to have had real possession. The vendor (De Villiers) said that the applicant himself asked him to cancel the sale.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But the applicant denies that.]

I admit that that is so. The tender was a very incomplete one, inasmuch as although £2,000 was tendered, nothing was said as to the improvements. I submit that the applicant has not made out a sufficient case for an interdict.

De Villiers, C.J.: On the 23rd September last year a sale was effected by De Villiers to the applicant of the property in question for £2,000. That appears from the writings which have been put in. There was a condition "that if purchaser make improvements to the value of the sum of £500 sterling, the whole of the purchase sum can remain on mortgage at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, otherwise £300 sterling is to be paid in cash, and a bond passed for £1,700 sterling, from the date the bond is passed interest is to be paid for six months, otherwise to be paid monthly, transfer to be taken from the 1st October, 1902, after six months. All costs to be paid by the purchaser." It is said that this condition is a suspensory condition, but I am inclined to look upon it as a resolutive condition. The sale is to take effect, and the sale may be put an end to afterwards if the condition is not complied with. But to put an end to a sale which has been completed requires an Order of Court, and no such order has been given. De Villiers has taken upon himself to cancel this sale—the completed sale; there has been no transfer; so far as the sale itself is concerned, that was completed. Now he says that there was an agreement between the parties that the sale should be cancelled. Well, of course, if there was such an agreement, then comes a question; but the sale was effected by means of a writing, and I should have expected if there was to be a cancellation of that sale, that a writing would have been executed for the purpose of cancellation. At all events, the applicant denies that there was a cancellation, and it is impossible for the Court now upon these affidavits to decide which statement is correct. It is clear, therefore, that the interdict ought to continue pending an action to be forthwith brought by the applicant against De Villiers for transfer of the land in question, and against the respondent as subsequent purchaser of the land from De Villiers. As to the costs of this application, they must abide the result. The rule is made absolute, interdict to continue pending action to be forthwith brought by the applicant against De Villiers for transfer of the land in question, and against respondent as subsequent purchaser from De villiers: costs to abide the result.

ESTATE HUDSON V. STEINBRUCK.

Mr. De Waal moved for a rule nisi to be made absolute restraining the respondent from selling or disposing of certain assets contained in two shops and a dwelling-house at Main-road, Claremont, pending the result of an action for £87 for arrears of rent.

The Acting Registrar (Mr. Gately) reported that the respondent had become insolvent since the date of the rule, and the property was now in the hands of the Master.

De Villiers, C.J.: The action will have to be brought against the trustee, but the rule will be made absolute, pending the action.

Ex parte COOMBER.

This was a motion for an order authorising the Master to pay over certain monies to one Jane Coomber, the petitioner. Petitioner, in her affidavit, said that her husband left her after they had been married about a year, and that he had not supported her since 1896. She had had no communication from him since that date, and she had had to maintain herself and the children. There was a sum of £534 7s. 4d. due to her from the estate of the late Joseph Woodward (her grandfather), now in the hands of the Master, and there were further sums becoming due to her in the estate of the late Mary Elizabeth Shearer (her mother). She was refused payment of the said money, on the ground that she was married in community, without her husband joining in the discharge of receipt. Her husband's whereabouts were unknown, and his assistance could not be obtained. She prayed for an order of Court authorising the executors in the estates of the late Joseph Woodward and Mary Elizabeth Shearer, to pay over to her all such sums of money as might be found to be due to her without the assistance of her husband.

Mr. Alexander for applicant.

De Villiers, C.J.: Is she proceeding against her husband for separation or divorce.

Mr. Alexander: There is nothing to show that, but there have been cases in which the Court has ordered money to be paid and transfer to be passed to women married in community, without the husband's assistance. Ferreira v. Registrar of Deeds (5 Juta, 387), Pretorius v. Executors of Pretorius (2 Juta, 293).

[De Villiers, C.J.: What right has the applicant to the whole property?]

Will not the Court grant a rule nisi to show cause why we should not have half the money paid over to us, and also an allowance for the children?

[De Villiers, C.J.: The proper course would be for the petitioners to sue her husband for separation or divorce.]

An action will take time to bring, and we want money for the support of the children.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You had better consult your client as to sueing for separation or for divorce, and mention the matter again.]

Subsequently Mr. Alexander said his client was prepared to accept an order for leave to sue by edictal citation for judicial separation, for the division of the property, for custody of the children, and for the support of the children pending action to authorise the Master and the executors of the estate mentioned in the petition to pay the petitioner the half of the amount devolving on respondent.

An order was granted in these terms, personal service to be effected, failing which service to be made by two publications in a Johannesburg newspaper, intendit and notice of trial to be served with the citation.

Ex parte HUNT.

Mr. Close moved for leave to sue by edictal citation for divorce and custody of the minor child of the marriage. The parties, it appeared, were married in Johannesburg in 1892, without community of property. In January 1898 they went to England, but about September of that year the petitioner's wife returned to South Africa without lawful cause and against his wish. Petitioner came to this colony in 1899, and had correspondence with his wife's father respecting her return to him, but his wife, who was residing in the Transvaal, refused to return to him and restore conjugal rights.

Leave to sue was granted, and the respondent was called upon to show cause by the 12th August why an order for dissolution of the marriage should not be granted against her.

MULLER V. MULLER.

Mr. Wilkinson moved for an order directing the respondent to pay £30 to the petitioner to enable her to institute proceedings against her husband for judicial separation by reason of his cruelty and personal violence towards her and also to pay to her the sum of £10 per month by way of alimony, to enable her to maintain herself pending the result of the action, and also for an interdict restraining the General Estate and Orphan Chamber from parting with any moneys due to the respondent out of the estate of his father. Mr. Benjamin appeared for the respondent.

The affidavit of the applicant stated that she was married to the respondent at S. George's Cathedral, Cape Town, and that the marriage still subsisted. There was one child born of the marriage. She intended to institute an action for judicial separation against her husband. Last October, while in the bedroom, he struck her, and tried to cut her throat with a razor. He was then in an intoxicated state. He also took a bayonet and tried to stab her, but her father rushed to her aid. Since that date the respondent had frequently given way to intemperate habits, and while in that state, he invariably assaulted her. On the 12th May, 1903, while they were walking through the brickfields near Mowbray Cemetery, he threatened to cut her throat with a knife, and made her kneel down and beg for her life. On the 14th May she left him, and went to live with her father. Since that time he had contributed nothing to her support. She verily believed, and was informed, that respondent was to receive a sum of £180 from the estate of his late father, and that the money would shortly be in the hands of the General Estate and Orphan Chamber.

Mr. Benjamin read the respondent's affidavit, which denied the alleged threats and assault in the bedroom, and accused the applicant of first slapping the respondent's face. Deponent denied that he was intoxicated or that he had given way to habits of intemperance. He also denied the brickfield incident. He added that his wife had accused him of being intimate with other women, a charge which he repudiated.

Mr. Wilkinson read the replying affidavits of the applicant and her father in which the allegations were repeated.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Are the parties married in community?]

I am not instructed, my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It is most extraordinary that upon the most important point in the case there is no evidence at all.]

An order was granted requiring the respondent to pay to the applicant £30, to enable her to institute proceedings against him for judicial separation, the interdict to continue against the General Estate and Orphan Chamber, with leave, however, to the Orphan Chamber to pay to the applicant out of the father's estate the sum of £30 above mentioned, and to pay to the respondent the sum of £30 to defend the action, costs to abide the result.

Ex parte BROWN.

This was an application for leave to transfer certain property which the petitioner had vested in his son, Ernest James Brown.

The petition of James H. Brown showed that the petitioner was a builder carrying on business at Claremont. In December, 1902, the petitioner purchased 138 square roods and 138 square feet of ground for £320, which he vested in trust for his minor son. His son was only six years of age, and the property had been transferred to the said son. Petitioner was under the impression that he would have a free and full interest in the said property, and he desired to erect a couple of dwellings thereon. The secretary of the S.A. Association had refused to cancel the sale, as the papers had been signed. Petitioner applied to the Treasurer-General, but the Government refused in any way to vary the receipt thereof. If the property was left in the name of Ernest James Brown, it would be necessary to apply to the Court on all occasions, and petitioner was unable to pay such costs

Mr. C. W. De Villiers for the applicant: It would seem he wished his son to have an amount over and above the original price.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But if he had it in his own name he could have given the son the profits just the same.]

Mr. De Villiers: He said he was ignorant of the fact that he could not part with it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There seems to be an ulterior object in putting the property in the name of the minor.]

Mr. De Villiers: He says his motive was to provide a fund for the son, and if he was able to sell he might make considerable profit.

De Villiers, C.J.: The property which has been transferred to the son belongs to the son, and before the Court can take the property away from the son and give it back to the father there must be a motion brought against the son. A curator should be appointed, and must represent the interests of the son, and upon such an action or motion the Court will consider the matter, but at present the Court cannot, without the son being represented by a curator, give an order which deprives the son of the property which is vested in him by law. There can be no order on the present application.

Ex parte STRUCK.

Mr. Van Zyl applied that the petitioner, as the executrix of her late husband, might be allowed to pass a mortgage bond. The husband died suddenly in the course of the erection of a certain property, on which a necessary bond was to be passed.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte WELKEN.

Mr. Benjamin, for the petitioner, asked for leave to enter into an agreement whereby a transfer of certain property might be effected to the petitioner's surviving son, the mother to have a life interest in the property, subject to certain conditions. A consent paper of the executors was put in.

De Villiers, C.J., said that he thought it better to refer, what he considered to be meaningless conditions, again to the executors.

Ex parte DE JOND AND SONS, LTD.

Mr. Alexander, for the liquidator, presented the liquidator's second and final report. The report as to the assets in Belgium was the same as before.

The usual order as to inspection and advertisement was granted.

Ex parte SNYMAN.

Mr. Close applied for leave to transfer certain property. The petitioner had executed a joint will with her late husband, and had, under a misapprehension, disposed of certain land for the benefit of her minor children.

The sale was confirmed subject to the Master's report.

Ex parte INGALL AND WIFE.

The petition of Horace and Marian Ingall shewed that Marian Ingall was married to Horace Ingall at Worcester, Cape Colony, on the 3rd April, 1903, in community of property. The wife before marriage was a widow, having been married in England twenty years ago. After having lived in Kimberley, she went to England, and there engaged to be married. She then consulted a solicitor, who advised her that the Married Women's Property Act was in operation in Cape Colony. Subsequently she came out here and married Horace Ingall. When the marriage ceremony was performed the petitioners fully contemplated a division of the estate, and were fully under the impression that the Married Women's Property Act operated here. The parties now desired to execute a post-nuptial contract, and prayed the Court to authorise the execution of a post-nuptial contract excluding marital power. In support of the petition,

Mr. Alexander, for petitioners, cited the cases the cases of Ex parte Fricker and Wife (2 Sheil, p. 312), Taylor (5 Sheil, p. 371), Schoombie v. Schoombie's Trustees (5 Juta, p. 189), Ex parte Peters and Wife (16 Juta, p. 442), Ex parte Scott and Wife (7 Sheil, 240), and Moore v. Sayman (4 Sheil, 4).

De Villiers, C.J.: But for the decision in the case of Fricker, I should have hesitated to make an order, but I take it that in the present case there was an understanding between the parties before marriage that the marriage should be without community of property. This petition speaks of a post-nuptial contract. The Court has continually said that a post-nuptial contract cannot be registered. I take it, however, that there was an understanding before marriage that there should be no community of property. That understanding would amount to a contract between the parties that their marriage should be without community, and it may be embodied in a notarial agreement. The Court will grant an order for the registration of a notarial contract to be forthwith drawn to carry out the understanding of the parties before the marriage that the marriage should be without community of property and the marital power excluded, saving all rights of creditors, who became such after the marriage.

Ex parte MAJERU.

Mr. Russell asked for an extension of the return day in this case, and for an amendment in the order of Court respecting the mis-spelling of the petitioner's name.

An order was granted as prayed, the return day being extended until the 1st August, personal service to be effected failing which service by publication once in the native paper, "Imvo," and once in a Johannesburg newspaper.

Ex parte SWANEPOEL.

Mr. Howel Jones applied for leave to sell certain property belonging to a minor and for an order to pay the proceeds into the Guardian's Fund to the credit of the minor.

The Master's report was favourable. report was favourable.

Granted.

CRANKO v. CRANKO. { 1903. June 26th

Will — Construction — Such children as may be born.

The testator, having two children, C. and the plaintiff, made a will in 1861, nominating as heirs C. and such other children as may be born of his marriage.

Held, that the will applied to the plaintiff as well as to C.

This was an action brought by William Cranko against Elizabeth Cranko, sole executrix testamentary in the estate of the late William Cranko, for a declaration of the plaintiff's rights under the said will.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., was for the plaintiff, and Mr. Searle, K.C., appeared for the defendant.

The declaration set forth that the plaintiff, William John Cranko, who was 66 years of age, and resided at Cape Town, was the surviving son of the late William John Cranko. About June, 1862, the parents of the plaintiff executed a joint will, which was drawn up under the instructions of a notary, and in which it was stated that Christina Cranko and such other children as may be born of the marriage were to be the heirs of the estate. The plaintiff, who was born previous to the execution of the will, was excluded from any benefit under the words "may be born."

Mr. Schreiner contended that the words "may be born" did not necessarily mean children born after the date of the will. The words were as consistent with the present as they were with a future interpretation. He held that it was the testator's intention to include the plaintiff.

Mr. Searle stated that he was instructed that the defendant had no desire to exclude the plaintiff from benefit under the will, and that she would be very glad if the difficulty could be got over. Defendant would submit to the judgment of the Court on the point, and felt that she could not argue against the plaintiff's contention.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is Christina a party in this case?]

Mr. Searle: No, my lord.

De Villiers, C.J.: The instructions for the making of the will in question should not be taken into consideration for the purpose of interpreting the will. The words of the will are as follows: "The testator declares to nominate the survivor, together with Christina Cranko and such other children as may be born of the marriage." Taking it in its strictly grammatical sense it may be said that the words "may be born" refer to children thereafter born, but when it is considered that there is every presumption in law against parents disinheriting their children or passing them by, and that at the time when the will was made the parents were bound to leave their children their legitimate portion, the Court migt fairly take it that it was the testator's intention to include the plaintiff amongst the children. In England it has been held that a bequest to children lawfully begotten applies to children born after as well as before the execution of the will. That would not be the strictly grammatical construction but it carried out the real intention of the testator. I am of opinion, at all events, that there is a prima facie ground for holding that the testator's intention was to include the plaintiff, but the Court will not give a final decision on this point until Christina Cranko, who is interested in this case, shall have an opportunity of showing cause. The Court will grant an order calling upon Christina Cranko to show cause by July 13 why the plaintiff should not be declared to have a vested right in the said estate.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

Ex parte TABATA. { 1903. June 29th

Mortgage of entailed property—Native custom.

The applicant, a Tembu, was heir-at-law to his father of a certain farm, which in accordance with the Tembu law of inheritance, would on his death similarly pass to his heir-at-law. He now sought the leave of the Court to mortgage this property, in order to enable him to meet the demands of certain creditors.

Held, that as it was not shown that these debts to the said creditors had been incurred in connexion with the preservation of the said property, the application must be refused. No order was made in respect of costs.

This was an application for leave to pass a mortgage bond on the petitioner's farm in Tembuland, and for leave to raise sufficient money to start farming operations and to defray the expenses of the application. The petition shewed that the petitioner was, according to native customs, the legal heir to his father's farm, but in order to establish his claim thereto, he had become seriously involved through legal expenses. The creditors were at present living on the farm, which was valued at between £3,000 and £4,000. In consequence of certain proceedings in 1887 at Queen's Town, the petitioner had incurred certain costs, and the amounts of £1,009 2s. 6d., £370 and £463, with interest, were due to two of the creditors. The petitioner desired to return to the said farm, but before he could do so, he would have to repay the said sums to the creditors. To enable him to do so, it would be necessary to raise a loan on bond of £2,072 5s. 4. A certificate from the Resident Magistrate at Queen's Town set forth that he was acquainted with all the circumstances of the case, and he considered that the help asked for would be of great benefit to the family, as the farm was going to rack and ruin.

Mr. Close, for applicant; Mr. Searle, K.C., for respondents.

Mr. Searle, K.C., said that the affidavits which he would read did not strictly oppose the application, provided it was carried out with certain safeguards. The affidavit of the son Solomon Tabata set forth that he had supported his mother and his sisters, and that the applicant had never contributed anything to their support. According to the custom of the Tembu tribe, he, as eldest son of the applicant, who was 80 years of age, would be the heir to the said farm, and he believed that his father was under the influence of his uncles. He feared the money would be wasted, although he was anxious that the creditors should be secured. The principal creditor was willing to accept a bond, and allow the applicant and deponent to live on and enjoy the farm during the rest of their natural lives. The affidavit of the respondent Dingey set forth that the rate of interest charged by him was usual among natives. He had given the applicant every assistance, and during his occupation he had done everything possible for the benefit of the farm. The affidavit of Dondola, the third respondent, set out that he had lent the money in all good faith. The rate of interest was usual, and he had erected buildings on the farm.

Mr. Close (for applicant) referred, in support of the application, to Silver v. Silver's Executors (5 Juta, 28).

[Maasdorp, J.: You see he got the property subject to a certain mortgage.]

He had to borrow money to pay off the costs.

[Maasdorp, J.: I do not see how we can vary the Magistrate's order.]

These debts have been running on for fifteen years, and have increased to such an extent as to reduce the applicant to the direst poverty. He cannot even pay his rates and quitrent.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (for the three respondents): I submit that the petition cannot be granted in its present vague form, but I would suggest that the matter should be referred to some impartial person, such as the Resident Magistrate, that he may find out how much of this money has been expended for the benefit of the property. I would point out that there is some incongruity in Solomon (the heir) being joined with the creditors, as it is against his interest that the farm should be mortgaged.

Mr. Close, in reply, I consent to further enquiries being made, and would suggest the Resident Magistrate as the best person to make them.

Mr. Searle agreed that the matter should be referred to the Magistrate to report to the Court as to what amounts had been beneficially, or otherwise, expended on the farm.

Maasdorp, J.: I think with the information now before the Court this application cannot be granted. It seems that the rights of the applicant in this case depend upon a judgment given by the Resident Magistrate of Queen's Town, in which it was found that the said Andries Tabata, being the eldest son of the house of Solomon, was the heir-at-law to the farm which would descend from heir to heir according to the law of inheritance of the Tembu tribes. This property will pass from Andries Tabata to Solomon Tabata, and then to the next heir of this house. According to the affidavits before the Court, it appears that Andries Tabata was seriously involved, and is being pressed by his creditors, and that he got involved in respect of debts which are in no way connected with the preservation of this property. I think the Court could not possibly grant leave to pass a mortgage on this property for the payment of debts of creditors, or as security for the payment of debts of creditors, whose debts have not been incurred in respect of this property. It is quite possible that some part of the moneys mentioned in the affidavits may be in respect of expenditure—past expenditure—upon this property, or for the preservation of this property, and the Court might have allowed a mortgage for such moneys, but it appears from the affidavits that all the debts are not in respect of such expenditure. I think that further information should be placed before the Court before it deals with this matter at all. It has been suggested it might be referred to the Magistrate, but in the position in which the matter now stands it is difficult to decide what points might be referred to the Magistrate. I think the applicant should put his case more fully before the Court, and if he is entitled to relief in respect of any debts he has incurred, the Court will settle the matter when the application is again referred to it. The Court will make no order as to costs.

TABLE BAY HARBOUR BOARD V. BERGL. } 1903. June 29th.

Removal of bar—Specific accounts—Costs.

Where a defendant applied for a removal of bar on the ground that he had been unable to plead owing to certain detailed accounts not having been furnished by the plaintiff, which accounts the plaintiff alleged had been furnished from time to time; the Court removed the bar and ordered the plaintiff to again furnish specific accounts. Costs of the application to be costs in the cause.

This was an application for an order calling upon the respondents to remove a bar of plea in an action pending, and, further, to furnish the defendant (present applicant) with a detailed and reasonable specification of the items in dispute, with costs of application. The affidavits of the defendant's attorneys set forth that they had made repeated application to the plaintiffs, without success, for such specifications, and that it was impossible for the defendant who admitted that he was indebted to the plaintiffs, and had tendered £180 out of the claim of £221, to go to trial without such information.

Mr. Benjamin for applicant; Mr. Searle, K.C., for respondent.

Mr. Searle said that a full and specific account had been furnished, and it looked as if the matter was merely being delayed. Instead of filing a plea, defendants (now the applicants) kept on saying they had no account. With regard to the application for leave to plead, it certainly appeared as if the applicants simply wished for delay.

Mr. Benjamin said that the details were wanted for the purpose of entering a plea. The Harbour Board's allegation was that they had supplied a full and specific account. Counsel then proceeded to read a lengthy correspondence which had passed between the parties in the matter.

Mr. Searle read an answering affidavit to that of the defendant in the case, which set forth that the applicant had been supplied with a full and detailed report.

Maasdorp, J.: The applicant in this matter moves for leave to purge his default, and to file his plea. That part of the application is not opposed by the respondent, and it will consequently be granted. The applicant further applies for a specific account of the items appearing in the plaintiff's declaration. It seems that certain services were rendered by the plaintiff to the defendant in respect of a number of vessels, and certain large items are given in the account annexed to the declaration in respect of the services rendered in connection with these different vessels. The applicant says he is entitled to have a specific account of these large items, and that it is impossible for him to plead until he receives such a specific account. He says that he admits that he is indebted to the plaintiff in certain sums of money, but it is impossible for him to say how far his admissions will go until he receives this specific account. I think it is impossible under the circumstances for the defendant to plead until these specific accounts are rendered, and that he is now entitled to them. When he requested the plaintiff's attorney to furnish him with these accounts, the answer was that these accounts were from time to time rendered. I don't think that is a position which could be taken up, and the plaintiff is bound again to give specific accounts on which his claim is based. It appears that the correspondence proceeded for some time, in which the defendant insisted it was impossible for him to plead. Notwithstanding that, the required information was constantly refused by the plaintiff, and while the correspondence was proceeding, the defendant was barred. These remarks bear largely also upon the question of costs, which has to be decided in this matter. I think the plaintiff is entitled to have specific accounts, and upon the ground that the refusal to furnish them caused the delay in pleading, the costs in this case will be made costs in the cause. Leave is granted to the defendant to plead, and the respondent is ordered to render specific accounts of the items contained in the declaration. Costs to be costs in the cause.

WHITE, RYAN AND CO., v. HILLIARD. 1903. June 29th.

Member of club — Judgment against members collectively —Execution against one of them.

A judgment had been obtained against the members of a certain club collectively for the balance of an unpaid account.

By one of the rules of the Club each member was liable in solidum for all debts contracted by the Committee: and application was now made for leave to issue execution against one individual member.

Held, that as the respondent had not been a party to the suit in which judgment was obtained the application must be refused with costs.

This was an application for leave to issue execution against the respondent for the sum of £166 8s. 2d., in respect of a judgment which was obtained against the Cape Town Club by the applicants, which judgment was unsatisfied. Applicants also asked for costs.

Mr. Benjamin was for the applicants, and Mr. Searle, K.C., appeared for the respondent.

Mr. Benjamin explained that some time ago the Cape Town Club had made application to be wound up under the Companies' Acts, but the application was refused, and the creditors, accordingly, took action separately for the recovery of their claims. All these claims had been satisfied with the exception of this particular one of White, Ryan and Co.s, which could not be met as there were no further funds remaining. Mr. J. T. O'Reilly had been appointed liquidator of the Club, but all the funds at Mr. O'Reilly's disposal had been exhausted, and there were now no assets. Applicants now asked for execution against a particular member, and that was the respondent. Under the rules of the club the members were responsible severally and jointly in solidum for debts contracted for tobacco, wines, etc., for which articles this debt was incurred.

Mr. Searle (for the respondent): This procedure is quite informal. The funds in the hands of Mr. O'Reilly, the informal liquidator, were declared executable, but now the applicants want to make one particular member liable in solidum. The Court refused to place the said Cape Town Club under liquidation, holding that the Companies Act did not apply. The applicants now apply on motion to have the respondent declared liable for the full outstanding balance of account, and attempt to go behind the judgment and writ of execution against the committee of the club.

Mr. Benjamin (for applicants): See Rule No. 2 of the Club, which makes the members jointly and severally liable for all Club debts incurred by the Committee. Hence the respondent is liable through the Committee. We have a judgment against the Committee.

[Maasdorp, J.: In what form?]

I would submit that as there is no precedent for a case of this kind, the ordinary rules of procedure in partnership should be followed. The only point raised is on the question of procedure; but if once judgment has been obtained against a partnership, any individual member may be sued pro solido.

[Kotzé, J.: Having taken out execution against the Committee, can you levy that execution on any particular member of the Club?]

Yes; Rule 2 makes every member liable in solidum.

[Kotze, J.: That rule might possibly estop the respondent from setting up a defence, but how can you ask for execution against a man if there is no judgment against him?]

I do so on the analogy of partnership in an unlimited liability company. Suppose that twenty or more persons enter into a partnership under the common law and arrange that the secretary shall sue and be sued on behalf of the company, and judgment is obtained against him, that judgment can be executed against any member of the company.

[Maasdorp, J.: If a member is liable under Rule 2 for all Club debts, you can sue him, but you have not done so in this case.]

The Committee had to be sued. We did so, and got judgment against them The Commitee were by the rules the agents of each member.

[Kotze, J.: Suppose he says, "I am no longer a member?"]

He must take up that position in his affidavits. The individual members are liable through the Committee.

[Maasdorp, J.: If an individual member is liable, you must surely get judgment against him before you can execute it.]

If we had sued the respondent individually, he would have said that under the rules we had no right to sue him.

It may be that the Committee are liable to the respondent, but he is liable to the applicants in the first instance.

[Maasdorp, J.: The whole question is one of procedure. If the respondent is liable, why do you not bring your action?]

It would be very inequitable if debts could be contracted without somebody being liable.

[Kotzé, J.: Possibly the Roman-Dutch law of sequestration might afford a remedy. I do not say it is so, but you may consider the point.]

[Maasdorp, J.: You cannot cite any case in which execution has been granted against a person who has never been sued?]

If the liability is unlimited you can execute pro solido against any member a judgment obtained against the company. The only grounds on which the respondent can oppose execution is by showing that the judgment has been obtained by fraud or collusion.

Mr. Searle was not called upon in reply.

Maasdorp, J.: It appears that the plaintiffs in this case sued a certain number of persons, in their capacity as members of the committee of the Cape Town Club, and as such representing the said club, for the recovery of the sum of £166 3s. 2d., for goods delivered by the plaintiffs to the said club. Judgment was given upon the summons in that case in the following form: "Defendants having failed to enter an appearance, the Court, on the motion of plaintiffs' counsel, grants judgment as prayed, with the costs, and declares any funds of the club in the hands of Mr. T. J. O'Reilly executable in satisfaction of the said judgment and costs." The applicant in this matter now craves for leave to issue execution against the respondent in this case for the sum of £148 16s. 9d., being the unsatisfied balance of the judgment of this Court, in the sum of £166 8s. 2d. Now, it seems to me that execution is asked for against a person who was not in any way a party to the suit in which the judgment in question was given. The respondent is a member of this club, and it is said that as a member he has rendered himself responsible by the second rule of the Club for the debts of the Club through the committee of the club. That may be perfectly true, and the plaintiff in this case may have a good cause of action against the respondent, or he may not. That is a question which we have not now to decide, but it is quite clear that he was in no way a defendant to the suit in question. Sometimes a provision is made in the rules of these societies by which certain persons are appointed, who may be sued in an action brought against all the members, and if there is such a provision, then it may be said that these persons who are so appointed represent in the action all the members of the club, and that all the members may by that means be made defendants to the suit. But there is no provision of that kind in the rules of this club, and I do not now say what the effect of such a provision would have been if it had been made—if there was a rule to that effect. The closest analogy to this case is suggested by Mr. Benjamin to be that of a partnership, where, on a judgment given against a partnership, execution may be taken out against any member of such partnership. That is true, but that is only when all the partners are made defendants to the suit. I know of no case in which a partner, who has not been joined as defendant in the suit, has been held liable to have execution taken out against him upon a judgment against the partnership. I think this matter should shortly go off upon this point: That execution cannot be taken out against a person against whom there is no judgment. This respondent has had no judgment against him, not having been a defendant in the action which was brought by White, Ryan and Co.; and on that ground execution cannot now be obtained against him by the plaintiff. In my opinion the application must be refused with costs.

Kotzé, J.: Said he was of the same opinion. Assuming that the respondent was liable under the rules of this club, there still remained the question of how that liability might be established against him by the creditors. The present application was that execution should be made to issue against him on a judgment given against a set of persons of whom he was not one. Now, even supposing that the respondent was liable, it did not follow that such an application goes as a matter of course against him. As had been pointed out, he was no party to the suit, and he might have the best defence to an action brought against him.

KOENIG v. LANDESHUT. { 1903. June 29th.

Commission de bene esse — Res judicata—Play rights.

The applicant having applied for a commission to take certain evidence which he alleged to be material in an action to be brought; the respondent objected on the ground that the question to be decided in the said action was res judicata.

Held, that as the question as to whether the said evidence was material or not could not be decided without going into the merits of the case, the application should be granted, but that the question of costs must stand over for further argument.

This was an application upon notice of motion calling on the respondent to show cause why a commission should not be appointed to take the evidence of Ernest Henry Collins and May Pollard, in Melbourne, Australia, and Ernest Wilkinson, in London, and why David Sydney Wandliss should not be appointed to take the evidence of Collins and Pollard in Melbourne, and Frederick Mackerness, to take that of Wilkinson in London.

From the affidavits it appeared that the respondent, who was the plaintiff, sued for the recovery of a large sum of money, which he alleged was due to him as proprietor of certain play rights in respect of plays played by the defendant in South Africa. The defence was that the plaintiff obtained these play rights as the agent for and on behalf of the defendant, but that he wrongfully and unlawfully obtained the assignment of these rights in his own name and without acquainting the defendant of that fact. The contention of the defendant was that under all the circumstances the plaintiff was not entitled to claim from the defendant.

The affidavit of William Templar Bussinne, stated that the evidence of the parties mentioned was necessary and material.

The answering affidavit of Julius Koenig stated that the parties were not material witnesses in the case, that they were in Cape Town when the matter was previously before the Court, and their evidence could at that time have been taken, and that none of the persons was a party to the agreement.

The replying affidavit of W. T. Bussinné suggested that the respondent's opposition to the application was due to a desire to delay the matter.

Mr. Upington (with him Mr. Bisset) for the applicant; Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Alexander), for the respondent.

Mr. Alexander wished to put in an answering affidavit to the preceding one of Mr. Buissinne's, when Mr. Upington objected. The course, he held, was unusual, and he had been instructed to oppose the affidavit being put in.

Mr. Searle said that the second affidavit put in by the applicant had covered very wide ground, and the respondent wished to answer the points raised.

The Court gave permission for the document to be read.

Mr. Alexander then read the answering affidavit of Mr. Julius Koenig. Deponent held that Wilkinson's evidence would be inadmissable, as it would necessarily deal with the private relationship existing between deponent and Wilkinson, who was his attorney.

Mr. Upington (for respondent): This is an application to take evidence of some most material witnesses. The question is whether Koenig engaged to secure the rights in these plays for the company or not. If it is admitted that Koenig acted wrongly in obtaining these rights for himself, I should be quite willing to take my stand on this, but in replication they say that all these matters have been decided by arbitration. They have tendered the bare sum which Koenig paid for the plays; but the deed of submission gives the accountant power to frame statements of accounts, and to decide on whose side the balance lay and what was due from the one party to the other. Nash had power only to make up the account to July 20th, 1902. I admit that the price paid for these play rights came under Nash's instructions. All he had to do was to fix a reasonable sum as compensation for the representation of the plays. If it be said that Koenig had acted illegally in obtaining cession of the plays in his own name, that statement should have appeared on the record. As to the fifth clause of the award, that is very difficult to follow. A play right does not consist in the possession of books or scores, but in the right to perform a play.

Presumably because he had paid for them. (See pages 5 and 13 of the award.) These are inconsistent with the view that the play rights were Koenig's property. The arbitrators only say that the play rights were acquired in Koenig's name. On July 20th, 1902, Koenig's agreement with the company expired. We cannot go back on an award if once it has ben made a rule of Court. But the award does not say that Koenig is the owner of the plays, and now it is sought to draw an inference from the terms of the award. That award does not say that Koenig is the owner of the plays, and such an inference would be inconsistent with par. 5 of the award. Koenig's interest in the Company ceased on July 20th, 1902, but Mrs. Landeshut still continued to perform these plays. If the evidence we wish to take be immaterial, why did the applicants not except to it?

[Maasdorp, J.: That affects the question as to whether the costs of the application should be costs in the cause.]

Mr. Searle, K.C. (for the respondent); If this application be granted, much expense will be incurred. We shall have to get one commission in Australia and another in England. The present applicants applied to have the award made a rule of Court, and we opposed. We wanted the £300 travelling expenses, and the position they took up was that we had the plays and must pay for getting them. The whole question of the terms of the award was then considered, and the Court refused to set it aside. Par. 16 of the award says clearly that the manuscripts are our property. We ask for either a royalty of 15 guineas a night, or for half share of the profits. After having asked to have the award made a rule of Court, they cannot be heard now to say that the arbitrator exceeded his powers. They must now make out a prima facie case to show that these witnesses are necessary. They were ready to go to trial without these witnesses, why then should they be necessary now? Miss Pollard was here, but they did not propose to call her, and yet now she is in Australia they find that her evidence is essential.

We might want to cross-examine, and it would be dangerous not to be represented.

Mr. Upington was not called upon in reply.

Maasdorp, J.: The applicant in this matter moves for the appointment of a commission to take the evidence of certain witnesses whose evidence he says would be material in deciding a dispute between the parties as to their title to certain play rights. It does appear that the evidence which these witnesses are likely to give, as indicated by the affidavits, has a direct bearing upon the capacity in which the plaintiff in this case, and the respondent in this matter, obtained these play rights. The defendant contends that the play rights were obtained by Koenig as her agent, and that, consequently, they really belong to her, and not to Koenig. The respondent alleges that this question between the parties is really a matter which is res judicata, and has already been disposed of by the Court, and although the evidence might have been material on the question of title, that question has been decided. In this action a plea is put in by the defendants claiming these rights, and to that a replication is filed stating that the matters raised in the plea had already been decided by the Court when its order was given upon the arbitrator's award. It is quite possible that these matters have already been disposed of, but that is not a question which we can now decide. It is not quite clear how far the award of the arbitrator covers all these questions in dispute, and in how far his award is decisive as to the title to these play rights. We are, therefore, not prepared to hold that this evidence is not material, upon the ground that the question between the parties has already been disposed of by the judgment of the Court, because that would be really giving judgment on the pleadings in a case to be heard. It is quite possible, when this question is considered by the Court, it might be found that the main question in dispute between the parties in the case has already been decided, and in that case this evidence would be immaterial. The order which the Court will now give will, consequently, be in such a form that if it ultimately appears that this commission should not have been granted, that the costs in the matter will fall on the defendant. The Court will grant leave to take the evidence of the witnesses mentioned in the affidavit on commission, appointing the Commissioners mentioned in the affidavit to take such evidence. The question of costs in the matter must stand over for further argument.

Trespass — Illegal impounding — Act 15 of 1892.

A person who finds cattle trespassing on his land can recover compensation only by either (1) sending the cattle to the pound and claiming trespass money under Schedule C. to Act 15 of 1892, or (2) having the damage assessed by the field-cornet, or (3) by action at Common Law. In any case he must notify his intention to the poundmaster, and having once selected his remedy he cannot abandon it and pursue another.

This was an appeal brought by one W. Dihning (defendant in the Court below) against a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Wynberg, whereby the defendant was condemned to pay to the plaintiff the sum of £5 as and for damages for the illegal impounding of a certain cow. From the evidence led in the Court below it appeared that the said cow, the property of appellant, had trespassed on respondent's property, and eaten certain vegetables. The ground was not properly fenced. Appellant tendered 1s. as damages. It cost appellant and a friend 21s. for horse-hire to the pound where the cow was impounded. Appellant also lost a day's milk's from the cow in consequence of her being driven home; the supply of milk had since fallen off. The plaintiff claimed £5 from the defendant for improper pounding. The evidence for the defence showed that one Williams occupied a portion of defendant's farm, that the damage done by the cow was done on the land so occupied by him, and that he impounded the cow on behalf of Dihning, and received the pound fees.

The Resident Magistrate gave judgment for the defendant with costs.

The Magistrate's reasons were as follows: "The defence relied upon two points:

(1) That Dihning should not have been sued at all; that the action, if any, lay against the witness Williams.

(2) That the cow was properly impounded, inasmuch as the trespass money tendered was insufficient to cover the damage done.

I found that, although Dihning might have been the proper person to sue, as the witness Williams admits that everything was done in his (Dihning's) name and by his direction, yet the amount tendered was insufficient, and the cow was lawfully impounded.

Mr. McGregor (for the appellant): The evidence in the Court below shows that respondent's ground was not properly fenced, and therefore the shilling tendered by the appellant was in excess of the sum fixed by Schedule C to Act 15 of 1892. Then, again, the trespass was not committed on Dihning's land but on that of William's and therefore he, and not Dihning (if anybody), should have been sued.

Mr. Upington (for the respondent): Whether Williams was a mere caretaker or a manager he was clearly a servant of Dihning, and a master is bound by the acts of his servant, executed in the ordinary course of that servant's employ. Dihning was responsible for the acts of Williams, and I therefore submit the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Mr. McGregor was not called upon in reply.

Maasdorp, J.: In this case when the defendant found the cow of the plaintiff trespassing in his garden there was any one of three courses open to him to adopt. He might send the cow to the pound and claim trespass money under schedule C of this Act. If he did so it was necessary for him to send a memorandum to the pound master, setting forth the number of animals sent and giving a description of the property trespassed upon. Or he might elect to have the damage suffered by him assessed by the award of a Field-cornet. In that case also he was bound to send a memorandum to the pound master stating that he adopted that course. Or, on the other hand, he might choose to institute an action to recover the damages suffered by him; and also in that case a memorandum had to be sent to the pound master, stating it was his intention to do so. Now it seems that it is necessary that his election should be made known to the pound master because the action adopted by the pound master thereafter would depend upon such election. We also find under section 75 of this Act, No. 15, of 1892, that no person who has once claimed damages under sections 32 and 33 (that is to say, claimed trespass money under schedule C) shall be competent afterwards to require an assessment by a Field-cornet, nor shall any person who has once claimed such an assessment by the Field-cornet or such trespass money be competent afterwards to seek redress by legal process. It would appear therefore from that that the election must be made by the person sending the cattle to the pound, and he is bound by such election; he cannot afterwards, when he has once decided to adopt one course, change his mind and pursue another. The question, therefore, arises: What was the election that was made by the defendant in this case? Now I must say at once that it seems to be quite clear to me that he never intended to submit the damages suffered by him to the award of a Field-cornet, nor did he intend to seek redress at common law by means of action to claim damages. No memorandum was sent stating such election, or stating that he elected either of these two courses, and it is quite clear from his conduct that he did not intend to adopt either of them. The only course that was open for him then was to claim trespass money, and I think that it appeared from all the circumstances of the case that this is the election that he made. We have no actual evidence as to what memorandum was sent or whether in the absence of such a memorandum as is allowed by law a verbal statement was made setting forth in so many words what his election was. But we have the account put which was made out by the pound master, which is some guide to the Court in this case. From that it would appear that the claim was 1s. 6d. Though it is in the account called damages, to my mind it is clear that it was intended to be the trespass money provided for under Schedule C, and there is another reason for coming to that conclusion, because it appears from the evidence that Dihning himself had suffered no damages, that Dihning consequently could claim no damages, but he could only claim trespass money. The claim of Dihning is therefore based upon Schedule C, and the question arises whether he is entitled to receive 9d. for trespass upon unenclosed ground, or 1s 6d. for trespass upon fenced ground. It appears from the evidence that this ground was not fenced, and consequently the extent of damage claimed was confined to the sum of 9d. Under section 27, where a claim is made by the person upon whose land a trespass is committed, and thereupon a tender is made by the owner of the cattle, if such tender is refused, the owner of the land shall be liable for damages sustained by the owner of the animals by reason of their detention after the date of the tender, unless the tender is found to be insufficient by a competent Court. The Magistrate found that the tender of 1s. which was made was insufficient. Now, there I think the Magistrate was wrong. It seems to me that the Magistrate had in mind at the time the damages which it was said were suffered by Williams, which was stated to be the sum of 5s., but that was not the question which he had to decide at the moment. The question he had to decide was whether the tender made to Dihning of trespass money was insufficient. Dihning having elected to take trespass money, he was entitled only to so much as the schedule would award him. It is quite clear that the schedule awarded him the sum of 9d.; consequently the Magistrate was wrong in finding that the tender was insufficient. Upon that ground, the judgment of the Magistrate must be reversed. We come to the conclusion that the tender of 1s. was more than sufficient, that it should have been accepted, and consequently the plaintiff in the Court below was entitled to some damages. It has been argued that the tender was made to the wrong person, because it should have been to the caretaker, and that there is no evidence to prove that Williams was the caretaker of Dihning. But he himself says: "I look after Dihning's farm." I think that is clear proof that he is the caretaker, and the tender of 1s. to Williams, under the circumstances, was sufficient. We have now to decide whether this matter might be disposed of at once, or whether it is necessary to send it back to the Magistrate to assess damages. In this case it is clear that 4s. 6d. was actually paid by the plaintiff to the pound master, that he was kept out of the benefit of the milk of his cow for a day, and a few shillings ought to be awarded for that. The only question is whether counsel can agree upon some small damages.

Mr. McGregor said counsel preferred to leave it in the hands of the Court, though he would suggest that a sovereign would be a proper amount to allow for the loss sustained by detention of the cow.

Maasdorp, J.: The appeal will be allowed, with costs in this Court and the Court below, and judgment entered for the plaintiff for 15s., damages for detention.

Kotzé, J. concurred.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

WATSON V. BRADLEY. 1903. June 30th. July 8th.

Conspiracy — Unlawful assembly Belligerents.

The defendant, a British subject, joined a commando of the Boer forces after they had invaded the Colony and after they had been recognised as belligerents. The commando, acting under the instructions of their superior officer, took away the plaintiff's horse for use in the campaign, but the defendant derived no personal benefit from the taking beyond riding it for a few hours while it was brought to the superior officer.

Held, that the defendant was not civilly liable in damages for the taking of the horse.

The case of Steenkamp v. Kyd (15 S.C. R. 221) distinguished.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of the Resident Magistrate of Maclear, whereby the defendant (William H. Watson) was condemned to return a certain mare claimed by the plaintiff (C. H. Bradley) and damages £15, or in the event of the mare not being returned, her value, the sum of £60, and £25 as damages, and also costs of suit.

From the evidence in the Court below, it appeared that in 1901 the defendant joined the rebel forces. On September 27 they visited plaintiff's farm, made him a prisoner, and took away a black imported mare, and was subsequently seen by other witnesses riding her. Commandant Myburgh was in charge of the force to which defendant belonged.

[Defendant's attorney applied for a postponement of the case to enable him to call other evidence. Plaintiff's attorney admitted that defendant took the mare while acting under orders.]

Defendant admitted that he had joined the Boer forces, and said that he first saw the mare with one Van Staten. At defendant's request, Van Staten lent him the mare, on condition that he should hand it over to Field-cornet W. Roux. This he did. He was under Roux's orders, and they were a portion of Commandant Myburgh's commando. Van Staten was a Free Stater.

The Court below gave judgment (as above) for the plaintiff.

The Magistrate's reasons were as follows: "In this case the plaintiff claims the restoration of a certain mare alleged to have been taken by the defendant from the plaintiff's farm during the late war. The fact that the mare was taken by the commando of which defendant was a member (defendant being at the time a rebel) is not denied. The plaintiff sought to prove actual taking on the part of the defendant, who, however, denied this, but admitted temporary possession and use of the mare until she was handed over to his commanding officer. Defendant further contended that at the time of the incursion into this district he was acting under the orders of his commanding officer. It would, in my opinion, be a dangerous precedent to lay down that even though a citizen of a state in rebellion against that State be coerced into acts whereby citizens of that State suffer damage, he is freed from liability for reason merely that he is acting under orders of a superior possessing belligerent rights. The defendant by his own act, and an illegal act, placed himself under the orders of an enemy of his own State. The rights of the enemy cannot devolve upon him, and he must be held not to hold the rights of war. Clearly, then, the defendant was engaged in the commission of an illegal act, and was not possessed of the rights of war, and as far as he was concerned, he was a member of an unlawful assembly, and must be held liable for the acts of any and every member of that assembly falling within the reasonable scope of the objects of the assembly (Act 24 of 1886, section 98). In support of these views may be cited the cases of Kaplan v. Hanekom (13 C.T.R., 56), White v. Barnard (13 C.T.R., 160), and Steenekamp v. Kyd (8 Cheil, 260).

With regard to the question of damages, the Court below drew a distinction between the damages sustained by the plaintiff in the event (a) of the mare being returned to him and (b) not so returned. The animal was evidently required for breeding purposes, and her return would enable the plaintiff to make profit out of her as a brood mare. He has also lost the use of the mare for nearly two years, and all his expenditure on her keep has been lost to him and also his chance of breeding from her during that time. Obviously, if the mare is not returned, the chance of profit is irretrievably gone.

Mr. Upington (for appellant): The question of a rebel acting under orders of a superior officer has been decided as to criminal liability. I do not think that any case as to his civil liability has ever been decided. As to criminal liability, see Queen v. Smith (10 Sheil, 486), where the principle was laid down that a soldier acting under the orders of a superior officer was exempted from liability, unless those orders were manifestly illegal. That principle was extended to the case of rebels in a case heard before the Special Court at Mafeking, in which two men, Marais and another, were tried for the crime of murder. The facts of the case were that they received orders that all natives attempting to leave Mafeking were to be shot, and in pursuance of that order, they captured certain natives coming out of Mafeking, took them, and shot them in cold blood. They were brought before the Special Court at Mafeking and acquitted, upon the ground that the principle in Smith's case should be extended to them as portion of the belligerent forces. That principle was also adopted in the case of the King against Geldenhuys and others, which was tried in that Court before Mr. Justice Hopley. He thought, therefore, it would seem clear that Acts that were committed by rebels under the orders of their superior officers were not punishable criminally. He believed that in all these cases the orders proceeded from a person who was a Free Stater, or a Transvaaler, that was to say, an officer who was properly at war with Great Britain. But in the case now before the Court these cases did not seem to have been considered by the Magistrate at all. He seemed to have relied upon the case mainly of Steenekamp v. Kydd, which was reported 15 Sup. Ct. Reports, p. 251, where see the judgment of De Villiers, C.J. (p. 223). That case is clearly distinguishable from this. In that case none of the party had any belligerent rights. They were simply a number of native rebels. Here two nations were at war. Watson was admittedly a rebel, but that fact did not deprive him of belligerent rights. He acted in accordance with the orders of his superior officer, and in conformity with the rules of civilised warfare.

[De Villiers, C.J.: In a recent criminal case a rebel was convicted of the theft of a watch because he had not acted in accordance with the rules of civilised warfare.]

Exactly; but our contention is that here the appellant did act under those rules. In Steenekamp's case there would have been criminal liability. Here there is not, if the rebel was acting under the instructions of an officer having belligerent rights. I submit that a rebel who joined a Boer commando is just as free from civil liability as he is from criminal. He was bound at the risk of his life to obey the orders of his superior officer.

Mr. Benjamin (for respondent): I submit that unless counsel for the appellant can refer to authentic reports of the cases he has mentioned, the Court cannot be guided by them. Moreover, in this case there is no evidence as to who was the superior officer, and there is nothing to show that he also was not a rebel.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Who was Van Staatden?]

If we accept the evidence of the appellant, he was a Free Stater.

[Maasdorp, J.: The Magistrate takes up the position that the appellant was acting under the orders of his superior officer?]

He did not formally decide that. There was no evidence to show that the commando in question had belligerent rights. The onus is on a rebel to show that this was a belligerent commando, and that he acted under the orders of an officer who had belligerent rights. If the horses in question were taken by rebels, the case of Steenekamp v. Kidd is quite in point. There is no evidence to show that any persons save rebels took part in the capture of the horses. The case of White v. Barnard (13 C.T.R., 160) is also in point. The evidence given before the Magistrate shows that the appellant himself took the horse.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The Magistrate did not find that this was a rebel commando, but that the appellant was a rebel who joined the enemy.]

I admit that if that was the fact, the law is against me, but it is a pity that the Magistrate was not clearer on his facts.

[Maasdorp, J.: Suppose an enemy had come and taken these horses under orders of his officer?]

He would have to prove his orders, or he would be a common horse-thief. The appellant does not prove his orders.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Could these rebels have been found guilty of theft?]

Yes.

[De Villiers cited Rex v. Burns (12 C.T.R., 882).]

But see White v. Barnard (13 C.T.R., 160).

[Maasdorp, J.: That was a case of a purely rebel commando.]

Mr. Upington (in reply): The whole basis of the plaintiff's case was that the defendant had taken his horse. The Magistrate does not find that he had done so, but that he had by an illegal act placed himself under the orders of belligerents. It was admitted that the defendant was acting under orders, and that admission was made to save delay in calling witnesses to prove the fact. The case of Rex v. Geldenhuys (Criminal Cases) shows clearly that the orders of a superior belligerent officer excuse even a rebel acting under them. See also Ex parte Marais (11 Sheil, 467).

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (July 13th).

De Villiers, C.J.: The question in this case is whether a British subject who joined a commando of Orange Free State burghers after they had invaded the Colony, and had been recognised as belligerents, is civilly liable in damages for any act of regular warfare committed by such commando in this colony, even if he has neither personally committed such act, nor derived any personal benefit from it. The act complained of was the taking of the plaintiff's horse for the use of the commando. The defendant was a corporal, acting under his superior officer, Field-cornet Roux, and he admitted that he formed part of the force which was sent to obtain horses for their use in the field. He admitted also that he rode the horse when his own horse was knocked up, but he added that the horse had been taken by Van Straaten, a Free State burgher, and that he (the defendant) delivered the horse, after riding it for a few hours, to the Field-Cornet. The defendant, whose evidence as to his not having taken the horse was in conflict with that of some of the plaintiff's witnesses, asked for a postponement of the case in order to produce witnesses to prove his statements, but the application was opposed on the ground that his admissions fixed him with liability. The magistrate supported this view, and held, upon the principles laid down in Steenkamp v. Kyd (15 Juta, 221), that as the defendant formed part of an unlawful assembly he must be held liable for all the acts of that assembly "falling within the reasonable scope of the object of that assembly." It is obvious, of course, that the defendant committed an illegal act in joining the Boer forces, and for his act of treason he appears to have been criminally prosecuted. But the Boer commando cannot be regarded as an unlawful assembly in the proper acceptation of the term, for the Boers had been recognised as belligerents, and the burghers themselves could not be held criminally liable for acts of regular warfare committed by them. This Court was careful in the case of Steenkamp v. Kyd not to lay down any general rule which might have the effect of attaching civil liability to the commission of acts not falling under the class of cases then being dealt with. It was a case of conspiracy to wage war against the Queen, and it was held that the appellant, who had joined in the conspiracy, and had taken a part in appointing a leader to conduct the war, was responsible for damage done to individuals by the orders of such leader, if such orders might reasonably have been anticipated as a consequence of the conspiracy. In the present case the defendant joined the Boer forces after war had been declared, after the Boers had been recognised as belligerents, and after they had invaded the Colony, and there is no evidence whatever to show that he invited or induced the Boers to invade the Colony or the district in which the horse was taken. If the plaintiff's contention in the present case is correct the defendant would be equally liable to a criminal prosecution for the theft of the horse, and, if a single person was killed by the commando after he joined it, he would have been guilty of murder. As I have already remarked, he was certainly guilty of high treason in joining the commando at all, but it does not follow that every act of regular warfare rendered him liable to criminal prosecution for such act. This question appears to have been carefully considered in the case of Maritz, who was tried for murder before the Treason Court at Mafeking on the 7th November, 1901. "It has been urged," said Solomon, J., delivering judgment on behalf of the full Court, "that this (carrying out the ordinary orders of his superior officer) would not be any defence on the part of the prisoner Maritz, as he was a rebel, and cannot cover himself under the orders of Snyman. True, he was an insurgent, and had joined the Republican forces, and therefore every single act he performed with them was an act of treason, but to say that because he is a rebel he is not entitled to a belligerent's ordinary rights is going too far. If we did so we should have to say that every shot fired by rebels is the crime of attempted murder, but no such charge has been brought before us, although there were some hundreds so engaged. The insurgents who joined the burghers must be placed on the same footing as those burghers fighting against us; therefore, we must overrule the point raised by Mr. Hutton." This ruling was followed by Hopley, J., in the case of Gildenhuys, tried before him at the recent Criminal Sessions in Cape Town. It is admitted that the burghers who invaded the Colony were belligerents, and cannot now be sued for damages for any acts committed by them according to the ordinary usages of war. The taking of horses for the purposes of their campaign would not expose any burgher to an action for wrongful conversion. It appears from the plaintiff's evidence that he was taken prisoner by the commando, but released after a few hours. The burghers who took part in this act would certainly not be liable to an action for false imprisonment, nor do I consider that the defendant would be so liable, seeing that the act was a legitimate act of warfare. Although I am not prepared to say that a British subject joining a belligerent stands on exactly the same footing in regard to civil liability as the enemy himself, I am clearly of opinion that he is not civilly liable for acts of legitimate warfare committed by the enemy for the due prosecution of the war and not for his personal benefit. It may well be that if the horse had been found in the defendant's possession after the war he would have been bound to restore it to its owner, but the mere fact that during the war he had ridden the horse for a few hours does not render him liable for the value of the horse, or to pay damages for its detention. The appeal must therefore be allowed, with costs, and judgment entered for the defendant with costs, in the Court below.

Maasdorp, J., concurred.

SUPPLEMENT.

*MCNEILL V. EATON. 1903. May 27th. Aug. 29th. Sept. 11th.

Lease—Tenant's right of back entrance to premises leased—Damages.

A lease of premises includes everything necessary for the due and proper enjoyment and occupation thereof.

Where, therefore, a house with yard and stable was let to the plaintiff.

Held, that she was entitled, in the absence of anything to the contrary, to a right of way through the yard of the defendant, such being the only exit from her yard and stable to a public thoroughfare.

The defendant, as lessor, who had obstructed the plaintiff in the due and reasonable enjoyment of this right of way, held liable in damages for the loss and inconvenience caused thereby.

This was an action for £500 damages brought by Margaret Jane McNeill, a boarding-house keeper, of 62, Strand-street, against William Eaton, a butcher, residing at Cape Town, for wrongful obstruction.

The declaration set forth:

1. That the plaintiff carried on business as a boarding-house keeper in Cape Town.

2. About 22nd October, 1901, a written contract was entered into between the parties, by which the plaintiff hired 62, Strand-street, for one year on a lease, and with an option to renew the contract.

3. Under certain conditions the defendant agreed to keep the outside portion of the premises in a good and efficient state of repair.

4. About the month of October, 1902, plaintiff exercised her option as to a renewal of the lease.

5. About January, 1902, defendant wrongfully and maliciously obstructed the plaintiff's premises by causing a small gate to be erected in the rear of the house.

6. As a result, the plaintiff was unable to keep a horse and cart, as she intended.

7. The defendant from time to time locked the gate, and prevented plaintiff from going into Palace-lane, thereby depriving her of the beneficial use or occupation of the said premises. She had been compelled to quit the premises, and suffered damages to the extent of £500. Wherefore she claimed:

(a) Damages to the amount of £500.
(b) Interest a tempore moræ.
(c) Alternative relief.
(d) Costs of suit.

The defendant's plea admitted the first four paragraphs in the plaintiff's declaration, but alleged that it was provided by the lease that the rent should be paid per month in advance from November, 1901, and that the lease should be cancelled if the plaintiff failed to pay as stated. Plaintiff failed to pay the rent on the 1st February, 1903, within the seven days stipulated. The defendant denied that Palace-lane formed any part of the premises leased, or that the plaintiff had any right to use it for any traffic. The defendant was always willing to allow the plaintiff to use Palace-lane, and alleged that persons could pass freely through it at all reasonable times. He further denied that the plaintiff was compelled to quit the premises, or that she suffered any damages, and prayed for a dismissal of the plaintiff's claim, with costs.

* (This case was by an oversight omitted from its proper place.)

The plaintiff's replication was general.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Rainsford) for plaintiff; Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Benjamin) for defendant.

Mr. Searle called the plaintiff.

Margaret Jane McNeill. She stated that the premises she hired from the defendant in October, 1901, consisted of thirteen bedrooms, dining-room, kitchen, and several outhouses. The plan put in by defendant's counsel showed the adjoining property, which was also owned by the defendant. The defendant showed her over the house, and explained that she could have free access to the house through Palace-lane. When she rented the house there were no obstructions of any kind. The stables had been used previous to her occupation of the house. The occupants of the house used the back exit freely for a time, but shortly afterwards the defendant put up wire netting, and made a sort of cage of it, and also erected a gate. Subsequently he erected another gate towards Palace-lane. For a time the defendant allowed them to use the passage, and as a result of an action the plaintiff was compelled to repair the premises in September, 1902. When plaintiff renewed the lease, Mr. Saber, the defendant's agent, promised to have the obstruction seen to. She told Mr. Saber that she intended getting a horse and cart. About December, 1902, the defendant turned very nasty and locked the gate at intervals through the day. The defendant kept poultry in the cage, and one of his men kept the key. Witness wrote several letters to the defendant and his agent, but things got very much worse, in fact relations were strained ever since she won the action against him in the Magistrate's Court. Many of the boarders left the house on account of the obstruction. Rubbish had been lying at the back for as much as eight days, and on several occasions for four or five days. At the beginning of February, 1903, plaintiff wrote, stating that if the defendant did not remove the obstruction she would be compelled to leave. After a notice had been sent from a law agent the gate was locked more frequently than ever. In reply to the notice, defendant's attorneys wrote stating that access had been given as a matter of grace, and that the defendant retained the right to close the gate between sundown and sunrise. In her business she could make £1 profit on every boarder, providing she had between 25 and 30 in the house.

Cross-examined by Sir Henry Juta: Witness never complained to the defendant about his fowls, nor was she aware that the defendant had complained to her about missing some fowls. Witness could not give the dates when she reported the refuse lying at the back of the house. Witness claimed damages from December, 1902. She expected that the defendant would leave the gate open during the night. She could not explain how the sanitary men removed the rubbish if the gate was locked, but witness was positive that the gate was locked on several occasions during the month of January. Witness had partly bought the cart on the belief that the gate would be thrown open. She had never tried to sub-let the premises, neither had she applied to the agent to convert the premises into a coffee shop.

Archibald McNeill, husband of the plaintiff, said that before the lease was entered into, he saw Mr. Saber, the defendant's agent, who explained that there was a large stable and some outhouses, which he could reach through Palace-lane. When he entered the house, the passage was free for a couple of months, but at the end of that time the netting was put up, and subsequently the gate was erected. When he saw Mr. Saber, the agent said he would remove the obstruction. Dozens of times on his return from work he found the gate in Palace-lane locked. The cart could easily have got in through the back gate.

Cross-examined by Sir Henry Juta: He was not aware that the stables had been condemned by the municipality. He thought it most absurd to go and see the sanitary authorities as to whether he might keep a horse. The sanitary authorities condemned the coachhouse as unfit for habitation when they discovered there an old man, whom witness put up as a matter of charity. The gates were locked about 6 or 7 months after he took up residence.

Percy Reid, railway guard, said he was living at plaintiff's boarding house from May 25th, 1902, up to January 31 of this year. He left on account of not getting access to the back. While he was at the house the back gate was locked from time to time during the day. It was always locked at night. In December and January matters became worse in respect to the back gate being constantly closed during the day. Twelve other boarders left. It was a great inconvenience to many of the boarders, who, in their working clothes preferred to enter through the back.

Cross-examined by Sir Henry Juta: Mrs. McNeill's inner gate was locked during the night.

Beatrice McNeill, daughter of the plaintiff, said that about the beginning of December she heard her mother say to Mr. Saber: "What about the obstruction?" Saber said he had no time then, but that he would see about it. In about January, 1902, witness heard Saber tell plaintiff he would have the obstruction removed. The gate was constantly locked in the day time in January. In February witness did not think she found it open day or night.

Aletta Coxitt, previous tenant of the premises in question, deposed that during her tenancy of three years she let the stable. A cart used to be brought through the gate during the first year. When Mrs. McNeill came, witness left. Horses were kept there without objection being raised by the sanitary authorities up to the time witness left. The entrance was always open. There was no gate in the passage when witness was there.

Cross-examined by Sir Henry Juta: Witness had no knowledge of the stable being condemned during plague time. She received the rent of the stable up to September.

William Joseph Smith, plumber, said that in January of this year he was living at the house. On one occasion, on a Sunday, between 9 and 10 in the morning, witness saw the gate padlocked. In the following week, between 5 and 6 at night, he also found the door locked.

Henry Meckish, police constable, gave evidence as to seeing the gate locked at about 6.30 one evening in January. His attention was called to it by Mrs. McNeill. He was on duty in Waterkant-street at the time.

Mr. Searle closed his case.

Sir Henry Juta called

Alfred P. Preston, sanitary inspector, in the employ of the municipality, who said that in April, 190 he was a boarder at the house. The netting was put up by Eaton to keep his fowls in. Witness considered that the putting up of the gate by Eaton was a proper precaution. A complaint was made in January in connection with the removal of the refuse. Witness went up to investigate. He found both gates of Eatons open; plaintiff's gate was locked, and Mrs. McNeill had to fetch the keys to admit him. Witness made inquiries as to the cause of the non-removal of the refuse. He made no complaint to Eaton as to the omission being due to obstruction. There was another complaint in February, which witness investigated. He found that the Corporation employee was to blame. Witness had visited the place every other morning for about six months up to March this year, and had always found Eaton's gate open. Witness had no interest whatever in this case. The stable was in a very bad state when witness was there. He had never seen a horse in it. There was no drainage to the stable. No one would be allowed to keep horses there. An ordinary vehicle could not enter Palace-lane without damaging the walls.

By the Court: Witness had not seen any trace of a padlock on the outer gate.

Wm. Hy. Morton, sanitary inspector, gave similar evidence. His duties frequently took him to Palace-lane. Witness was never stopped or incommoded in removing refuse by these doors being locked. No complaint was ever made to him in this respect by his subordinates. Witness had never found the doors locked. Plaintiff had told witness the doors were locked, but witness never saw a door locked.

Wm. Eaton, the defendant, said he bought the premises in September, 1901. Palace-lane was frequented by loafers at night, and witness kept fowls. Mrs. McNeill complained on one or two occasions of the fowls going into her yard, and witness put up netting, with a gate, fastened by a hook, in the middle. At night a locked chain used to be put around the post. On the outside there was formerly an old gate, of which the remains could be seen when witness took over the property. Witness replaced this with a new gate, which was fastened at night by a padlock. Witness's workmen began at 5 a.m., and one of the men, who slept on the premises, locked the door at night and opened it in the morning between five and six. In December witness heard plaintiff wanted to get a horse and cart. Witness had to have his carts specially made in order to bring them into the lane. On the hotel side, witness had had down pipes let into the wall, in order to allow room for the carts to come in. Notwithstanding this, the carts frequently damaged the wall when they were brought in. An ordinary cart could not be brought into the lane. Witness did not begin to lock the gate during the day in January. Witness was quite agreeable to give reasonable access, but he would not leave his place open at night. There was no reason why witness should close the gate at any time during the day. No one had ever complained to witness at any particular time of the door being locked. There were negotiations about the sub-letting of the house. Mrs. McNeill asked if she could convert the front room into a shop; witness refused. When application was made about the keeping of a bogie and horse, the McNeills were referred to the sanitary authorities. As McNeill did not go in accordance with notice, witness once closed the gate in February. Witness saw Mr. McNeill with a policeman at the gate on that occasion.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: Witness told a boy who came into the yard with coal in November to "clear out." This was not because he objected to coal being brought that way to Mrs. McNeill's, but because the boy kicked witness's dog. Witness denied that the place had been closed during the day before February; the evidence of the witnesses who said that the gate was closed during the day time was untrue. The man who had charge of the yard could lock the gate whenever he liked.

Alfred W. Bam said he had known this property for between 30 and 40 years. Witness's father put up a gate at the place where the present gate was. This was done to keep out the rowdy crowd, who assembled about the place, there being a couple of canteens there at the time. Witness's father owned certain of the cottages there. There were still remains of the old gate. During the daytime the old gate used to be open; at night it was always closed. In his father's time it was impossible to bring a cart through. Witness had never seen a cart going in there. Until Mr. Eaton got the place no cart was brought through. The passage was used chiefly for the conveyance of rubbish from the houses.

Alfred B. Saber, agent for defendant, deposed to having let the premises to Mr. McNeill. Witness said nothing about a stable or coach-house. Witness never promised to remove any obstructions. He might have said he would see to it, but he had no power to undertake that certain things would or would not be done. Witness never communicated with Mr. Eaton asking him to remove the gate or wire. Plaintiff had approached witness in regard to subletting.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: Mrs. McNeill had written in December, 1901, complaining that Mr. Eaton had put up a gate, and so caused an obstruction. Witness did not remember any verbal reference to the obstruction by any of the McNeills.

Charles Bass, foreman to Mr. Eaton, said the dfendant's gates were always open during the day. They were never locked during daytime, to witness's knowledge. No one had ever complained to witness about the gates being locked.

Sir H. Juta closed his case.

Mr. Rainsford (for plaintiff): The assignment of the lease to the applicant provided that these premises should be let as a boarding-house. The premises are not fit for this purpose, as the only passage into the house led through the dining-room. Again, the defendant told plaintiff that she (plaintiff) could go through the back entrance to see the premises. Defendant's contention that the plaintiff had no right to the use of this passage is quite untenable. Mr. Saber's evidence shows that his recollection of the transaction is not very clear, and on some points his evidence is in conflict with the documentary evidence. As to the wire gate at the back, the defendant says it was put up to keep his fowls off plaintiff's property at her request, but the correspondence shows that this was not so. She complained of the obstruction as soon as the gate was put up. In a letter to Saber, she and her husband refused to renew the lease until it was removed, and Saber promised to see about it. In view of this admission by Saber, we cannot question the evidence of the plaintiff and her husband. The evidence that this gate was locked at all hours of the day in January and February of 1902 is very strong. As to what defendant says about the impossibility of using the stable, see Cochrane's evidence and the plans showing the width of the passage. There is no evidence to show that the stables were ever condemned. The evidence shows that a considerable number of boarders left in consequence of the back entrance having been closed.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (for the defendant): This case raises a novel and interesting point, as there are so many houses in Cape Town without back entrances. Representations and guarantees have nothing to do with this case. The case is founded on the lease itself, and nothing appears on the pleadings about any representations previous to the lease. The plaintiff's case is that she has been deprived of the use of certain premises by something that we did on our own property, which we had not leased; and she claims a servitude of via and actus by night and by day over our premises. Now, she cannot establish a servitude, so she must contend that this passage was let to her as part of the premises. If so, she must be the lessee of it.

That would be a servitude, and in our law there is no such a thing as an implied servitude.

[Kotzé, J.: A servitude may be created by stipulation, and you may be estopped from denying it.]

We have no doctrine of estopple. The question is, has a servitude been created? The lease does not show that it has.

[Maasdorp, J.: But if you lease a property, you grant everything necessary for the enjoyment of that property.]

She had a front door, and I do not admit a back door to be necessary. The Court is now asked to import into the lease something which is not there. The lease only gives her the house No. 62. Strand-street.

[Maasdorp, J.: Has she any right to the yard?]

The yard is a part of the property leased; but you cannot vary a written document by a previous verbal agreement. Suppose Eaton sold his property to Brown, would Brown be bound by this supposed right-of-way without registration? Therefore the right to the use of this passage cannot be given by the terms of the lease. If the passage was leased to the plaintiff, clearly we had no right there. Even English law would not put the right to a back entrance on the ground that it is part and parcel of beneficial enjoyment, but on the ground of intermittent and continuous easements. The latter (e.g., right to a drain) go with the property by implication of law; the former (e.g., a right of way) do not. See Woodfall on Landlord and Tenant (pp. 150 and 151, 16th edition); Tawe v. Knowles (Q.B. 1891, Vol. 2, 564). To show that this back entrance is not part and parcel of beneficial use, I refer to Brown v. Alabaster (37 Ch. D., 490). Here the pleadings do not allege that the back entrance was included in the lease, but that we put up a gate on the plaintiff's property. The evidence shows that the gate was on our property. They do not claim this lane under their contract, nor as a servitude, nor as a via necessitatis.

[Maasdorp, J.: Is it not a via necessitatis?]

A via necessitatis depends upon the degree of necessity. See Peacock v. Hodges (Buch., 1876, p. 69). Here access was obtainable by the front entrance, so it is impossible to hold that the back entrance was a via necessitatis. The gate was put up in December, 1901, and the declaration alleges that access was cut off in January, 1902, so I do not see on what plaintiff's case is based, as she renewed the lease in October, 1902, months after the date of the alleged obstruction. She certainly cannot claim in respect of any obstruction which took place before October, 1902.

Mr. Rainsford was not heard in reply.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (September 11th):

Kotzé, J.: The plaintiff in this case leased from the defendant certain premises known as 62, Strand-street, for the period of one year commencing from the 1st of November, 1901, with the right of renewal. The lease was so renewed for another year. Besides a front entrance from Strand-street to the premises, which had for several years been used as a boarding-house, and were likewise hired by the plaintiff for that purpose, there is a back entrance from Palace-lane, through a yard belonging to the defendant. The premises leased have attached to them at the back a stable for two horses and a small enclosed yard, which, by means of a gate, has an exit through a larger yard at the back of other buildings belonging to the defendant into Palace-lane, which is a public thoroughfare communicating with Waterkant-street. Before the lease was entered into, Mr. Saber, the defendant's agent, said to the plaintiff's agent, who was acting for her, that the house had a nice stable and a back entrance from Palace-lane. Before the plaintiff entered into occupation, the defendant had caused some manure to be removed from the stable, and after she had been in occupation about two months, he put some wire-netting over his yard. This was done for the purpose of keeping poultry in the yard in connection with the business of the defendant, who is a butcher by trade. The defendant also put up two gates, which he at first kept locked occasionally, and afterwards regularly at night, and eventually he locked these gates during different portions of the day as well. The plaintiff had from time to time complained to Saber about this obstruction, who, according to her statement and that of her daughter, promised to have it removed. This Saber denies, but he admits that he may have said that he "would see to it." The plaintiff on one occasion also spoke to the defendant personally about the obstruction caused by the gates, and he replied that he would do as he pleased. The plaintiff's case is that she has been seriously hindered in the free use and occupation of the premises through the acts of the defendant, which justified her in quitting possession, and she also claims £500 as damages suffered through the alleged wrongful conduct of the defendant. In his plea, the defendant denies that the plaintiff has any right to use any portion of the premises as a stable or coach-house, or that she had any right to use Palace-lane for vehicular traffic, or that the premises leased would admit of vehicular traffic. He also pleads that he was at all times willing to allow the plaintiff to use the lane for herself, her servants, and boarders, at all reasonable times, and did so allow them, not as a matter of right, but of grace, and did so construct the woodwork and netting that the aforesaid persons could pass through the same. He also admits that at certain times he closed the gates. It is proved that at one time the plaintiff had as many as forty boarders, and she says that she made a profit of £1 per boarder per month. To enable her to do this, she would require to have from twenty-five to thirty boarders a month. Several boarders left the plaintiff, as they could not, when returning from their work, come in during the night or day through the back entrance, as before. This, it is said, was due to the gates which had been put up and kept locked by the defendant. It is also proved that for the same reason a chimney sweep had to enter the house through the front door and dining-room, and in the same way coal and lime had to be taken through to the back. So, also, by reason of the obstruction, the house refuse was not regularly removed from the plaintiff's yard. Early in December, 1902, the plaintiff, by letter, informed the defendant's agent, Saber, that she had purchased a bogie cart, and again requested that the obstruction might be removed, for without that, she was unable to get the cart into her yard, and by way of answer, she was referred to the defendant's attorneys. She subsequently wrote again, pointing out that the cart and horse were intended for use in connection with her boarding-house, in order to remove baggage to and from the Docks. Nothing was done, however, to meet her wishes, and on the 27th January, 1903, she once more informed Saber that, unless the obstruction were removed, she would be compelled to leave the premises, and early in February she did leave.

The material question in the case is the right claimed by the defendant to put up the netting and gates, and keep the latter locked, so as to prevent the plaintiff from passing freely from her back yard through the defendant's yard into Palace-lane. The written contract of lease must be looked at to see if there is any clause in it dealing with this point. I do not find any express mention of a right of passage in the lease itself. All that is stated is that a certain lease situated at No. 62, Strand-street, is leased to the plaintiff, who shall have the full, free, and undisturbed use and occupation thereof. Now, when premises are leased and a backyard and stable are attached to and form part of the premises they must be taken, unless something to the contrary appears in the contract, to be included in the lease. As, therefore, the stable forms part of the leased premises, it follows that the plaintiff cannot have the full and free use and benefit of this stable, unless she has an entrance from and exit to Palace-lane through the yard of the defendant. A cart and horse could not be expected to reach the plaintiff's yard and stable in any other manner. A lease of premises includes all those things which are necessary for the due and proper enjoyment and occupation thereof. Therefore, quite apart from the assurance given, before the lease was executed by the defendant's agent to the plaintiff's husband, who was acting for her, as to the right to use the back entrance from Palace-lane, such right must be taken to be included in the contract of lease. The defendant consequently was not justified in preventing the plaintiff from exercising this right. Of course, the plaintiff was only entitled to the reasonable exercise of this right. She could not, for instance, insist that the defendant should not keep poultry in the yard, or make any other reasonable use of it, and even lock the gates at night for the protection of his property. This was quite recognised by the plaintiff, who stated that if the gates had been locked at night only she would have raised no objection. The defendant, however, went further, and also locked the gates at different times during the day, insisting that he had a right to do so. In this he was mistaken. He was not entitled to deprive the plaintiff in this way of her right of passage through the yard. In consequence of this she has sustained loss and damage. The defendant alleges that no cart can get through Palace-lane, which is six feet wide, and will not admit of the passage of a cart. But it appears that he himself had a cart of smaller width which used to go through the lane, and it is quite clear that a small cart with a width if 4 feet 6 inches could pass through the lane and on to the plaintiff's yard. I do not think that any special damage was sustained through the inability to keep a cart and horse by reason of the acts of the defendant. At any rate, there is no proof of such specific damage. Then the fact that several of her boarders left the plaintiff, because the gates were locked, must not be carried too far, for it may be said that if a boarder found the back gates closed in the daytime he could have entered by the front door, and if he came home late at night he could have been provided with an ordinary latch-key. Still, inconvenience and loss were suffered in this respect, and the plaintiff's right was interfered with by the defendant. In addition to that, coal and other things which should have come in by the back entrance, had to be carried through the front door and dining-room of the house, and there was also the annoyance of the house refuse not being regularly removed. Taking all these circumstances into consideration, coupled with the fact that repeated requests were made by the plaintiff for the removal of the obstructions, of which no notice whatever was taken, I think that a sum of £50 will be a fair amount to award as compensation by way of damages, to the plaintiff. There will therefore be judgment for the plaintiff for this amount, with costs.

Mr. Justice Kotzé added that his brother Maasdorp agreed with him in this decision.

APPENDIX.

Judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the Appeal of The Commissioner of Public Works, representing the Colonial Government of the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope v. Logan, from the Supreme Court of the Cape of Good Hope; delivered the 12th June, 1903.

Present at the Hearing:

Lord MACNOUGHTEN, Lord DAVEY, Lord ROBERTSON, Lord LINDLEY and Sir ARTHUR WILSON.

[Delivered by Lord Davey.]

The short question in this appeal is, whether the respondent is entitled to compensation for lands expropriated by the Government of Cape Colony for purposes connected with a railroad constructed through the respondent's land.

The land in question is part of a farm called De Draai Farm or Kruispad, which was originally granted by the Government to one Schalk Willem Pienaar on perpetual quit rent, and by the deed of grant, which is dated the 1st November, 1838, the grant is expressed to be made subject to certain conditions therein mentioned and as "being further subject to all such duties and regulations as either are already or shall in future be established respecting lands granted under similar tenure."

It has already been decided by this Board in The Divisional Council of the Cape Division v. De Villiers (2 A. C. 567), and it is not disputed that lands of this tenure are subject to the provisions of the Proclamation of Sir John Francis Cradock of the 6th August, 1813, for the conversion of loan places to perpetual quit rent. By this Proclamation it was provided that every holder of a loan place, on his making application by memorial to the Government for the purpose, should have a grant of his place on perpetual quit rent to the same extent as he had theretofore legally possessed the same on loan. Sections 4 and 11 are as follows:

Section 4: "The Government reserves no other rights but those on mines of precious stones, gold, or silver, as also the rights of making and repairing public roads and raising materials for that purpose on the premises; other mines of iron, lead, copper, tin, coals, slate, or limestone are to belong to the proprietor."

Section 11: 'This perpetual quit rent" (meaning apparently the land held on that tenure) "shall further not be liable to any other burthens but those to which all freehold lands are already subject or which may hereafter be further prescribed."

Under later legislation the powers of the Government in respect of the making of roads were vested partly in Road Commissioners and partly in Divisional Councils. The provisions of the earlier Ordinances and Acts for this purpose were consolidated in Act IX. of 1858, intituled "An Act to provide for the Management of the Public Roads of the Colony," the material sections of which, for the present purposes, are as follows:

"Section 10.—The Chief Commissioner or any Assistant Commissioner or any officer duly appointed by the Governor and acting under the authority of the Governor may enter upon and take possession of so much of any land belonging to Her Majesty the Queen as may be required for the purpose of any main road and for the erection of toll-houses, toll-bars, residences for workmen, or for any other purpose relating to the execution of this Act; and they may enter upon all such land lying convenient to a main road, and there dig, get, and carry away any stone, clay, or other materials which may be required or serviceable for making or repairing any main road.

"Section 11.—For the purpose of making any such main road, and of providing any such toll-houses and residences as aforesaid, and generally for any of the objects of this Act, the aforesaid Commissioners of Roads, or other officer by them duly authorised, are hereby invested for the purpose of so doing with all and singular the legal rights, if any, belonging to the Government of this colony in respect to the taking of any land and the raising and carrying away materials for making and repairing public roads, whether such rights have been preserved to the said Government by the proclamation of His Excellency Sir John Francis Cradock, bearing date the 6th day of August, 1813, permitting the conversion of lands on loan into places on perpetual quit-rent, or have been created by express stipulation or condition in any grant of freehold property, or exist in any other way or manner whatsoever: Provided that no land be taken or materials be raised or carried away as aforesaid without previous notice to the proprietor thereof.

"Section 12: If any of the aforesaid Commissioners of Roads, acting under the authority of the Governor, should require to take or use any land or to dig, get, or carry away any materials situated as aforesaid, belonging to any person who may not be bound by law to allow the said Commissioner so to do without requiring any recompense or payment, and who may think proper to require compensation from the said Commissioner—or if he should require to use any land or to take materials from any land that the Government may have a legal right to use, but which has been improved by cultivation, irrigation, or otherwise—he may treat and agree with every such person for the purpose or hire as the case may be of any such land or materials, and may enter into any contract relative to the obtaining of such land or materials, and for compensation for the use of such improved land, upon such terms and conditions as he shall judge expedient."

And the same section further provided, in case of disagreement between the owner of the land and the Commissioner as to the amount of the purchase money, or hire, or other recompense to be respectively given and accepted, for the same to be settled by arbitration as therein appears.

By section 3 of Act 19 of 1874, which provided for the construction (amongst other railways) of a railway from Worcester to Beaufort West, all and singular the powers which were by the Act 9 of 1858 bestowed upon the Commissioners of Roads in regard to taking or acquiring lands and materials necessary for the making or repairing of any such main road as in the said Act mentioned or of any works in connection therewith, were bestowed upon the Governor or any person charged by him with the making or maintaining of railways precisely as if the said powers and authorities were, mutatis mutandis, therein again set forth, and as if the said railways were public roads.

The railway from Worcester to Beaufort West was constructed partly on lands forming part of the farm now belonging to the respondent, and a station called the Touw's River Station was made there. Previously to and in the year 1885 the Government acquired portions of the farm for the purposes connected with the railway, including the building of an hotel, and paid Du Plessis, the then owner of the farm, £350 in respect of such expropriation. According to the evidence of Mr. Elliott, the General Manager of the Government Railways, that sum was paid because of the hotel, which he thought was not quite a railway purpose.

On the 16th December, 1896, the Government gave notice to the executors of Du Plessis (then deceased) of their intention to expropriate a further portion of the farm in extent 160 acres. The land appears to be required for certain purposes connected with the existing railway other than construction or maintenance thereof. By deed of transfer, dated the 24th February, 1897, the farm was conveyed to the respondent, who thereupon became and is now the registered owner of it. The respondent bought with notice of the notice of 16th December, 1896.

Lengthy negotiations thereupon ensued between the Government and the respondent respecting his right to compensation for the land expropriated under the notice of 1896, and respecting certain rights of water. In the result, the respondent, on the 25th of July, 1900, commenced the present action against the appellant, and by his declaration he claimed (amongst other things) a declaration that the land claimed to be expropriated since 1885 was not required for railway purposes, and restoration of the same to him, with damages. At the trial the other issues were disposed of, and as it appeared that the respondent was quite willing to the expropriation going through provided compensation was paid, the parties agreed that the issue be determined whether the respondent was entitled to compensation in respect of the expropriation.

The Supreme Court gave judgment, dated the 6th May, 1901, for the respondent, declaring him entitled to compensation for the land expropriated. The reasons for the judgment were stated by the Acting Chief Justice, Sir E. J. Buchanan.

It is admitted that the land in question has not been improved by cultivation, irrigation, or otherwise within the meaning of the 12th section of Act IX. of 1858, and that the appellant's right to expropriate the land without payment of compensation is derived from the proclamation of 1813, which (as he contends) is extended by the 11th section of that Act to the other purposes mentioned in that section.

The question therefore turns exclusively on the proper construction of the 11th section. Does that section mean that the right of taking land and materials for the making and maintenance of roads reserved to the Government as regards quitrent lands by the Proclamation of 1813 are extended and made applicable to the other purposes mentioned in the section? Or is it only a transfer section, whereby the existing powers of the Government tales quales are transferred to and vested in the Commissioners? If the former is the true construction, the decision should be in favour of the appellant, for their lordships think that the power, if extended to taking land for new purposes, must be a power to expropriate without the payment of compensation as reserved by the Proclamation. It must be admitted that the language of the section is capable of either construction. In favour of the appellant's construction, it may be argued that the whole section is governed by the opening words, "for the purpose of making any such main road and of providing any such toll-houses and residences as aforesaid, and generally for any of the objects of this Act." And that the words "for the purpose of so doing" are repeated after the word "invested." On the other hand, if the object was to extend the existing power to new purposes, which is equivalent to the creation of a new power of expropriation, you would expect a much more direct expression of the intention, and it may be pointed out that the section extends to freehold lands as well as quit-rent, and the existing powers which had been created by express stipulation or condition, or in some other way or manner as regards freeholds, might well be powers which would be sufficient for some or all of the purposes mentioned so as to satisfy the words of the section. Their lordships are disposed to adopt the narrower construction of the section, which would make it a transfer only of the existing powers from the Government to the Commissioners as more conformable with the language used. But their lordships are also influenced by the consideration that the effect of the appellant's construction would be to take away the respondent's property without any compensation. Such an intention should not be imputed to the Legislature unless it be expressed in unequivocal terms. This principle has frequently been recognised by the Courts of this country as a canon of construction, and was approved and acted on by Lord Watson in delivering the judgment of this Board in The Western Counties Railway Company v. Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company (7 A.C., 178, at p. 188).

Their lordships therefore agree with the conclusion of the learned judges in the Supreme Court, though not, perhaps, for quite the same reasons. They are of opinion that the respondent was not bound by law to allow the appellant to take the land for the purposes for which they are required without recompense, and he is therefore entitled to compensation under the 12th section of the Act. They will therefore humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal be dismissed. The appellant will pay the costs of it.

CASES DECIDED IN THE SUPREME COURT, CAPE COLONY.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice, the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D., and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

VAN DER BYL AND CO. v. SOLOMON. { 1903. July 2nd.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for an order confirming a writ of arrest executed against the defendant on an unsatisfied judgment for goods sold and delivered. It transpired that the defendant had been arrested while aboard in the Bay ready to leave the country.

The defendant, who said he spoke Arabic, could not be made to understand the nature of the proceedings, and eventually the case was ordered to stand over pending an interpreter being procured.

Subsequently the defendant was questioned through an interpreter. He admitted the debt.

The Court confirmed the writ, and gave judgment for the amount, with costs.

ADMISSIONS. { 1903. July 13th.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for the admission of Gottlieb Wilhelm Antoine van der Lingen as an advocate.

Application granted, oath to be taken before the Registrar of the High Court at Bloemfontein.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., moved for the admission of Charles Frederick William Struben as an advocate.

Application granted and oath administered.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved for the admission of Heneage Bidewell Edwards as a conveyancer.

Application granted and oath administered.

GENERAL MOTION.

CRANKO v. CRANKO.

Mr. Benjamin, for the plaintiff, moved for an order declaring the respondent of unsound mind and appointing a curator bonis, and for the rule nisi to be made absolute, calling upon Christina Cranko to show cause why plaintiff shall not be declared to have a vested right to one-half of the joint estate of the late W. J. Cranko.

Mr. Close, for the curator ad litem, offered no objection.

Evidence was tendered by Dr. Elliot as to the imbecility of the respondent. He held out no hope of her recovery.

An order was granted declaring the defendant of unsound mind, and appointing Mr. Steytler as curator of the property, and the defendant's mother as personal curator, the rule prayed for in terms of a special case to be made absolute, costs to come out of the estate.

SOUTH AFRICAN MINERAL WATER CO. v. LLOYD AND OTHERS.

Mr. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence for £306, less £100, paid on account by virtue of certain conditions of sale for a certain property, wherein the first-named defendant made himself bound as principal debtor, and the second and third named defendants were liable as sureties, judgment to be against all three, one paying the others to be absolved, with interest and costs of suit, and also for the property to be declared executable.

Order granted as prayed.

GOODMAN V. GOODMAN. { 1903. July 13th.

Foreign judgment — Provisional sentence — Fraud.

The Court will not enforce a foreign judgment where such enforcement would constitute a fraud upon the person against whom it is sought to be enforced.

This was an application for provisional sentence on a judgment of the late High Court of the Transvaal for £390 on certain promissory notes, with costs.

The affidavit of Philip Goodman (the defendant and brother of the plaintiff), stated that he was a contractor residing at Sea Point. He was formerly in business in partnership with one Benjamin Greenberg, in the district of Pretoria. He admitted that he signed the promissory notes, but he denied that he owed the money to the plaintiff, or that the plaintiff made any advances to the said firm.

The replying affidavit of the plaintiff stated that he made the advances to the firm, and that his brother signed the notes, and he was liable.

Mr. Benjamin for plaintiff; Mr. Close for defendant.

[De Villiers, C.J. (to Mr. Benjamin): I was looking over the papers of the Landdrost's Court, and I see no proof of service on the present defendant. On the other hand, however, the defendant has not raised the question.]

The defence is a most extraordinary one. The defendant was losing money on the business, and he wanted to dissolve, but his partner would not agree, and the defendant then signed notes for money advanced by his brother to the firm. It is difficult to understand the defendant's object in setting up such a defence, unless it is to defraud his partner.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I think "fraud" is a very strong word to use in such a matter.]

Perhaps it is, but at any rate, it is most difficult to understand the line of action pursued by the defendant. I submit that the Court should give provisional sentence on the judgment of the Court of the Transvaal.

Mr. Close submitted that this was not a matter for provisional sentence at all, but one in which the whole case should be gone into, to decide whether the defendant was liable for these alleged promissory notes.

De Villiers, C.J.: The Court is asked to grant provisional sentence upon a judgment of a Landdrost's Court of the late South African Republic in an action against a firm consisting of the present defendant and one Greenberg. From the records of that Court it appears that the summons was servel on Greenberg but not on the defendant. The action was for the amount of certain promissory notes made by the firm in favour of the plaintiff. The defendant admits that he was aware of the action being brought in the Transvaal, but he states that it was at his own request that the action was so brought against the firm under the following circumstances. He had lent the money himself to the firm, but not wishing to let his partner know that he had advanced the money he had the promissory notes made in the plaintiff's favour.. When they fell due he requested the plaintiff to sue on them, and the plaintiff having obtained the judgment against the firm now seeks to enforce it against the defendant, who is the real creditor. If these statements are correct the defendant stands convicted of disingenuous conduct towards his partner, but not of fraud. On the other hand, assuming again that the defendant's statements are true, it would be a fraudulent act on the plaintiff's part to take advantage of a foreign judgment in his favour by suing in this Court the person who is really entitled to the benefits of the judgment against his partner. At the time of the judgment the defendant was domiciled in the Transvaal, and consequently the objection which existed to the enforcement of the judgment in Acutt, Blaine and Co. v. Colonial Assurance Co. (1 Juta, 402) does not exist in the present case. But it would, in my opinion, be a fatal objection that the enforcement of the judgment would constitute a fraud upon the person against whom it is sought to be enforced. At this stage of the case I wish to express no opinion as to whether there has been such fraud or not, but I consider that the defendant ought to have an opportunity of proving the statements made in his affidavit. The plaintiff must, therefore, be advised to go into the principal case, and the question of costs will abide the result.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

PEARNE AND ANOTHER V. MOHAMED. { 1903. July 14th.

Mr. Close moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £2,000, with interest from January 1, 1903.

Order granted.

LURRING V. ESTATE DINOR.

Mr. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence for £1,225, being the balance of the purchase price of certain houses and land, with interest.

Order granted.

AFRICAN BANKING CORPORATION V. GRAND JUNCTION RAILWAYS.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., moved for provisional sentence for the sum of £54,800 on twenty-two promissory notes.

As there was a provisional order of sequestration against the estate, the matter was allowed to stand over till the 12th September.

SHAW BROTHERS V. CROSSE.

Mr. Greer moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note.

Order granted.

PHILIP BROS. V. SUTTON.

Mr. Buchanan moved for a decree of civil imprisonment on an unsatisfied judgment for £84 17s. 3d. and £6 5s. 2d costs, with interest accrued.

Kotzé, J., said a letter from the defendant set forth that he was a watchmaker at East London, earning £9 a month, and had to maintain a wife and six children.

Mr. Buchanan said that the defendant had settled £1,000 on his wife.

The matter was allowed to stand over till the first day of the next term.

GIRATIE V. GODDESS.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for the provisional order for the sequestration of the defendant's estate to be made final.

Defendant admitted that he owed the debt to Giratie, but said he had been misled from the beginning with regard to the property he had purchased. He was a blacksmith, and had been misled by an agent with regard to a bond of £800 on the property.

His Lordship said he could not go into that matter now.

Order made final as prayed.

Order granted accordingly.

MEAGER V. WOLFF

Mr. Pyemont moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £22, rent due from the 6th April to the 6th June, 1903, for an order of ejectment from the premises occupied by the defendant, with interest a tempore morœ, and costs of suit.

Order granted as prayed.

LYONS V. THORNTON.

Mr. Close moved for judgment under Rule 329d, for £30, rent due for tenancy of a certain house at Claremont for four months. Counsel stated that a rule had been issued against the defendant restraining him from removing certain furniture pending an action to be brought. The order was made returnable for the 1st August. The summons was issued, but defendant did not enter appearance, and the action could not, therefore, come on on the 1st August. He asked that the costs of the rule be included in the present orderd.

Kotzé, J., said that the rule was not returnable until the 1st August, and he did not see how counsel could obtain costs at present. He could only give judgment on the summons now before the Court. Judgment would be given for the rent, with costs.

FINDLAY AND CO. V. SANDERS.

Mr. Nightingale, for the plaintiffs, moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for the sum of £347 5s. 6d., being the balance of an amount due for goods sold and delivered to the defendant at his special instance and request.

Mr. Pyemont, for the defendant, applied for a postponement, and put in an affidavit by the defendant, which set forth that owing to a change of attorney he was unable to come to Court. He admitted his indebtedness in the sum of £47.

Mr. Nightingale opposed the defendant's application. The amount he was instructed to apply for judgment on was £347, and the defendant had had ample notice of the claim.

Order granted as prayed.

CLUVER V. MARES.

Mr. Nightingale moved for judgment under Rule 329d for the sum of £91 10s. 8d., and also for the sum of £4 11s. 6d., being 5 per cent. on that amount for collection, and also for 6 per cent. interest on the original amount, with costs.

Order granted.

NIEMAN AND LEWIS V. WEINTROB.

Mr. Benjamin moved for judgment for the sum of £55 for work and labour done, with interest and costs of suit. The defendant had, he said, admitted his indebtedness to the amount of £50. Counsel was instructed to accept judgment for that amount, with costs.

Order granted accordingly.

REHABILITATIONS.

Mr. Alexander moved for the rehabilitation of Annie Fitz Neville and Arthur James Pearson, trading as Neville and Pearson. Counsel stated that the insolvents applied about four months ago, and were given leave to apply again in three months.

Application granted.

Mr. Close moved for the rehabilitation of Michael O'Reilly.

Application granted.

Mr. Alexander moved for the rehabilitation of Jacob Cosay.

Application granted.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for the rehabilitation of Frederick Hendrik Elstadt.

Application granted.

Mr. Benjamin moved for the rehabilitation of Jacob Stephanus van der Spuy.

Application granted.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

GEZWINT V. GEZWINT. { 1903. July 14th.

Mr. Alexander, for the applicants, Daniel Gezwint and others, moved for an order declaring the respondent Dirk Gezwint, of unsound mind, and the appointment of Daniel Gezwint as curator, with power to go into previous business transactions of the respondent.

Mr. Russel, for the curator ad litem, did not oppose the application.

The evidence taken on commission by order of the Circuit Court at Oudtshoorn, set forth that the respondent was of infirm mind, and quite incapable of managing his affairs. There was no objection to the appointment of Daniel Gezwint as curator.

Kotzé, J., pointed out that, with the information before him, he could not grant the latter part of the motion. The curator would either be in a position to pay for a law suit, or he could proceed in forma pauperis. An order would be granted declaring Dirk Gezwint of unsound mind, and appointing his eldest son as curator of his person and property, costs of the application and evidence to come out of the estate.

Ex parte MABUYA.

Mr. Greer moved for the rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act to be made absolute.

Order granted as prayed.

THOMAS V. THOMAS.

Mr. Alexander moved for a decree of divorce, with costs against the defendant, in default of compliance with an order to return to the plaintiff on or before the 30th June.

Order granted as prayed.

HERBERT V. HERBERT.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers applied for the return day to be extended for directions as to service. Counsel stated that the order of the Court was that personal service should be effected on the defendant, who was sued by his wife for divorce. The defendant had been in Johannesburg, but the petitioner was informed that the sheriffs of the Transvaal had been unable to find him. The defendant's relatives stated that his whereabouts was unknown to them. Petitioner asked that the return day be extended and that service be authorised to be made on the defendant's solicitors in Johannesburg.

The order of the Court was that the return day be extended, the defendant to return to his wife by the 13th August, failing which to show cause on the 31st August why an order for divorce should not be granted, service to be effected on the defendant's solicitors.

CONSTABLE V. CONSTABLE.

Mr. Benjamin moved for a decree of divorce, with costs, defendant having failed to comply with an order for the restitution of conjugal rights by the 30th June.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte DE WET AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for the appointment of a curator ad litem to the petitioners' mother, who is a private patient in the Valkenberg Asylum.

Application granted, Mr. Advocate de Waal being appointed curator ad litem, and the summons being returnable for the 13th August.

ASSIGNEE OF INSOLVENT ESTATE WEIDNER V. BRAND. } 1903. July 14th.

Trustee in insolvency—Contempt of Court.

Leave given respondent to file an affidavit in answer to applicant's replying affidavit, which introduced new and material matter. The Court does not lightly presume that a person failing to do a specific act ordered by the Court neglected to do so ex contemptu.

This was a motion for an order for committal of the defendant for contempt of Court in failing or refusing to comply with a judgment of the Court given in April last directing the defendant to render an account of his administration of the affairs of the plaintiff, and all moneys, documents, and securities received by him, and all moneys disbursed by him as agent of the plaintiff,, payment of such sum of money to plaintiff as should be found due to him, and delivery of all documents and securities belonging to the plaintiff.

Mr. Close, for the defendant, asked that the matter be allowed to stand over in order to enable the defendant to answer certain affidavits filed late last week.

Mr. Benjamin opposed the application, and contended that there was really no ground for postponement. Counsel proceeded to read the affidavits of the assignee and others showing that the defendant had not complied with the order of the Court. Sums amounting to £1,600, paid by Weidner to the defendant, were not accounted for.

Mr. Close read the answering affidavit of the defendant, which detailed a number of transactions. Defendant should have complied with the terms of the order of the Court so far as lay in his power, and he was at the time of such order being granted in communication with the plaintiff's attorneys with a view to the settlement of the matter.

Mr. Benjamin read replying affidavits in which attention was drawn to certain items in the account, in respect of which it was alleged that payments were shown to have been made by respondent on the plaintiff's account, which were in excess of the amounts due, and for which no vouchers had been produced. It was stated that although the purchase price of certain property sold on Weidner's behalf had been paid to the respondent this payment was not referred to. Weidner did not consider that he was indebted to the respondent, but was sure that if a full and correct acount were given it would shoy a balance in his favour. He was unable to do anything until the respondent submitted a full account from 1901, when the dealings between the parties commenced.

Mr. Close urged that on the replying affidavits the respondent should have an opportunity of putting before the Court the facts. Specific allegations had been made, which were of a fresh character.

Mr. Benjamin said that the affidavits were served on the respondent on Friday. All that the plaintiff wanted was that respondent should give him a full account from 1901.

Kotzé, J.: In this matter, in April of this year the Court granted an order against the respondent, by which he was ordered, first, to file a true and proper account of his administration of the affairs of the plaintiff, and also of all moneys and documents received by him in connection as agent for the plaintiff; secondly, to properly debate that account; and thirdly, to make payment to plaintiff of such sum of money as was found to be due, and to deliver all documents and papers belonging to the plaintiff. Now the applicant says that the respondent has failed to comply with that order; that he has handed him an account which is incomplete, and which does not disclose all the transactions, and that the account is out by about £1,600. On the other hand, Brand says that the account is a true one, and that there is a balance of something like £1,184 in his favour. After Brand had filed this account, about four days ago, Weidner filed a replying affidavit, in which he alleges that there are four specific sums of money received by Brand which he does not account for in the account he has furnished. The respondent asks for time within which to answer this affidavit, which introduced new and important matter, and it seems to me that reasonable time should be given for that purpose, because the account begins in January, 1902, and these four items all relate to transactions in June and August of the previous year. Now I must observe that I do not think this account is exactly the account that the order of Court calls for, and I do think that Brand should file a more specific account, showing distinctly all the items on the credit and debit sides. This account is not an account in the ordinary sense; it is only a memorandum. On the other hand, the Court does not presume that a person, failing to do a specific act ordered by the Court, intended to commit a contempt, of which there must be satisfactory proof. Under these circumstances, I see no reason why I should grant the application for the attachment of the defendant for contempt of Court, and I think he should have an opportunity of answering the affidavit. Therefore, the application should stand over, and he can file his affidavit in the meantime. The matter will stand over till the first day of next term.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Syfret, Godlonton and Low. Respondent's Attorneys: G. Trollip.]

Ex parte TEDBURY.

Mr. Russell moved for an order confirming the sale of certain property in which minor children were interested, in terms of the Master's report, and for leave to pass transfer. The Master's report was favourable.

Granted.

MELEKOV BROS. V. HIGGO.

Mr. Rainsford moved to have made absolute a rule nisi calling upon the respondent to show cause by the 18th May, 1903, why an interdict should not be granted restraining the respondent from molesting or interfering with the applicant, or his employees and assistants.

Granted

HILLS V. THE COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. Close, for the applicant, moved for leave to appeal in this matter to the Privy Council.

Mr. Howel Jones, on behalf of the Government, said that he was instructed not to oppose the application.

Leave was accordingly granted.

Ex parte VAN DER MERWE.

Mr. Alexander applied for leave to transfer certain property, which had been sold to an executor.

Granted.

Ex parte MATFIELD.

This was a similar application, for an order confirming the sale of certain property to an executor.

On the motion of Mr. Bisset, the Court granted an order as prayed.

Ex parte WALPOLE.

Mr. Nightingale moved for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to issue certified copies of a certain deed of transfer and mortgage bond, which had been lost in course of transit through the post.

A rule nisi was granted calling on all persons interested to show cause on the 13th August why certified copies should not be issued, the rule to be published in a Port Elizabeth and a Cape Town paper.

WILLIAMS V. TABLE BAY HARBOUR BOARD.

Mr. Bisset applied, under Rule 25, to have judgment signed against plaintiff, who had not proceeded with her case within the specified time, and for costs.

An order was granted as prayed.

NDABA AND ANOTHER V. NZOBO AND OTHERS.

Mr. Benjamin moved for an order compelling respondents to hand over certain title deeds. The applicants desired to sell certain ground, of which they were part owners, but could not pass transfer without being in possession of the title deeds, which were in the custody of the respondents, who were also part owners. Respondents had had notice of this application.

The Court ordered the respondents to hand over the title deeds of the farms Polyglon and Simpson, situated in the district of Matiele, to the Resident Magistrate at Matiele, who is to transfer the same to the Registrar of Deeds at Cape Town, in order that transfer might be effected of two eleventh shares in each farm to the purchaser, Samuel Wm. Kirk, the respondents to pay the costs of this application.

Ex parte LOUWRENS AND CO. AND OTHERS.

Mr. Bisset moved for the appointment of Mr. Dirk Pearce as provisional trustee in the insolvent estate of Elias Block, and for leave to the trustee to sell certain property in the estate.

Granted.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

Ex parte HARRIS. { 1903 July 17th.

This was an application for leave to purchase a certain farm for £1,400 for George Hy. Harris, a minor, the son of the applicant, Fred. John Harris, and to pay a sum not exceeding £40 for necessary costs and transfer out of an inheritance of £1,540, standing to the minor's credit in the Guardians' Fund. Petitioner, who resided in the division of Aliwal North, considered the opportunity of purchasing the farm for his son a good one, as the farm was an excellent one, well watered, and sufficient for the purposes of starting a young farmer in an independent way. The Master did not exactly oppose the application, but he did not favour it because of the hypothetical contingency that the boy might not wish to be a farmer when he grew up.

Mr. Close (for the applicant): There is no reason for the Master's opposition. This is a very satisfactory family arrangement, and the minor cannot possibly be prejudiced as the price of the property it is proposed to purchase is very reasonable. Numerous affidavits could be obtained to show that this is a good investment for the money.

The leave was granted as prayed.

Ex parte EDWARDS.

This was a motion for an order authorising the Master to distribute the estate of the late John Renny, or Rennie, who died intestate at King William's Town in 1888. The petitioner was Amelia Isabella Edwards, of South Hackney, London, and she claimed to be entitled to one-half of the sum of £3,000 now in the hands of the Master as belonging to the estate of the late John Renny: the children of her late sister, Elizabeth Francis Beamish, being entitled to the other half. The late John Renny was one of a family of eleven children of William Wood Mash Renny and his wife, of London. The parents died in the Marylebone Workhouse, and as far as petitioner knew, the whole of the members of the family were dead, except herself. Her sister, Elizabeth Francis, was married to one William Beamish, and she died in 1880. There was issue of the marriage several children, who survived her. Petitioner was born on the 1o March, 1825. Her brother, the late William Renny joined the 73rd Regiment of Foot, and came out to South Africa, and he died at King William's Town on the 4th August, 1888. The petitioner presented certificates accounting for the whole of the family, except the petitioner and the children of her late sister, and one William Henry Renny, who came out to South Africa after his brother, and transferred from the 33rd Regiment to the 73rd Regiment of Foot. His death was sworn to by a lady residing at Port Elizabeth.

Mr. Close moved.

De Villiers, C.J.: I do not think that the order should be granted at once. There should be ample time for other possible beneficiaries to come forward. The widest circulation should be given to a notice calling upon all persons concerned to show cause. There is certainly a strong prima facie case in favour of the view that the applicant and her sister's (Mrs. Beamish) children are the sole heirs, but it is possible that other heirs may come forward if it is extensively advertised, and ample time should be given for them to come forward. You may take a rule calling upon all persons concerned to show cause on the 1st November next why an order should not be granted as prayed, the rule to be published once in the "Government Gazette," once in the Cape Town English newspapers, once in a King William's Town newspaper, and once in the "Daily Telegraph," London, as I suppose that has the widest circulation of any newspaper.

Postea (November 2). The rule was made absolute. (See report under that date.)

Ex parte BRISENDEN.

Mr. Pyemont moved for an order confirming the sale by the petitioner, who was a minor, of his half-share in a block of property at Graham's Town.

The Master recommended the confirmation of the sale.

Order granted in terms of Master's report.

DUTTON AND CASTLE V. TABLE BAY HARBOUR BOARD.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for the rule nisi calling on the defendants to show cause why the plaintiffs should not be allowed to sue in forma pauperis, to be made absolute.

Order accordingly.

Ex parte LOUWRENS.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for the removal of the petitioner's name from the roll of attorneys and notaries, as petitioner, who was of Mossel Bay, desired to go to London, England, and intended to seek admission in the Inns of Court to qualify for the bar.

Application granted.

Ex parte GRAY.

Mr. Benjamin moved for leave to sue by edictal citation one Wintor, for £288 6s. 5d., due for professional services, etc., and also to attach certain landed property at Woodstock belonging to the defendant, so as to found jurisdiction for the purposes of the action. The defendant had gone to New Zealand in consequence of ill-health, and petitioner had reason to believe that he intended to take up his permanent abode there.

Rule granted calling upon defendant to show cause on the 12th October.

Ex parte VENTER.

Legitimacy—Presumption—Children.

The presumption that children born in wedlock are the children of the husband is not rebutted by the wife's admission that they are not his children, or by the fact that she has been found guilty of adultery, or by the fact that at the time of their birth he was over eighty years of age, or by all these facts combined in the absence of any evidence of incompetency on his part or of non-cohabitation with his wife.

This was a motion for an order authorising the cancellation or amendment of a certain mortgage bond. The petitioner, who resided at Kraaifontein, in the division of Colesberg, obtained a decree of divorce against his wife on the ground of her adultery. Some time ago he passed a mortgage bond to one J. K. M. Venter, in favour of his children, to the amount of £800, that was to say, £100 each. When the divorce trial took place, the defendant admitted that two of the children were born to the man with whom she was alleged to have committed adultery. The petitioner now asked, seeing that he had ignorantly and wrongfully donated the sum of £100 each to the said two illegitimate children, that the bond should be amended so far as the illegitimate children were concerned, or otherwise to have the said bond cancelled, and have a mortgage bond passed simultaneously at his own expense in favour of the legitimate children for £600.

Mr. Burton moved.

[De Villiers, C.J.: This is a most extraordinary application to make—to propose to take away from the two children this property without giving them an opportunity of being heard.]

Mr. Burton: I feel that that is so.

De Villiers, C.J.: Besides, the petitioner has given it, the money is theirs; is it to be taken away from them because of their misfortune that they were born illegitimate children? We have nothing to do now with the woman, it is the two children. Every presumption is in favour of their being the petitioner's children, and I would not take her admission as proof that they are not his children. I could not set that bond aside without an action brought against these children to have it declared that they are not his legitimate children, and even then the difficulty would be how, after this property has been given to them, are you to take it away from them without any fault on their part?

Mr. Burton: There is no consideration. The consideration named by the donor was "natural affection," and he now finds out that he has been imposed upon and that the children are not his children. Under these circumstances it is not to be expected that he should feel the natural affection of a parent for them. At the same time, I fully feel the force of the objection raised by your Lordship, and cannot press this application strongly.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It may be unfortunate for him, but it is a serious thing to take away from people property like that which is vested in them. I think that an action should be brought to have this deed set aside, if it was obtained by the fraud of the mother on their behalf, and a curator would have to be appointed for these children, and evidence would have to be given clearly proving that this man, who was living with his wife at the time, was not the father of her children.]

Mr. Burton: The fraud of the mother might be very difficult to prove.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is quite impossible to grant this application. It is true that in the divorce proceedings against the applicant's wife she made a statement to the effect that he is not the father of two of their children, but her statement cannot prejudice the rights of the children. The presumption is that these children, who were born in wedlock, are his children, and the clearest possible proof of incompetency or of non-cohabitation would be required to rebut that presumption. The applicant is not likely to be able to produce such proof, seeing that he himself recognised the two children as his and made the donation to them in the belief that they were his children. The adultery proved against the wife in the divorce proceedings was committed after the birth of the two children, but even if it had been committed before their birth the presumption would still be in favour of their mother's husband being their father. He is said to be over eighty years of age, but that fact is surely not sufficient to prove inability to procreate children, more especially in view of the circumstance that up to the present time he has recognised the children as being his. The children have had no notice of this application, and without the appointment of a curator ad litem to represent them it would be quite impossible to bastardise them even if they had received such notice. Without in the least implying that the plaintiff would succeed in setting aside the donation on proof of the illegitimacy of the children, I am clearly of opinion that, upon the facts before the Court, the applicant is not entitled to succeed.

[Applicant's Attorney: S. J. Mostert; Respondent's Attorney: G. Trollip.]

Ex parte GIBSON.

Mr. Close moved for the cancellation of an order of Court authorising the sale of property at the corner of Rose and Strand streets, Cape Town, to Skuys and Bank, for £6,300, by the executors of the estate of the late Thomas Short, and empowering the petitioner, who is secretary of the South African Association, to sell the said property by public auction or otherwise. Skuys and Bank assented to the application, and stated that they were totally unable to raise the purchase price.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte SMALL.

Mr. Pyemont moved, on behalf of the petitioner, as executor dative under the transfer to herself of property at Swellendam, sold by public auction for £227.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte ABRAHAMSON.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for an order authorising the amendment of a deed of transfer of property and certain mortgage bonds by the insertion of the correct name of the petitioner.

Order granted as prayed

Ex parte MANN AND OTHERS.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved for petitioners for leave to raise on a mortgage £1,000 on certain landed property belonging to the estate of which petitioners were executors testamentary, and in which estate certain minors were interested.

The Master did not oppose.

Order granted as prayed

BURNARD V. AFRICAN MERCANTILE COMPANY. { 1903. July 17th. „ 20th.

False representation—Prospectus of company—Taking shares of company—Companies Act, 1893, § 86—Rectifying register of shareholders.

The applicant, on the faith of a statement in the prospectus by a company to the effect that 20,000 out of 30,000 shares had been subscribed for, informed the secretary that he would take 1,000 shares, but, upon afterwards discovering the fact that only about 18,000 had been subscribed for, he refused to become a shareholder without having derived any benefit from the shares.

Held, on an application for the rectification of the register that the applicant was entitled to have his name deleted.

This was an application on notice, calling upon the respondent company to show cause why the applicant's name should not be deleted from a list purporting to be a register of the members of the company.

The affidavit of Mel. Jacobus Burnard, the applicant, stated that his name appeared on what purported to be a register of the members of the African Mercantile Company, Ltd., of 69a, Bree-street, Cape Town, as the holder of 1,000 shares in the company. He had not applied for or been allotted any shares, nor had he made claim to any shares. His name had been placed on the register without his knowledge or consent. He had written, asking that his name should be deleted, but this was refused, and he had consequently been obliged to come to the Court with the present application. Deponent stated that owing to certain representations made verbally to him, and owing to the statements made in the prospectus of the company, he agreed to enter the service of the company as manager at a salary commencing at £600 a year, and 2½ per cent. commission on the net profits. It was stipulated that as a condition of his accepting the office, he should take 1,000 shares. To this he at first demurred, as he only desired to take 500, but he was informed by the secretary of the company, Mr. Du Toit, that it was an irrevocable condition of the articles of association that the manager should, in his own right, have at least 1,000 shares. If it had not been for the statement that 20,000 shares had been subscribed, he would have broken off all negotiations. It was stated in the prospectus that the 20,000 shares had been taken up. He subsequently accepted the management on the terms stipulated. He was in the service of the company from the 1st May until the 26th June, but had not been paid any salary during that time. During this period he was not at all satisfied with the way in which the company's business was conducted. No proper books were kept. He had complained to the managing director and secretary. No meeting of the directors had taken place to his knowledge, and he had repeatedly asked to have his appointment recorded in the minutes. The position became intolerable, and after taking legal advice, he decided to withdraw from the service of the company. The affidavit further set forth the circumstances of the establishment of the company, and alleged that certain things agreed upon between the partners of the original company in Holland had not been carried out. When the first prospectus was issued in February, shares to the amount of £20,000 were therein stated to have then been taken up, but in a subsequent prospectus, issued in June, it was stated that 19,650 shares had been taken. That included 2,500 shares alleged to have been taken by a Mr. Potgieter, which were repudiated by him, the applicant's 1,000 shares, and a large number of shares taken up since the first prospectus was issued. Applicant therefore contended that the statement in the original prospectus that 20,000 shares had been taken up was false. Further, four shares were unaccounted for in the register, which was contrary to the provisions of the law. He had demanded to see the register, but was first told there was none. Subsequently he saw the register, upon which his name appeared. Mr. Eloff, who was stated in the prospectus to be a director, had published a notice in "Ons Land," stating that he was not a director.

The answering affidavit of Mr. Gournay, one of the directors of the company, stated that, while the statement of Mr. Burnard that a condition of the articles of association that the manager should hold 1,000 shares was not strictly correct, the secretary, in stating this, was correct in substance, and acted bona fide, the directors having decided, at a meeting, that the manager should hold 1,000 shares. The affidavit denied the applicant's allegations in other details, and said that the statement in the first prospectus that 20,000 shares had been taken up was made bona fide, but a number of people who had promised to take up shares had failed to do so.

Mr. Alexander for the applicant; Mr. Burton for the respondent.

Mr. Alexander: This is an application under section 86 of Act 25, 1892. That section corresponds with section 35 of the English Companies Act of 1862. The English Courts have granted rectification of a list of shareholders on motion. See Palmer's Company Precedents, (part 1, pages 1,051 and 1,052).

[De Villiers, C.J.: Was the applicant induced to become a shareholder by misrepresentations in the prospectus?]

Yes; see section 10 of applicant's replying affidavit. Goerne admits that the number of shares named in the prospectus is incorrect. Even innocent misrepresentation may entitle us to have our name removed. Moreover, no specific shares have been allotted to us.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Mr. Burton, what have you to say about the errors in the prospectus?]

Mr. Burton (for the respondents): The whole question is, was Burnard induced by the offer of the managership of the company to take 1,000 shares? It was represented, no doubt by the secretary of the company, that it was a rule that the manager must hold 1,000 shares, and that representation was, I admit, incorrect; but the question is whether the applicant was thereby induced to take the shares. The evidence as to the meeting at the Hansa Hotel, on April 9, does not bear out the applicant's contention in the least. In paragraph 19 of his affidavit the applicant admits that he knew he would have to take 1,000 shares. He could not have been influenced merely by the statement in Du Toit's letter; as before that letter was written he had agreed to accept office on the terms offered, and was willing to take 500 shares. He then offered to take 1,000 if his salary was to be £600 instead of £500. To this condition the directors agreed. I submit that the applicant has not made out his contention that he was induced to take 1,000 shares by the offer of the managership. Before these shares had been taken he received the articles of association, and they would have shown him, even on a cursory inspection, that as manager he was not bound to take these 1,000 shares. He does not repudiate the transaction as to these shares till June 25. On several occasions Goerne asked for money due on these shares. On June 10 he objected to pay up—not because he had been induced to buy by false representation, but because he was not satisfied with the way the affairs of the company were being conducted. On June 26, he fully sets forth his reasons for leaving the company; and in these reasons he says nothing about having been induced by false representations to buy shares. Instead of that he complains of the prospectus and of the way the books were kept. Even supposing that the offer of the post of manager was a material inducement to the applicant to take 1,000 shares, can he, after lying by since April 11, now come forward and disavow what he has done. He was manager of the company, and in that capacity he had free access to all their books and papers. As to lying by, see Buckley's Company Law (6th edition, section 86, Notes). As to the number of shares (and this brings me to the applicant's next contention), the only question is whether he is, or is not a member of the company. He complains of the management of the company, but these complaints have nothing to do with this case. The applicant further complains that the prospectus states that 20,000 shares had been taken up, but it is clear that 19,650 had actually been subscribed for, and the difference between these figures is quite inconsiderable, and therefore if the statement as to the 20,000 shares was made bona fide, the Court will not relieve the applicant. I submit it was bona fide, for the explanation given by the respondents as to the discrepancy in these numbers is quite intelligible and satisfactory. Some of the applicants had failed to keep their promises, and hence the shares which had been assigned to them had not been subscribed for. As to cases in which, under similar circumstances, the Court has refused relief, see Buckley (p. 23), citing Lyons' Case (35 Bevan, 646).

[De Villiers, C.J.: In that case there was no statement that the 10,000 shares had been subscribed for.]

The argument there proceeds on the assumption that the prospectus stated that 10,000 had been subscribed for, whereas, in point of fact, only 850 had been subscribed for.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The question was whether the directors were justified in alloting shares before they had sufficient funds to carry on the business.]

I see that point, but in his note at the page I have quoted in Buckley the case of Green v. General Assurance Co. (18, L.T., 500) is cited, where relief was refused on the ground that shares had been issued as per prospectus, though some of these shares had subsequently been cancelled. The only question is, was the statement in the prospectus reasonably and fairly true If every slight error in a prospectus justifies a shareholder in claiming relief from his liabilities, no company would ever be promoted. At all events, I submit that the Court will not decide a matter like this, where there is such a serious conflict of evidence, on motion.

Mr. Alexander (in reply): There are many misrepresentations in the prospectus. Some of these are admitted, while others are denied. There is no question of a discrepancy of some 350 shares in the number subscribed for. It is a question of a much larger discrepancy. In June there are said to have been 19 650 subscribed for, but in February the 1,300 Hope Town shares had not been subscribed for, nor had Burnard's 1,000, nor Potgietr's 2,500. The company say that, after certain persons had engaged to take shares, these persons withdrew. But all the company had to do was to accept their respective promises, and so bind them to their contracts. The prospectus ought not to have alleged that shares had been taken, if they had not been allotted and subscribed for. The first misrepresentation in the prospectus, therefore, was in respect of the number of shares subscribed for. This misrepresentation is even repeated in the second prospectus of June 25. There Burnard's and Potgieter's shares are represented as having been subscribed for. That hardly shows the bona fides of the directors, of which so much has been said. It is quite clear that this so-called register was compiled after the applicant had left the company, because when he left he was told that there was no register. Such a "register" is not even prima facie evidence of membership. See Lindley on Companies (I., p. 75-76), Digest of English Case Law (111, 14, 20). Again, the contract of the company with the applicant had not been concluded by April 9, for negotiations as to salary were going on after that. It was not true that there was any irrevocable article in the deed of association as to the manager holding 1,000 shares. It is not necessary that a person seeking to have his name taken off the list of shareholders should have been induced to place it there solely by misrepresentation. It is enough that the misrepresentation was one of the inducing causes. Lindley (p. 90), citing Edgington v. Fitzmaurice (29 Ch., 459), vide Armison v. Smith (40 Ch., 567), Palmer's Company Law (1901, p. 253). This is a much stronger case than that, for there the shares had actually been issued, here there is nothing to show that they had even been allotted. See, as to this, Beran v. Adams (22, L.T., 795). If shares have not been subscribed for it does not matter that they have been allotted. As to innocent misrepresentation, see Palmer Company Law (1901, p. 252), where he cites the case of Smith (2 Ch., 604, 615), Reese River (4, H.L., 79), and other cases. A register is no evidence unless it is kept as the Statute provides. This register has not been so kept. Counsel for the respondents again has said nothing about Eloff. A misrepresentation as to a director is a serious misrepresentation. Palmer's Company Precedents (I., 1052), Anderson's Case (17 Ch. D, 371), Lindley (I., 27), Ex parte Land Credit Co. (14 L.T., 1, 723).

[De Villiers, C.J.: But it is said that he is a director.]

He was not one in February when this prospectus was issued, and he afterwards publicly denied being a director. Why is there no affidavit from him? That misrepresentation alone would entitle the applicant to have has name struck off. Again, all contracts which have been entered into by the company should have been set out in full in the prospectus. It will not do to put part of a contract in the prospectus, and leave the rest of it in the articles of association. Here, in addition to £750, mentioned in the prospectus, Potgieter and Cilliers evidently received a large number of fully-paid-up shares, for which they paid nothing. The prospectus says nothing about this.

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an application to rectify the registrar of shareholders by striking out the applicant's name. The applicant relies upon several grounds, but it is only necessary to consider three of them. The first ground is that there was a false representation made to the applicant on behalf of the company as to the articles of association, that a statement was made—and it undoubtedly was made—that it was "an irrevocable article of our deed of association, that the manager must be in his own right the registered holder of at least 1,000 shares." This letter immediately preceded a telegram, which was sent by the applicant, for the shares, in which he said: "Will take 1,000, if salary commences £600, exclusive commission, and appointment to be for term, not otherwise." Mr. Burton has contended that the representation, although untrue, was not material, and that this telegram shows that it was not material; that it did not operate on the plaintiff's mind to induce him to take these shares; but it does not follow that because the applicant made an addition to the terms upon which he would take these shares he was not influenced by so important a statement made to him by the secretary of the company. It appears to me that it was a very material statement, and that it had an influence upon the applicant in inducing him to take these shares. But if this question stood by itself, I should probably have been inclined to let the matter stand over in order to hear the evidence of the parties, and to ascertain to what extent this statement was material and operated on the mind of the applicant. But there is a second ground for this application, and that is the false statement as to the number of shares which had been subscribed for. Now, the statement was undoubtedly made in the prospectus—in the first prospectus—that over 20,000 shares had already been subscribed for, and that only 10,000 were now offered to the public. This was the statement made in the prospectus. The applicant positively states that before he agreed to enter the company's service he was assured that these 20,000 shares had been subscribed for, and that he accepted the statements in the prospectus in good faith. He says, "Had I had the slightest reason to believe otherwise, I would have broken off all negotiations at once." Now it does seem to me that this is a very material statement. It says that out of 30,000 shares, 20,000 had already been subscribed for. I cannot imagine anything more important to an intending shareholder than a statement of this kind, and if it appears that at such a time the number of shares subscribed for was less by at least 1,500 or 1,600 than the amount stated, I consider that a material misrepresentation, and that if it operated on the mind of a shareholder, he is entitled to have his name taken from the list. It is, however, contended that 19,650 had been subscribed, but that statement does not appear to be confirmed by the facts of the case. The 1,000 of the applicant had not been subscribed, and it would appear there were several other shares which had not then been subscribed. But deducting applicant's 1,000 there would be 1,350 short. In point of fact, I think that at that time the number of shares subscribed for had really been far short of that number. That, in my opinion, is a very material representation operating on the mind of the applicant, and I think the applicant is entitled upon discovery of the true facts of the case to ask that his name shall not remain on the register. The third ground relied upon is that there was a false representation, that Mr. Eloff was a director at the time when the representation was made. According to Mr. Goerne's affidavit there had been negotiations between the parties as to Eloff's position, but he does not positively state that Eloff really occupied the position of director until after these shares had been taken up by the applicant. Eloff himself caused an advertisement to be issued in "Ons Land" stating that he was not a director, and Eloff has not been called to state that he ever was a director. The fact that Eloff became a director after the shares were taken by the applicant does not, in my opinion, assist the respondent in any way. The statement at the time was incorrect. They may have thought that Eloff was at the time prepared to become a director, but upon the facts before the Court I am inclined to believe that Mr. Eloff was not a director and had not promised to be a director at the time when this statement was made. If this were the only issue in the case, I should have been inclined to let the matter stand over for further evidence; but on the second ground I am satisfied there has been a material misrepresentation in the prospectus as to the number of shares actually subscribed for, and I am of opinion that the applicant is entitled to the relief he now asks for. He asks that his name should no longer remain on the list of shareholders. The respondent says that there has been much delay and negligence, and that the applicant is not now entitled to relief. Well, it does not appear to me that there has been any such negligence. In the cases cited the conduct of the person has been such as to prejudice others, as for instance to induce them to take shares in the company, but in the present case it does not appear that the applicant's delay in taking these proceedings has in any way affected the rights of the company or induced anyone else to become a shareholder in the company. The applicant may have thought that it would be better for him to wait to see if the company would sue him, and he has certainly derived no benefit whatever from the fact of his name being on the register of shareholders. The main facts really are not denied, and seeing there has been this material misrepresentation, I am of opinion that the relief asked for should be granted with costs.

[Applicant's Attorney: F. van de Sandt Centlivres; Respondent's Attorneys: Michau and De Villiers.]

SUPREME COURT

DAVIDS v. MURRAY. { 1903. July 20th.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for the personal attachment of the respondent for contempt of court for not complying with an order of the Court for the transfer of certain property situated in Beaufort West to the applicant.

The affidavits of the applicant and his attorney were put in, setting forth the judgment of the Court on the 14th April last for the transfer of certain ground in the town of Beaufort West. Proof of service was also put in.

The respondent appeared in person, and informed the Court he did not receive the summons in the original case. It was served on his wife, who was unable to give it to him in time to enable him to defend the action.

Mr. Bisset said the land was bought in 1895, and the sum of £35 then paid to respondent. Applicant had already built houses on the ground.

Respondent denied that he had been paid any money. Applicant started to build a wall on the ground, but he (respondent) stopped him.

De Villiers, C.J., said that the summons was served six weeks before judgment was granted.

An order was granted upon respondent to pass transfer within three weeks, failing which he will be committed to gaol for contempt, with costs.

Ex parte BERNADSKI.

Mr. Benjamin moved for leave to raise certain money on mortgage to pay off a certain acknowledgment of debt.

Granted.

Ex parte GREEFF AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Benjamin moved for leave to transfer certain property. The purchaser of the property was one of the executors in the estate.

Granted.

Ex parte BROWN.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved for leave to raise money on mortgage, the money to be expended in the improvement of property in which certain minors were interested. The Master's report was favourable.

An order was granted in terms of the Master's report.

Ex parte ALLMANN AND OTHERS.

Mr. Joubert moved for leave to pay out certain money. The applicants were executors in an estate of the late C. Allmann, who in her will decreed that specified shares in the estate should be paid to certain heirs upon their attaining the age of forty years. The heirs had been pressing the executors for payment of the money at once, and the executors had accordingly decided to bring the present application. The will directed that the heirs should be paid certain shares upon attaining the age of forty, and there was a further direction that in the event of any of the heirs dying before they received such portions, such portions should be divided equally between the surviving heirs. All the heirs consented.

De Villiers, C.J., said the testatrix had by her will postponed payment, and he did not think the Court was justified in hastening payment. No order would be made. Costs would come out of the estate.

Ex parte HEYMAN.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for leave to sue by edictal citation for a decree of divorce.

De Villiers, C.J., said there was nothing in the petition to show that the Court had jurisdiction. The petition must be amended.

The matter was allowed to stand over.

BLOEMBERG v. BLOEMBERG.

Mr. Alexander moved for leave to the petitioner, the husband, to sue by edictal citation for divorce on the ground of adultery. Respondent was now living in Johannesburg.

Leave was granted to sue by edictal citation, returnable on the 31st August, with leave to serve intendit and notice of trial with the citation, personal service to be effected.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZÉ.]

REHABILITATION. { 1903. July 21st.

Mr. Benjamin moved for the rehabilitation of J. F. Higgins. The creditors, he said, had agreed to a compromise. The trustee raised no objection.

Granted.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

FRIEDLAND v. LE ROOS.

Mr. Pyemont moved for leave to sign judgment against the plaintiff in default of filing declaration or making claim within the stipulated time.

Order granted.

Re THE PAARLSCHE LAND AANKOOP MAATSCHAPPIJ.

Mr. Benjamin, for the liquidator, presented the first official report, and moved for the usual order as to the time for inspection by creditors, and also for publication in "Ons Land," and local papers at the Paarl and Cape Town.

Order granted.

Ex parte THE CHAIRMAN OF THE BLAUWKLIP GARDEN CO., LTD.

This was an application for an order authorising the registration of certain property. The petition stated that the petitioner was one of a party of twenty-six coloured people in the district of Stellenbosch, who formed themselves into a company to acquire certain property. Property was purchased on behalf of the company by one Harry Thomas, who bought it in his own name, and the petitioner and his party subsequently brought an action in the Supreme Court to compel Thomas to render a true and full account of his administration of the property and of all moneys and securities received by him and all moneys disbursed on behalf of the said company. An order was made against the said Harry Thomas accordingly. The company, it was arranged, should not be registered until they had obtained property. The company consisted of poor coloured people. It was not registered until after the order had been made against Thomas. The petitioner sought an order authorising and requiring the Registrar of Deeds in Cape Town to register the transfer conveying the said land to the limited liability company. The Registrar objected on the ground that this property was bought before the parties were registered as a limited liability company.

Mr. Benjamin for applicant.

[Kotzé, J.: Is there any precedent for the view taken by the Registrar of Deeds?]

Mr. Benjamin said he did not think there was. The Registrar seemed to take up the position that the property was purchased by petitioners before they were a limited company, and now that they had formed themselves into a company it was necessary for them first of all to have the land passed to themselves in their personal capacity and then subsequently to the company. He did not think there was any precedent for such a view, in fact, there was a precedent which rather went to the contrary—the case of the Union-Castle Company (12, C.T.R., 26).

[Kotzé J.: In this matter it seems to me that the property was really bought for these poor people styling themselves the Blauwklip Garden Co., and under these circumstances it was purchased for them, not individually, but in their aggregate capacity. Therefore, although it was quite right for the Registrar of Deeds to be zealous so far as the matter of transfer duty is concerned, still at the same time, I do not think there must be a transfer to the parties individually, and then afterwards to them as a company. This would put them to unnecessary expense, and there is no rule of law which requires such a proceeding. Under these circumstances, I will grant the order.

CONTAT'S COLLIERIES V. CONTAT.

Mr. Alexander applied on behalf of the applicant, Joseph E. Contat, for leave to appeal to His Majesty's Privy Council against a judgment of the Supreme Court.

Mr. Benjamin, for the respondent, said he was not instructed to oppose the application for leave, but he was instructed to oppose any application for stay of execution.

Mr. Alexander said he would take it that the usual procedure would be followed, and unless the Court said that execution was to be carried through the ordinary presumption would be that it was stayed.

[Kotzé, J.: It can only be stayed by giving proper security.]

Of course, we are prepared to give proper security.

Mr. Benjamin said it was necessary that the plaintiff should have the money to proceed with the liquidation of the estate, which was surrendered so far back as 1899, and there were a large number of creditors in the estate.

Mr. Alexander attributed the delay in liquidation to the plaintiff. The Supreme Court had only given absolution from the instance in the defendant's claim in reconvention, and if execution was not stayed the concurrent creditors would be paid before the appeal to the Privy Council would be heard.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte LIQUIDATOR OF DE JOND AND SONS, LTD.

Mr. Alexander presented the report of the liquidator, and moved for the usual order.

Usual order granted.

Ex parte DAVIDSON AND FRIEDLAND.

Mr. Benjamin moved on behalf of the petitioners for the registration of a notarial contract to carry out an agreement between the petitioners that their marriage should be without community of property, and that the marital power should be excluded. The petitioners were of the Jewish religion, and they went before the Resident Magistrate at Cape Town, thinking it was necessary to have the marriage registered before the R.M. In the meantime Davidson had seen a firm of attorneys with regard to executing an ante-nuptial contract, but had been delayed by not knowing the full name of the second-named petitioner. On the morning of the 15th inst., they applied before the R.M., and were, as they now learned, duly married, although, at the time of the ceremony, they did not understand that it constituted a form of marriage, but only understood that it was a form of registration of marriage. It was their intention to be married by the Jewish ceremony in August. They had consequently been prevented from executing an ante-nuptial contract without the consent of the Court.

Order granted as prayed.

STRYDOM V. THE UNIONDALE LICENSING COURT AND DASSENVILLE AND VAN ROOYEN. 1903. July 21st; " 28th.

New liquor licence—Locus standi—Local option clause, Act 25 of 1891, § 13—Memorial not signed by majority of registered voters—Voters' list.

A registered voter for Divisional Council purposes has, under the local option clause of Act 25 of 1891, a sufficient interest in the matter to entitle him to move the Supreme Court to set aside the granting of a new liquor licence granted by the Licensing Court for his district.

A new liquor licence can not be granted by a Licensing Court, unless a memorial in favour of the granting of such licence, signed by a majority of registered voters, has been duly lodged with the Resident Magistrate, as required by section 13, sub-section 1 of Act 25 of 1891.

In ascertaining whether a majority of registered voters of the district have signed a memorial or memorials in favour of granting a new liquor licence, the names of persons who are admitted or clearly proved to be dead, or to have never existed, or to have been registered twice, should be omitted from the voters' list, but not also the names of persons who have removed from the district.

Gibson and Morgan v. Manley (11 Juta 191), and Potgieter v. The Barkly West Licensing Court (7 H.C. 147) followed.

This was a motion brought on behalf of Johann Andries Strydom, of Uniondale, for an order calling upon the respondents to show cause why certain proceedings of the Uniondale Licensing Court should not be set aside, and why a certain licence granted by the said Licensing Court on the 4th March, 1903, should not be cancelled on the ground that the memorial laid before the Magistrate was not signed by the requisite number of voters. The affidavit of the applicant stated that in March last Henry Dassenville and Van Rooyen made application for a licence in the district of Uniondale. Applicant took round a petition opposing the licence, and found on perusing the petition in favour of the licence that some twenty-two bona fide voters had signed both petitions, and, notwithstanding the fact that there was not the requisite majority, the licence was granted. The affidavit of one Rademeyer set out that seventeen of the signatures of those in favour of the licence were either those of dead people or they represented people who did not live in the district.

Mr. Burton for applicant; Sir H. Juta, K.C., for respondents.

Sir H. Juta: In this case the applicant has no locus standi. There is no appeal from the decision of a Licensing Court,, but the Supreme Court has held that it has power to set aside the proceedings of such court if they are illegal. Riddesdale v. Hall (2 Juta, 356). Under the old Licensing Ordinance, no appeal or review was allowed. The new Act does not say the same in so many words, but it has always been held that this rule still applies: a Licensing Court is not a judicial body.

[Kotzé, J.: Should the Licensing Court act arbitrarily, is there no remedy?]

Yes, the proceedings could be set aside as irregular. Here the licence was taken out in April. Over £400 had been spent on the premises, and yet the complaint did not come before the Court till July, and then only at the instance of a person who does not even allege that he has suffered any inconvenience or damage by the granting of this licence.

[Kotzé, J.: I understnd that a majority of the registered voters did not support the granting of the licence?]

There were 122 voters on the roll, and 54 were in favour of the granting of the licence. The Licensing Court struck off seventeen; some of these were dead, and others never existed. The question is as to whether the Licensing Court was bound by the voters' roll as to persons who had left the district before the roll was framed, but whose names nevertheless appear thereon. But there is the preliminary point that the applicant has no locus standi.

Mr. Burton (for the applicant): The case cited by respondent's counsel is not in point. Act 25 of 1891, section 13, introduces the principle of local option in respect of all new licences. See particularly sub-section (1). The Licensing Court cannot legally grant a new licence unless a memorial in favour of it has been signed by a majority of the registered voters. Since that Act was passed many applications have been made to this Court to set aside the proceedings of Licensing Courts, e.g., Gibson and Another v. Manley and Another (11 S.C.R., 191). In that case the question as to the locus standi of the applicant was never raised, and the Licensing Court was held to be bound by the voters' roll. So, also, in the case of Potgieter v. Barkly West Licensing Court (7 H.C., 141). There the application was based on the same grounds as in this case, and there again the question of locus standi was never raised. See also Raubenheimer v. Parkins and Others (12 Juta, 366). In the case cited on behalf of the respondent the Court refused to re-open the case, but this is not a similar case: here there has been irregularity from the very first.

[Kotzé, J.: Mr. Burton, before deciding on the preliminary point which has been raised, I would like to hear you on the merits.]

Mr. Burton here read the affidavit of the chairman of the Licensing Court.

[Kotzé, J.: How does the striking off of these names affect the question?]

If I can show that more than 108, instead of 106, persons signed this petition, that is quite sufficient for my case; and the chairman's own figures show this. In Raubenheimer's case the Chief Justice declined to take into account any inconvenience or loss to the licensee which might possibly happen to him from a refusal of the licence; so that consideration has nothing to do with the merits of the case. Here we have to deal with only a pure question of law, and the only question is, have the provisions of the Act been observed, or have they not? Schreiber in his affidavit says that Nos. 502 and 503 are one and the same person. He finds that seven persons named on the roll were dead. No doubt they were correctly struck off. Three persons had never resided in the district; six had left the district before the roll was compiled; and one was registered twice. That is, seventeen in all either could not vote or had no right to do so. The question is whether the Licensing Court had any right to strike off names of persons not before it, simply because there was some evidence to show that they had left the district. I submit they had not: a voters' list is inviolable; see section 17 of Act 40 of 1889.

[Kotzé, J.: Suppose the members of the Licensing Court knew that certain of these people were dead?]

If they were dead, of course they could not vote.

[Kotzé, J.: Suppose that others have removed from the district?]

In that case the Licensing Board is bound by the voters' roll. When once a man's name is on the roll, whether of Parliamentary voters or of Divisional Council voters, he can vote. See section 22, sub-section (2) and section 23.

[Kotzé, J.: Suppose that the total of signatories for and against the licence exceeds the number on the Divisional Council's roll, must not the Licensing Board go into the question of qualification?]

If people sign both memorials their names must be struck off both. In Gibson's case the Assistant Resident Magistrate accepted a certificate that twenty voters had left the district, and Buchanan, A.C.J., held that he was wrong in so doing, and that he was bound by the voters' roll. Again, sections 16 and 17 of Act 40 of 1889 make every owner liable for rates. Now, as far as this roll is concerned, Nos. 9, 10, and 16 are owners of property; so in their case the question of residence does not come into the case. If they were improperly removed from the roll, the question as to majority falls away. If the Licensing Court has power to strike off names of persons who have left the district, surely they can put on the names of persons who have come into the district since the roll was compiled. But the law will not allow them to do this. It has been said that dead men cannot vote; but living men can, even if they are resident in another district, provided their names are on the voters' roll, and I submit that the Licensing Court had no right to go behind that roll. Then, again, only ten names were struck off, on the ground that they appeared on both lists. In point of fact, some twenty names appear on both lists, though the initials are not always the same.

Sir H. Juta (in reply): I will not deal with my friend's third point. The Licensing Court held that only ten names should be struck off, on the ground that they appeared on both petitions, and the decision of that Court on this point is final. As to the Act 25 of 1891, we must read it either as it stands or in accordance with its real meaning and spirit. Section 13 of that Act seems to imply that the Licensing Court cannot under any circumstances remove any name from the roll, but that the roll must be taken as it stands. It is admitted by applicant's counsel that that would be absurd. That Act introduces the principle of local option—that is, its chief object is to give the people of the district control over the granting of new licences. But suppose that half the people in the district were to emigrate, and that their names still appeared on the roll, that would put an end to local option. It is as impossible to get people thousands of miles away to sign a petition as it is to get dead people to sign, and therefore, if the Licensing Court may strike off the names of dead people, it may also strike off the names of absent people and of people who never existed.

[Kotzé, J.: May you strike off the names of dead people? The Act of 1891 says nothing about dead people.]

The judgment in Potgieter v. Barkly West Licensing Court (7 H.C., 141) decides that point. I admit the figures which have been given, and that if we had no right to strike off the names of absent people, we have not a majority. As to the question of locus standi, the case of Riddelsdale v. Hall (2 Juta, 356) shows that the Court could not go back on its own decision. Unless the applicant can show pecuniary damages, he has no locus standi. In this case there is no appeal or review.

[Kotzé, J.: In Riddelsdale's case the Court held that it had power to set aside illegal proceedings.]

Yes, but there we did not appeal; we asked to have the proceedings set aside. Here there is a similar petition. The Supreme Court cannot modify the decision of the Licensing Court; it can only set it aside as illegal, and therefore null and void.

Mr. Burton (on the merits) referred to the judgment of Solomon, J., in Riddelsdale's case. There is a clear distinction between a man who is dead, and is therefore no longer a voter, and a living man whose name is on the list, and who therefore is a voter.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (July 28th).

Kotzé, J.: This is an application for setting aside a certain new licence granted by the Licensing Court for the district of Uniondale to the respondents, Dassenville and Van Rooyen, on the 4th March, 1903. The applicant, who is a registered voter on the Divisional Council voters' list for the Ward Lower Long Kloof, in the district of Uniondale, complains that the memorial required by sub-section 1 of section 13, Act 25 of 1891, to be lodged with the Resident Magistrate in support of the application for a new liquor licence, was not signed by a majority of voters registered for the election of members of the Divisional Council for the Ward Lower Long Kloof. It appears from a printed copy of the voters' roll that there are 122 registered voters for the Ward Lower Long Kloof. The memorial in support of the granting of a new licence to Messrs. Dassenville and Van Rooyen was signed by 64 persons, whose names figure on the voters' roll. A counter-memorial against the application for the granting of the licence was signed by 40 persons, whose names are on the voters' roll. The applicant alleges that of these persons 22, whom he names, signed both memorials, but the Magistrate states that only ten persons appeared to have so signed. Consequently these ten names were struck out of both memorials, as directed by the Act, thus reducing the number of signatures on the memorial in favour of the application for a new licence to 54, and the number on the counter-memorial to 30. At the meeting of the Licensing Court, an affidavit made by M. A. Rademeyer was put in, to the effect that 17 persons appearing on the voters' list were either dead, non-existent, or had left the district long before the 23rd of December, 1902, when the voters' roll was framed. The Licensing Court acted on this affidavit, and, with the exception of the name of Cornelius C. Kritzinger, who was erroneously stated to have left the district, reduced the voters' list, by taking into account the names of the 16 persons mentioned in the affidavit, from 122 to 106. Accordingly, the licence was granted to the respondents Dassenville and Van Rooyen. The Magistrate also observes that the Licensing Court was unanimous in its decision, and did not by its action intend actually to revise the voters' roll, but considered it desirable in the interests of the public and of the registered voters in the said ward not to take the names of the sixteen persons into account in view of the fact that their death, non-existence, or removal from the district dated from a time prior to the framing of the roll and not subsequent thereto.

On behalf of the respondent, a preliminary objection was taken that the applicant has no locus standi in this matter, as he does not allege that he has some pecuniary or other valid interest at stake. In support of this the case of Riddelsdell v. Hall (2 Juta, 356) was cited. That was an application under the old Ordinance 9 of 1851, since repealed, which enacted that the decision of the Licensing Court shall be final and conclusive, and not subject to appeal or review by any other Court. The Supreme Court, however, held that it was not precluded by this provision from setting aside any proceedings which are illegal in their nature, but that it would only do so upon the application of persons who can show that they have some pecuniary or other valid interest in the decision. It is said that the present applicant does not possess any such interest, and is not therefore entitled to complain against any illegality committed by the Licensing Court. I cannot agree with this contention. The application is made under what is known as the "local option" clauses of the Act of 1891, the object of which is to leave to a large extent the question of the granting of a new licence to the voters resident in the district, and to give them an opportunity of expressing their wishes in the matter. Sub-section 1 of section 13 of this Act enacts that where an application is made for a new licence it shall not be lawful for the Licensing Court to grant the same, unless there shall be lodged with the Resident Magistrate at least four days before the meeting of such Court to consider such application a memorial or memorials, signed by a majority of the voters registered for the election of members of the Divisional Council within the limits of the Divisional Council district in which the premises proposed to be licensed are situated, approving of the issue of the said licence. If, therefore, there are no memorials showing that a majority of the registered voters of the district are in favour of the application for a new licence no such licence can be granted. The voters then have a direct interest in the matter of granting or withholding the licence, and if any illegality has been perpetrated by the Licensing Court in the granting of a licence it seems to me that any registered voter of the district is entitled to come to the Court and ask for the setting aside of the licence. He has, in other words, a sufficient interest for the purpose. Although the Act does not expressly enact that any registered voter shall have the right of bringing the proceedings of the Licensing Court in review before the Supreme Court, it is obviously in accordance with the policy of the "local option" clause that persons who are given certain rights should, if they consider themselves aggrieved by anything illegally done by the Licensing Court, have an opportunity of seeking a remedy against it in the Supreme Court. If this is not so, the Licensing Court may act in disregard of the express language of section 13, and of the wishes of the majority of the registered voters, and how is the illegality to be prevented or set aside? Now, the present applicant alleges that he is a registered voter for Divisional Council purposes of the district in question, and that seems to me to be a sufficient qualification to give him a locus standi. In Potgieter v. The Barkly West Licensing Court and Another (7 H.C., 147) the applicant was described as a resident of the district, and so, in Raubenheimer v. Parsons (12 Juta, 366), the applicants alleged that they were registered voters. Both these cases were decided under the option clause of Act 25 of 1891, and in both instances there was no allegation that the applicants had some pecuniary or other interest peculiar to themselves in the matter, beyond being resident or registered as voters in the particular district. In neither of these cases was the question of locus standi raised by counsel or the Court, presumably because, by the introduction of the local option clause, it was considered that the applicants did possess, to quote the words of the decision in Riddelsdell v. Hall, a sufficiently valid interest for the purpose. I am, therefore, of opinion that the objection against the right of the present applicant to make this application should not be entertained.

The next point to consider is whether the memorial in favour of the granting of the new licence to the respondents Dassenville and Van Rooyen was signed by a majority of the registered voters of the district or ward, Lower Long

Kloof. There are 122 names on the voters' list, and the memorial in favour of the licence was signed by 64 registered voters. By discarding and striking out the names of ten persons who had signed both this memorial and that against the granting of the licence, a method of procedure which is specially prescribed by sub-section 3 of section 13 of the Act, the number was reduced to 54. This, therefore, does not constitute a majority. The Licensing Court, however, accepted and availed itself of an affidavit by Mr. Rademeyer to the effect that of 17 persons whose names appear on the voters' list, 7 were dead, 6 were unknown or non-existent, 3 had long since removed from the district, and one name appeared twice on the list. Of these 17 the Licensing Court struck 16 off the list, thereby erducing the number of registered voters from 122 to 106, and held that, as the memorial in favour of the licence was signed by 54, there was a majority, and consequently granted the licence. But now the question arises whether the Licensing Court, in endeavouring to ascertain if a majority had signed the memorial in support of the application for a new licence, acted correctly in going behind the voters' list, or was bound to accept and abide by that list as framed? Two decisions were referred to during the argument bearing on this point. The first is the case of Gibson and Morgan v. Manley (11 Juta, 191), where this Court (consisting of Buchanan, A.C.J., and Upington, J.) ruled that the Acting Magistrate, who was the chairman of the Licensing Court, had acted wrongly in going behind the voters' roll, and accepting a certificate that twenty of the registered voters had left the district. He should have taken the list as he found it, and had no authority to revise it and strike off any names therefrom. This case was decided in 1894. In the following year the High Court at Kimberley, in Potgieter v. The Barkly West Licensing Court, held that the names on the voters' list of four persons, who were admitted to be dead, and of certain five persons twice registered, should be omitted from the list of voters, in ascertaining whether a majority had signed the memorial. Solomon, J., in giving the judgment of the Court, observed "the object of requiring these memorials is to ascertain the views of the majority of the voters in the district, who are presumed to have an interest in determining whether a licence should be issued or not, but, in the case of persons who are dead, neither can their views be ascertained nor their interests affected. It would be entirely at variance, therefore, with the policy of the Act to count such persons as voters, for as they cannot express their views in favour of the issue of a licence, the effect really is to throw their names on the side of those who object to the granting of the licence." In this view I entirely concur, and it seems to follow that if it is admitted, or there is clear proof that the names of persons who never existed appear upon the voters' roll, or that one and the same person has been twice registered, such names should be omitted in ascertaining whether the memorial contains the names of a majority of registered voters. In the present instance, while it may be taken as admitted that seven persons, whose names figure on the voters' list are dead, it is not admitted that six persons so figuring are non-existent, or unknown, nor that one and the same person appears twice upon the voters' roll. And here I must state that I do not attach much impotrance to the affidavit of Mr. Rademeyer, who identified himself with the respondents, Dassenville and Van Rooyen, by going about the district to obtain signatures on the memorial in support of the application for a licence, and who has also solemnly declared that C. C. Kritzinger, a registered voter, had left the district, which the Licensing Court found not to be the case. I am, moreover, bound by the decision of this Court in Gibson and Morgan v. Manley to the extent that a Licensing Court can not go behind the voters' roll and strike off from it the names of persons who are alleged to have removed from the district, for I agree with the remark of Solomon, J., that the decision in that case should be viewed in connection with the particular facts then before the Court, and should not be extended beyond that. Now, if the names of persons who are non-existent or are registered twice, as well as those of persons who are dead, can, for the purpose of inquiring whether an actual majority of voters has signed the memorial, be omitted from the voters' list, I am, in the present instance, not satisfied that it has been sufficiently established that the persons alleged to be non-existent do not, as a matter of fact, exist. I may point out that even if this had been satisfactorily established in favour of the respondents, the figures would be as follow: Seven persons deceased, six never existed, and one registered twice = 14, which deducted from 122, the number of registered voters on the list, leaves 108, so that 54, the number of votes legally appearing on the memorial, does not constitute a majority. The Licensing Court has no doubt acted bona fide, and in what it believed to be the public interest, and the respondents Dassenville and Van Rooyen, who took out their licence in April last, have probably been put to some expense in opening a wayside hotel at Krakeel River, in the ward of Lower Long Kloof, but these are circumstances which cannot weigh against the express language of section 13 of the Act, which lays down in clear and peremptory language that it shall not be lawful to grant an application for a new licence, unless a memorial signed by a majority of the registered voters of the district has been lodged in support thereof. The application to have the licence set aside must accordingly be granted with costs against the respondents Dassenville and Van Rooyen.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

JONES V. PETERSEN AND CO. { 1903. July 22nd. „ 29th.

Infringement of trade-mark — Interdict — Action — Principles which guide the Court in granting an interdict to restrain the infringement of a trade-mark.

Where respondents, as agents of a principal residing in England, sold a certain medicine "Rheumaticide," which applicant complained was an infringement of his registered trade-mark "Rheumaticuro."

Held, that as the respondents had sold both Rheumaticide and Rheumaticuro for the last 16 months, and alleged that no one had been deceived nor that applicant had sustained any loss thereby, and as moreover the respondents had not had sufficient time to communicate with their principal, who might have a good defence, no interdict should be granted, but that applicant, who under the circumstances had not produced evidence of deception, should be left to his remedy by action.

This was an application on notice of motion brought by James Jones, of Long-street, Cape Town, against P. J. Petersen and Co., chemists, Cape Town, for an interdict restraining them from advertising, selling, or exposing for sale a certain medicine in a bottle covered with a coloured paper labelled "Rheumaticide," and thus infringing a certain registered trade mark of the applicant, "Rheumaticuro."

The affidavit of the applicant, James Jones, stated that he was carrying on business in Cape Town, and was the registered proprietor of a medicinal preparation named "Rheumaticuro," which had been registered as far back as April, 1885. A certificate by the Registrar was annexed certifying that James Jones, of Long-street, Cape Town was entered on the register of trade marks as the proprietor of the word "Rheumaticuro." The affidavit went on to state that thereafter, in 1899, the proprietor renewed the trade mark for a further period, and that he had a considerable sale for the said liquid and pills. About fourteen days or three weeks ago deponent saw for sale in Cape Town a medicine named "Rheumaticide," prepared by Messrs. Cornell and Co., said to be of Cape Town and Chicago, but belonging to London. Deponent had been informed that neither Cornell nor the Cornell Company carried on business in this city, and that the word "Rheumaticide" was not registered as a trade mark. Applicant deposed that "Rheumaticide" was a colourable imitation of his own preparation, and was calculated to deceive the public. The said "Rheumaticide" was advertised by Messrs. P. J. Petersen, of Cape Town, and exposed for sale in their various shops. Deponent objected to the word "Rheumaticide," the vending of the preparation sold under which name, he asserted, would do him severe damage. An affidavit of the applicant's attorneys set out that in answer to their letter to the respondents, calling upon them to withdraw the article, they replied that they could not do anything in the matter without consulting personally the proprietors, Messrs. Cornell, who were domiciled in London.

The affidavit of Harry Evans set forth that respondents had had "Rheumaticide" for sale since the month of March, 1902, that the said "Rheumaticide" was not a registered trade mark in this colony, that he denied that the said word "Rheumaticide" was a colourable imitation of the word "Rheumaticuro," and calculated to deceive the public. The outside casing of the bottles and the bottles themselves were entirely different from those in which "Rheumaticuro" was put up, and could not for one moment be confused therewith, that the respondents had exposed for sale both "Rheumaticide" and "Rheumaticuro," and purchased from the applicant several hundred pounds' worth of this specific every year, and also advertised the same for sale in their price list, and that they had vended the specific "Rheumaticide" for sixteen months without applicants sustaining any loss.

Mr. Benjamin for the applicant, Sir H. Juta, K.C., for the respondent.

[Kotzé, J.: I understand you merely sell this "Rheumaticide" as agent?]

Sir H. Juta: Yes, we sell both of them.

The replying affidavit of the applicant stated that he took immediate steps to restrain the sale of the other specific when he found that the respondents were selling it.

Mr. Benjamin (for the applicant): The Acts 22 of 1877 and 12 of 1895 both deal with trade marks. Our trade mark was registered under Act 22 of 1877.

[Kotzé, J.: The question is, has there been any infringement of your trade mark?]

There has been a colourable imitation of it.

[Kotzé, J.: That is the whole point.]

As to this see Sebastian on Trade Marks (4th Edition, p. 135), and the cases there cited. Here the word "Rheumaticuro" is the only trade mark registered. The question is whether the word "Rheumaticide" is a colourable imitation of "Rheumaticuro," and is calculated to deceive.

[Kotzé, J.: The medicine is called "Jones's Rheumaticuro."]

"Jones" is not registered, and is not registerable.

[Kotzé, J.: Still, the question is whether the prefix "Jones'" helps to distinguish "Rheumaticuro" from "Rheumaticide." See Eno v. Dunn (63 L.T., 6), where see especially the judgments of Watson, L.J., and of Herschel, L.J. The case was taken on appeal to the House of Lords; Dunn applied for leave to register "Dunn's Fruit Salt Baking Powder" as a trade mark. The House of Lords refused the application, although his trade mark was for a baking powder, and "Eno's Fruit Salt" is a medicine.]

In that case the House of Lords held that Dunn's trade mark was calculated to deceive. That case goes much further than any ever decided in this Court.

[Kotzé, J.: Would any person going into a shop, and asking for "Rheumaticuro," be content to take "Rheumaticide"?]

I would submit so. There can only be one object in using a word like "Rheumaticide," and that object is to deceive.

[Kotzé, J.: Any chemist has a right to sell a remedy for rheumatism.]

Yes, but not under a name which is a colourable imitation of our trade mark. We have now been registered for five years, and under the Act of 1877 that is is conclusive evidence of our exclusive right to the trade mark.

Sir H. Juta (for respondent): This is a mere matter of evidence as to whether the word "Rheumaticide" is likely to deceive. We have acted as agents for both "Rheumaticuro" and "Rheumaticide" during the last sixteen months, and nobody has been deceived as to these medicines. The get-up of the medicines is different, and it would not be so were there any intention to deceive. I cannot admit that we must take the registered word without any addition. Eno's case shows that the position of a man who objects to registration and that of one who complains of an infringement of his trade mark are entirely different. In the one case the onus is on the man who applies for registration; in the other it is on the person complaining of the infringement. The word "Rheumatic" is not registerable, nor is the word "Cure." Had there been any intention to deceive, the respondents would have sold their medicine as "Rheumatic-cure" with impunity. "Rheumatic" and "cure" are both common English words, and anybody has a right to use them as he pleases.

[Kotzé, J.: So "fruit" and "salt" are common English words.]

Yes, but the collocation of these words was unknown till Eno brought them together. "Rheumatic" and "cure" are quite common words, and although nobody can register them, anybody can use them.

Mr. Benjamin (in reply): See section 3 of Act 22 of 1877. I submit that a man could not use the word "Rheumaticure" if any damage were thereby done either to the public or to the owner of the trade mark "Rheumaticuro." Counsel for the respondents seems to confuse the provisions of section 9 of Act 22 of 1877 with section 2 of Act 12 of 1895 as to what words can be registered. Possibly "Rheumaticuro" could not now be registered, but the registration is not now attacked. See Lockwood v. Foster, cited in Sebastian (p. 190).

His Lordship said that but for the case in the House of Lords of Dunn and Eno, which he had not had the opportunity of reading, he should not have entertained much doubt in the matter, but he wished to read that judgment for himself, and he would therefore taken time to consider his decision.

Postea (July 29th).

Kotzé, J.: The applicant, who carries on business in Cape Town as the Rheumaticuro Company, complains that the respondents, by advertising for sale and selling a certain medicine, under the name of "Rheumaticide," are infringing this registered trade-mark "Rheumaticuro." It appears that the applicant in 1885 registered as a trade-mark under the Act 22 of 1877 a label with the word "Rheumaticuro," and that on April, 1899, his right to this trade-mark was extended for a further period of 14 years. The respondents, who are chemists in Cape Town, advertise and sell, as agents of one Cornell, residing in England, a certain medicine known as Cornell's "Rheumaticide," and have been doing so for the last sixteen months, although this fact only came to the notice of the applicant some three weeks ago. The respondents also purchase from the applicant his "Rheumaticuro" in large quantities, and likewise advertise and sell this specific. They allege that during the past sixteen months the applicant has sustained no loss whatever through their selling "Rheumaticide," and that no one has been deceived thereby. Both "Rheumaticuro" and "Rheumaticide" profess to cure rheumatism and kindred complaints. It is quite clear that a person is not allowed to sell an article of his own manufacture under the colour or pretence that it is the manufacture of someone else. Nevertheless, it is incumbent on the applicant, who seeks to restrain the respondents from advertising and selling "Rheumaticide," to show that they are exposing for sale and vending a cure for rheumatism under circumstances amounting to a colourable imitation of his registered trade-mark "Rheumaticuro." The onus of establishing that lies on the applicant. The test which applies in a case of this kind is whether an ordinary purchaser is likely to be deceived by the imitation of the trade-mark. This is a question of fact, depending on the circumstances of each particular case. From a comparison of the bottles in which both "Rheumaticuro" and "Rheumaticide" are made up, it is apparent that the colour of the outside casing is different; that of the applicant being black and grey with a human figure on it, and that of Cornell red and white without any figure or other device. The bottles themselves are of somewhat different shape, and the directions on the labels pasted on the bottles are different. The printing on the outside casing is likewise different, the one being in black letters, the other white. The chief resemblance is in the use of the word "Rheumaticide," which is somewhat similar to "Rheumaticuro." Now, if the matter has to be decided by merely placing the two packages side by side, and judging from the outside apparances alone, quite apart from the use of the word "Rheumaticide," there would be considerable force in the contention that a purchaser would not be easily misled. But it seems to me that this would not be altogether a right way of regarding the matter. I must look at all the circumstances as a whole, including the use of the word "Rheumaticide." It has been argued, on the other hand, on behalf of the applicant, that the Court should set aside the external marks and appearances to which I have referred, and confine its attention merely to the employment of the word "Rheumaticide," for that, it is said, is such a colourable imitation of the applicant's trade-mark that its natural and probable tendency must be to deceive unwary purchasers, and cause them to believe they are purchasing "Rheumaticuro." In support of this argument reference was made to Sebastian on Trade-marks, pp. 136-7 (4th edition), and Eno v. Dunn (63, L.T.N.S., p. 6). In many of the decisions it will be found that, besides the similarity in the name, the article sold by the defendant was generally done up in a similar package, or with a similar label or device as the article manufactured by the plaintiff. But there are likewise several cases where the defendant, without actually copying the whole or a portion of the registered trade-mark, had employed a name, which, although somewhat different, was yet sufficiently similar in appearance or sound to the plaintiff's registered trade-mark to induce the Court to restrain the defendant from so imitating that trade-mark and infringing the plaintiff's right. Some of these decisions, including that of the House of Lords, in Eno v. Dunn, may have gone somewhat far in this direction, and I do not deem it necessary at present to consider any of them. Although actual deception need not be proved, that is to say that anyone has been deceived, still the Court must be satisfied that the reasonable probability is that purchasers will be misled before it will grant an interdict. I am at present not quite satisfied on this point. The affidavit of Mr. Evans states that the respondents annually purchase from the applicant large quantities, to the extent of several hundreds of pounds, of his "Rheumaticuro," and sell this medicine as well as "Rheumaticide," and that during the past sixteen months no one has been deceived thereby. Some consideration ought, I think, to be given to this circumstance, as showing that too much weight should not be attached to the mere use of the word "Rheumaticide." On the other hand, the applicant may be in a position to obtain and produce proof of actual deception. Again, these proceedings only commenced about three weeks ago, and the respondents have not had a reasonable time and opportunity of communicating with their principal, who resides in England, and who may have a good defence to the claim of the applicant. Under all the circumstances, I think it best that I should not now decide upon the rights of the parties, and that the matter should be left open. The applicant will then be at liberty to approach the Court again by action, and both parties will have an opportunity of placing more information before it. As the case stands at present, I am not prepared to grant the interdict. The application is refused with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

REVIEW CASES.

REX V. JIMBOOY. { 1903. July 28th.

Theft of stock—Act 35, 1893.

The finding of some wool of a sheep, stolen by two other persons, in the fireplace of a hut occupied by them jointly with the accused, and the fact that some blood was found on an axe said to belong to the accused.

Held, insufficient to sustain the conviction of the accused for theft of the sheep.

Kotzé, J.: This is a case which came before me for review from the Resident Magistrate of Worcester. The prisoners were charged with the theft of a sheep, and the Magistrate convicted all three of them, and sentenced them to a year's imprisonment with hard labour, and fifteen lashes. Now, with reference to the first two accused, the evidence is very clear, and it shows that they actually stole the sheep in question; but, with reference to the third accused, Jimbooy, the evidence was that he occupied, with his wife, a certain hut, or cottage, and the other two accused, with their wives, lived with him, and they used a common fireplace, in fact used the house generally in common. In the fireplace was found some wool of this particular sheep, and an axe, which is said to have belonged to the third accused, was found outside with some blood on it, and upon these two facts the Magistrate seems to have come to the conclusion that Jimbooy, the third accused, must be taken to have been a party to the theft of the sheep. Now, the Act with regard to theft is that it must either be a case of stealing or attempting to steal, receiving stolen property, with guilty knowledge, or being in unlawful possession of property without being able to give a satisfactory account of such possession. The mere fact that a bit of wool of this sheep was found in the fireplace used by them all generally, and that there was some blood on the hatchet is not sufficient to justify the conclusion that the third accused was in possession of stolen property, and, therefore, he should not have been called upon for any explanation. His explanation is that he did not steal the sheep, the sheep was brought there by these two other men, and under these circumstances I think the conviction against Jimbooy should be quashed.

REX V. SWARTS. { 1903. July 28th.

Presumption of innocence.

Conviction of an accused by a Resident Magistrate set aside, there being on the evidence a reasonable doubt in favour of the accused.

Kotzé, J.: This is a case which came before me for review from the Resident Magistrate at Oudtshoorn. In this case it appears that Swarts, a young farmer, was in a certain store at Oudtshoorn, and had a purse of his own. While in the store making some purchases he appeared to have been in a hurry, and to have had a little to drink, more than was good for him, and a lady was also in the shop making purchases. She placed her purse on the counter, and went to another part of the store to make purchases. The clerk, seeing this purse on the counter, asked Swarts if it were his purse. He said "Yes," and put it in his pocket. He soon afterwards left the store. The lady then missed her purse, and inquiries were made, and it was ascertained that Swarts had gone off with this purse. A brother of the lady accosted Swarts, and asked him if he knew anything about it, and said that his sister's purse had been lost in the shop, and must be found, whereupon young Swarts immediately put his hand into his pocket and produced the purse, and said, "Is that the purse, I thought it was my own." The purse, on being examined, was found to contain £5, four 10s. pieces, and some silver, and not a single coin had been abstracted by Swarts from the purse, his explanation being that he was in a hurry, and the shopman asked him if it were his purse, and he put it in his pocket. The fact that none of the money disappeared is a very strong point in support of the presumption of Swarts's innocence, and under all the circumstances there seems to me to be such a reasonable doubt in his favour that I think the Magistrate should have given him the benefit of that doubt, and, consequently, the conviction will be quashed.

REX V. MPALA AND OTHERS. { 1903. July 28th.

Remit to new Magistrate—Act 3 of 1861, § 29—Plea of guilty—Evidence.

A Magistrate to whom a criminal case has been remitted for trial must, if not the same Magistrate who took the evidence against the accused at the preparatory examination, take evidence de novo against the accused as required by Section 29, Act 3, 1861, even where the accused pleads guilty.

The Queen v. Strydom (1 Juta 60) followed.

This was an appeal against a sentence of the Resident Magistrate of Idutywa passed upon the appellants, Mpala and three others, for having contravened section 158 of Act 24 of 1886, the Transkeian Penal Code Act.

From the records in the Courts below it appeared that this case had been sent for review to the Chief Magistrate by error, and the sentence had been reduced. This had caused a delay in the proceedings, but owing to the difficulty of getting the records returned, the Crown did not raise any question with regard to the 41 days provided by Act 21 of 1876. The sentence passed upon the appellants was a fine of £50 each, or, in default, twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour. In the notice of appeal, three grounds were set out: (1) That the conviction and sentences were not supported by the evidence, and were contrary to law; (2) that the said sentence was excessive; (3) that the said proceedings were irregular and contrary to law.

Mr. Searle, Q.C., for appellant; Mr. H. Jones for the Crown.

Mr. Searle said that the main point that he intended to urge was that there was an irregularity in the procedure. Undoubtedly there was evidence on the record to show that these parties had taken part in an assault, but the ground on which he took objection was that, so far as the Magistrate was concerned who sentenced the prisoners, he had taken no proper evidence at all. He admitted that there was evidence to show that one was the leader, and the others were assisting. It was clear that the prisoners had no legal advice throughout. The preliminary examination, it appeared, was taken before Mr. Gilfillan, then the Resident Magistrate at Idutywa, on January 10, 1902, fifteen months before the prisoners were sentenced. On March 12, 1902, he took the remainder of the evidence for the prosecution. Then he adjourned the case sine die. It appeared from the record that small-pox broke out in one of the locations, accounting for all or part of the delay. Nothing further was done until December 1, 1902, when a new magistrate came on the scene—a Mr. J. P. Cumming. He recalled each witness, and read over his statement to him. The witnesses were asked if they adhered to these statements, and they said "Yes." Prisoners made statements, and on these the prisoners were committed for trial. The prisoners admitted that they had fought, but they did not admit that they were wrong. The statements of the four appellants were then put in, from which it would appear that Mpala's son, with the other three, proceeded to the complainant's kraal to demand damages for trespass of a number of horses. Twelve men were encountered at the complainant's kraal, and after a shot had been fired from their direction, a fight ensued, in which Mpala's men overpowered the others, and took from them their assegais and guns, but they took no clothes, as there was disease in the kraal. The accused were charged with assault to do grievous bodily harm and theft, under section 150 of the Transkeian Act, but the Solicitor-General remitted the case, under section 29 of Act 3 of 1861, on a charge of common assault, to the Resident Magistrate's, under his ordinary jurisdiction. They were each sentenced to pay a fine of £50, or twelve months' imprisonment. No witnesses were recalled, and no evidence was read over, and counsel submitted that in accordance with the section of the Act, it was imperative on a new magistrate to have heard vive voce evidence of some witnesses, and if it was the same magistrate, that the law did not allow him, when a prisoner pleaded guilty, to say that he was not going to read the evidence over again. It was just possible that the appellants, being ignorant natives, pleaded guilty to assault, thinking that the charge meant taking part in the encounter, and counsel contended that the whole thing had been a beer drink and a general fight.

Mr. Howel Jones said that it would be a grave miscarriage of justice if the conviction were quashed on the grounds put forward by counsel for the appellant. The examination held by Mr. Cumming was not a proceeding to which Act 3 of 1861 applied, as it was simply a continuation of Mr. Gilfillan's preparatory examination. It was not necessary that all the evidence should be given vive voce, and it was a matter of every day occurrence for a deponent to have his affidavit read over to him by a Magistrate, and to say that the adhered to the statement. It was provided in Act 3 of 1861 that if a case was remitted under Act 12 of 1860 the Magistrate need not necessarily take any evidence.

Mr. Searle (for appellant): The evidence given in the Court below was very vague. The Magistrate misinterpreted section 29 of Act 3 of 1861. He merely read over the evidence given to the witnesses at the preliminary examination, instead of taking their evidence afresh. In this he was wrong, as he was not the Magistrate before whom the original evidence had been taken. He had no means of weighing the evidence such as he would have had had he himself taken it. He took no evidence whatever.

[Kotzé, J.: If the evidence satisfied the Magistrate, can we override his decision?]

I submit the Court can do so. Here a Magistrate who had taken no evidence gives an opinion, and pronounces the maximum sentence of a year's imprisonment. My points are (1) the Magistrate should have heard the evidence for the prosecution, and (2) a man is not bound to lead his evidence twice over. It is true that the prisoners pleaded "guilty," but no corroborative evidence was called. See Queen v. Damon Charles (13 S.C.R., 78). There the prisoner had an opportunity of cross-examing; here the prisoners had none.

[Kotzé, J.: The record shows that the evidence against them was very strong.]

Possibly, but the Court had no opportunity of judging of that evidence. See Queen v. Scelig (4 H.C., 4), and Queen v. Mahatis and Another (reported in Vol. 6, "Law Journal, p 180), and Queen v. Strydom (1 Juta, 60). The Magistrate cannot sentence till some evidence has been taken, and the spirit of the Act is that the Magistrate who sentences must be the Magistrate who has heard the evidence, and not a Magistrate who has merely read it over.

[Kotzé, J.: You argue that if the same Magistrate who had heard the evidence had afterwards read it over, that the sentence would have been regular, but that if it is read over by another Magistrate the proceedings are irregular?]

Yes, that is my case.

[Kotzé, J.: Had the case been remitted?]

Yes, on January 7, 1903.

Mr. H .Jones (for the Crown): The Magistrate's (Mr. Cummings') was a preparatory examination, so Act 3 of 1861 does not apply to this case. The evidence at a preparatory examination need not be viva voce, though it must be on oath. Cumming was quite right in taking these statements without calling evidence. This case was tried under Act 13 of 1886, and therefore Act 3 of 1861 does not apply. The point of irregularity has been raised on behalf of the appellants, but the Court must be well satisfied that there has been a serious irregularity. In all the cases cited on behalf of the appellants the Magistrate did not sentence on the confession of the prisoner. It is true that Ordinance 72 of 1830 directs that no prisoner can be sentenced without evidence being led, but see section 29 of that Ordinance. See also section 265 of the Transkeian Ordinance. Here the prisoner pleaded "guilty," clearly understanding the nature of the offence to which he was pleading. If a prisoner pleads "guilty," he cannot be prejudiced by his plea being accepted.

[Kotzé, J.: There is no dispute as to there being an appeal from the Court of the Chief Magistrate to this Court?]

No, that has been decided.

Mr. Searle (in reply): A Magistrate must hear witnesses before he convicts. Section 7 of the Act 20 of 1856 says that witnesses must deliver their evidence in open court. In this case there is nothing to show that the Magistrate followed this rule.

[Kotzé, J.: It is not to be presumed that he did not. Omnia quæ acta sunt presumuntur rite acta.]

The onus to show that all due formalities had been observed is on the Crown. See Queen v. Taylor (2 Sheil, 291).

[Kotzé, J.: What if the prisoners plead guilty?]

Even in that case the Magistrate must hear some evidence. In Strydom's case this principle was broadly laid down, and the decision in that case has been often confirmed. Section 265 of the Transkeian Ordinance has been cited for the Crown, but that Ordinance is on the same lines as section 29 of Act 3 of 1861. If the Resident Magistrate, who has not heard the preliminary examination, tries the case on its being referred to him, still he must take some evidence.

Kotzé, J.: I am much indebted to the counsel who have addressed me in this matter for their learned arguments on both sides, which reduce the matter to a nutshell, and I do not entertain any doubt about my decision. It appears that the accused, who are now appellants, had a preparatory examination taken against them in the month of January last year by Mr. Gilfillan, the Magistrate at Idutywa. The preliminary examination lasted from time to time, and on the 12th March of the same year this preparatory examination was postponed sine die, apparently on account of an outbreak of small-pox in that neighbourhood. Meanwhile a new Magistrate had been appointed, Mr. Cumming, and he, in December of the same year, proceeded to take up the preliminary examination which had been postponed by Mr. Gilfillan some months before. After reading over the statements of the different witnesses whom Mr. Gilfillan had heard, he heard certain witnesses for the defence, and then committed the prisoners for trial. The papers came before the Solicitor-General in Graham's Town, and the Solicitor-General remitted the case to the Magistrate under his ordinary jurisdiction—that is Act 20 of 1856. The accused were then charged with assault under the ordinary jurisdiction of Act 20 of 1856 before the Acting Resident Magistrate, Mr. Cumming, and they all pleaded guilty. Now, it does not appear from the record that any depositions were then read over by the Acting Magistrate, nor that any evidence at all was taken by the Acting Magistrate, and it is argued by Mr. Searle that regard being had to what is expressed in section 29 of Act 3 of 1861, Mr. Cumming, being not the Magistrate who originally heard the witnesses for the prosecution, but a new Magistrate, could not, even supposing he had done so, read over the statements of the different witnesses, but had to take evidence de novo. There is a great deal of force in this contention, but Mr. Jones says that as the prisoners pleaded guilty, it was only necessary for the Magistrate to satisfy himself from the record that there was some evidence in support of the charge of assault, and he instances the case of a judge on circuit who does not take any further evidence, but just satisfies himself by referring to the preliminary examination in order to guide him in giving a proper sentence. But in answer to that, Mr. Searle says whatever the practice may be on circuit, or even in the Supreme Court during Criminal Sessions, so far as the Court of Resident Magistrate is concerned, we have an express provision under section 29, which enacts that when there is a remit not to the same Magistrate, but some other Magistrate, to try the case, then the witnesses must be called. There is the case to which he has referred me —The Queen v. Strydom—which clearly shows that even where there is a plea of guilty, the Magistrate is bound to take some evidence. This has been laid down so far back as 1868, and has been the universal practice of the Magistrate's Courts in the Colony since then. Besides, these natives, not acquainted with the nature and effect of legal proceedings, really may have meant by their plea of guilty that they had inflicted blows upon the persons who complained without intending to admit their guilt. I think the Court should not depart from the clear rule that has been the practice for years, as observed by the Chief Justice in the case of Strydom. Under these circumstances, I consider there was such an irregularity as necessitates the setting aside of the proceedings. Consequently, the conviction of accused by the Magistrate must be quashed.

REX V. TWALATINGA. { 1903. July 28th. Aug. 6th.

Criminal appeal—Plea of autrefois acquit—Evidence of accomplice.

The conviction of a prisoner, found guilty under Act 35 of 1893, of the theft of horses, the property of some persons unknown, by the Resident Magistrate, was set aside on review on the ground that at the trial the owners of the horses appeared to give evidence and no amendment of the charge had taken place. The prisoner was subsequently tried again for stealing the same horses, the property of certain persons set out in the charge. He pleaded autrefois acquit. This plea was disallowed by the Resident Magistrate, and the prisoner was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour. Held, on appeal, that the plea of autrefois acquit was bad.

The Court is averse to accepting and acting on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice.

This was an appeal against a sentence of the Acting Resident Magistrate of Maclear, passed upon the appellant for having contravened Act 35 of 1893. Mr. Upington was for the appellant, and Mr. Howel Jones appeared for the Crown.

Mr. Upington said that in March, 1903, the appellant was charged with stealing a bay stallion, a dark brown stallion, and a bay mare, with a chestnut filly foal at foot. Prisoner, being arraigned, was found guilty of receiving four horses, knowing them to have been stolen, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment with hard labour. The conviction was quashed by the Chief Magistrate of East Griqualand, on review, the prisoner was liberated, re-arrested, and charged under a new indictment, and counsel contended that he could not again be tried for the same crime. The Magistrate, in his reasons, had evidently relied on the case of the Queen v. Myers (2 Juta, 219), but counsel submitted that in that case the prisoner was never placed in jeopardy by the first indictment, inasmuch as it was not stated where the transaction took place, and the Diamond Law at that time only applied to Griqualand West. In the present case the prisoner was tried and convicted on a valid indictment, and he could not have come forward afterwards, supposing evidence had been produced to support that indictment, and said that the indictment was bad. Unfortunately, the Chief Magistrate, in quashing the conviction, had endorsed it with the words "charge and conviction quashed," and the Resident Magistrate seemed to have been misled by the different phrase to that used in other cases.

Mr. Howel Jones contended that if the evidence adduced upon the second indictment was not sufficient to convict the appellant on the first that there was justification for sustaining the plea. The prisoner could never have been in jeopardy on the first indictment, because if the property belonged to another person it would be impossible to prove the charge against him. He contended that the charge was an entirely new one, and that the proof of the prisoner being in jeopardy was not whether he had been convicted or not, but whether he could be legally convicted. The prisoner's case was not prejudiced, because if the Magistrate had amended the indictment, he would have been convicted.

[Kotzé, J.: Does it appear from the record that it was known during the trial who the owner was?]

Mr. Howel Jones: Yes, my lord.

Mr. Upington having been heard in reply,

Kotzé, J., said that he would give his decision later when he had read through the record.

Postea (August 6th).

Kotzé, J.: The prisoner Twalatinga was charged before the Resident Magistrate of Maclear, on the 4th May, 1903, with theft, under Act 35 of 1893, as amended by Proclamation 109 of 1900, in that he did unlawfully steal certain four horses, to wit: (1) One bay stallion, the property of Noensani, and being at the time of the theft in the lawful possession of Ndugcana, of Plaatjes Location; (2) one dark brown stallion, the property or in the lawful possession of the said Ndugcana; (3) a bay mare and chestnut foal, the property or in the lawful possession of Tonga, of the Engcobo district. The prisoner pleaded autrefois acquit to this charge. The Magistrate, after hearing evidence on this point, disallowed the plea, whereupon the prisoner pleaded "not guilty." Evidence was then taken in the usual way. The prisoner was found guilty of receiving the four horses knowing them to have been stolen, and sentenced to one year and nine months' imprisonment, with hard labour. From this conviction the prisoner now appeals to this Court, on the ground that the plea of autrefois acquit was improperly disallowed by the Magistrate. It, therefore, becomes necessary to inquire into the circumstances upon which this plea is based. It appears of record that on the 4th March, 1903, the prisoner was charged before the same Magistrate with contravening Act 35 of 1893, as amended by Proclamation 109 of 1900, in that he did unlawfully steal four horses, "the property or in the lawful possession of certain person or persons to the prosecutor unknown, but residing at the Ingudu, in the district of Engcobo, etc." During the course of the trial the natives Noensani, Ndugcana, and Tonga were called as witnesses, and proved that the ownership of the horses was in them. Although the owners of the horses had thus been ascertained, no amendment of the charge was applied for by the prosecuting officer nor made by the Magistrate. The prisoner, who had pleaded not guilty, was convicted by the Magistrate of receiving the horses, knowing them to have been stolen, and sentenced to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for a period of two years. On the 16th March, 1903, the Assistant Chief Magistrate, on the authority of Reg. v. Jack (5 H.C. 496), set aside the charge and conviction on the ground that the Resident Magistrate had found the prisoner guilty of receiving stolen horses, the property of some person or persons unknown, when in fact the owners had appeared before him to give evidence at the trial, and no amendment of the charge was made.

It is clear that the four horses were the same in both instances, and this is admitted by the Crown. It is also clear that but for the setting aside by the Assistant Chief Magistrate of the first conviction of the prisoner this case would never have arisen. Now, whatever my own ruling may be when reviewing a conviction by a Magistrate under circumstances such as disclosed by the record of the first charge against the prisoner, I think that I cannot, for the purpose of this case, go behind the ruling or review by the Assistant Chief Magistrate. This being so, I must consider what is the effect of the quashing of the conviction by the Assistant Chief Magistrate. On behalf of the prisoner it has been argued that it amounts to an acquittal, and The Queen v. Bense (1 Juta, 90) was relied on in support of this contention. But on referring to the report of that case I find that it does not lay down anything so wide. It shows that where a conviction by a Magistrate has taken place, and such conviction has been set aside by a judge on review on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the conviction, the accused cannot be tried again for the same offence, and the plea of autrefois acquit under such circumstances will be good. The reason appears to be that a judgment or decision on the evidence or merits was given by the Judge, who set aside the conviction, and that is tantamount to an acquittal. But the result is not the same, where the conviction is set aside on appeal or review on the ground of informality or illegality. Thus, where an indictment charges an accused with stealing certain articles the property of A, and it appears that the articles are the property of B, the accused, unless the indictment is amended, cannot be convicted, and if acquitted he may be properly tried and convicted on a subsequent indictment for the theft of the same articles, the property of B. (Reg. v. Green), (Dears and B., 113); or, where the indictment does not disclose a crime, and the conviction is set aside on that ground, the accused may be charged again on a proper indictment (The Queen v. Myers. 2, Juta, 219). So where an accused is tried by a Judge, who is incompetent, and for that reason the proceedings are set aside, he may be lawfully tried again and convicted of the same offence before a competent tribunal. (The State v. Snuif, 3, Off. R., Transvaal.) In all such and similar cases the accused was never in jeopardy, and the plea of autrefois acquit fails.

In the present instance the first conviction was set aside on the ground that, no amendment having taken place, the accused could not be found guilty on a charge which laid the stolen property in a person or persons unknown, when the owners were known. But as the setting aside of the first conviction does not, under the circumstances pointed out by me, operate as an acquittal, it does not prevent the prisoner from being put upon his trial again on a second charge of theft of the same horses, the property of certain persons who are specifically named and described. Were this otherwise, then, as observed by Coleridge, J. (Reg. v. Drury, 3, C. and K., 197), "it would be shocking to both justice and common sense that individual, who object only that they have been regularly found guilty of an offence on a lawful trial, but that there has been a mistake in the judgment pronounced, which judgment has on that ground been reversed, and can never be carried into effect, should therefore remain exempt from all punishment." I am accordingly of opinion that the plea of autrefois acquit has not been made good. It was pointed out during the argument that the Assistant Chief Magistrate quashed both the charge and the conviction, when the charge was ex facie a good and lawful one; but that circumstance can have no bearing on the result of the plea. Another point was urged that, so far as three of the horses are concerned, the evidence against the accused is that of an accomplice, who is not confirmed, and it was said that the Court will not accept the unsupported evidence of such a witness. No doubt Courts of Justice should be and are averse to acting on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, and Judges almost invariably direct the jury not to accept such unsupported testimony; but still, the evidence of an accomplice is legally admissible. In the present case, however, the accomplice's statement is corroborated with respect to one of the four horses, and this places his evidence against the prisoner, so far as the other three horses are concerned, in a somewhat different light, for it tends to confirm what he has stated. I see no reason, therefore to disturb the second conviction on that ground. For the reasons I have given this appeal must be dismissed.

REX v. MCDONALD. { 1903. July 28th.

Sale of liquor to natives—Trap—Corroboration — Credibility of witnesses.

This was an appeal against a sentence passed by the Acting Resident Magistrate of Mount Fletcher, on the appellant, for contravening section 30, of Proclamation 104 of 1903.

The appellant, one Annie McDonald, was charged in her capacity as executrix of the estate of John McDonald, under section 26 of Proclamation 104 of 1903; in that she, not being the holder of a licence, sold to a native detective a bottle of whisky, and under section 30 of the same Proclamation, with selling to a native without a permit. The accused was found guilty under section 30 of the Proclamation, and fined in £200, or three months' imprisonment, with hard labour.

The evidence given in the Court below showed that one Tongwango, a Basuto native detective, who acted as a "trap," was supplied with a bottle of whisky by the appellant. He brought the bottle to his master, Charles Forrester, the Acting Sub-Inspector of Licences, who waited on him about a mile from the house. Next day the bottle was handed to Mr. Garner, the Acting Resident Magistrate. The licence had not been renewed last year, and when the constable visited the premises he discovered empty bottles of the same brand. It was stated for the defence that the brand of "Heather Dew" was not on the premises, and the accused stated that she had seen the trap knocking about the house for some time, and that she threatened to throw him into the dam. The Magistrate, in his reasons, stated that the case resolved itself into a question of the credibility of the witness. The trap's evidence was given in a straightforward manner, and remained unshaken under cross-examination, and he was supported by Mr. Forrester. For the defence, the only possible line was that the liquor had been obtained beforehand, and there was an uncertainty about the statement of many witnesses, none of whom could explain why the particular brand of whisky was not in stock. The defence seemed to put stress on the Chief Constable's evidence that the brand was not in stock, but it might have been the last bottle. As the accused was negotiating for the sale of the premises to a firm of high standing, the penalty was inflicted under the second count instead of the first. Mr. Upington, for the appellant, contended that there was no proof of what was in the bottle at the time it was given to the trap, and there had been no evidence to show what had become of the bottle between the evening of the 4th and the 5th May last, and that the serious gulf in the case was sufficient to quash the conviction.

Mr. Howel Jones, for the Crown, said that if the contention of counsel for the appellant was material, the matter would have been thrashed out in the other Court. There were ample reasons to infer that the bottle contained whisky when it was officially sealed in the presence of the Acting Resident Magistrate, who would easily know his own seal. His learned friend might as well have contended that the bottle was not in the same condition, because the Acting Resident Magistrate had fallen asleep.

Kotzé, J.: In this matter I quite agree with Mr. Upington that the Court should be careful in accepting the evidence of a trap. It has always been the rule to exercise great caution in such cases, and the Court always requires corroboration of a trap's evidence. Now, it is said in the present instance, there is no proof of the sale of this bottle of liquor to the native trap, nor that it has been satisfactorily shown that the bottle which was produced in Court contained whisky at the time when the native got possession of it. It seems to me that the evidence of the trap in this case does not stand alone, and that he is corroborated in certain material respects. In the first place, Mr. Forrester, the sub-inspector, says that he watched him from a distance going to Mrs. McDonald's store, and that he had been away 20 or 30 minutes, when he came back with the bottle, which was unopened. Mr. Forrester then took possession of that bottle. The bottle was taken to Mr. Garner's office, and sealed there. Then Bellamy, the Chief Constable, says he received that bottle out of the safe of the Acting Resident Magistrate, and the bottle was then still unopened. The seal was broken, and the bottle opened in court. Mr. Forrester declared it was the same bottle, and it was found to contain whisky. While I agree that the Court should not draw strained inferences, I think a person of sound discretion would reasonably conclude from these facts that this bottle was the bottle which in the first instance was sold to the native and handed by him to his master, and that this bottle also contained whisky, because, when the master got it, it was not tampered with, but sealed up, and when the seal was broken in court the bottle contained whisky. The reasonable inference is that the bottle contained whisky when in possession of the native trap. That being so, I am satisfied there are other circumstances as well which show that the native is to be believed, and the Magistrate says that he carefully weighed the evidence, and as far as credibility goes, came to the conclusion that the witnesses for the Crown deserved every credence. Under these circumstances, I would not be justified in going behind the finding of the Magistrate and setting aside the conviction. It is true that the sentence seems somewhat high—a fine of £200 or three months' hard labour—but the proclamation under which Mrs. McDonald is charged imposes as a maximum penalty £500, or six months' hard labour for a first offence, the intention of the Proclamation evidently being to prohibit and put a stop, if possible, to the sale of intoxicating liquor to natives. The appeal must be dismissed.

SUPREME COURT

Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C. K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

CONTAT'S COLLIERIES v. CONTAT. 1903. July 29th.

Kotzé, J., said that in this matter, which came before him a few days ago, the question was whether the Court was to stay execution pending an appeal to the Privy Council, or whether execution was to issue. He thought execution ought to issue, the liquidator to enter into proper security.

Mr. Alexander, for the defendant, said that when the original matter was before the Court, their lordships asked counsel to find out from the defendant where the £2,000 of the special account came from. A wire had been sent to the defendant, and he now asked leave to read the reply.

Mr. Benjamin, for the plaintiff, objected to any evidence being put in after judgment had been delivered.

Mr. Alexander said that the Court asked the defence to obtain the information.

His Lordship said he did not think that the Court wanted the information now. It would have been desirable at the proper time

Mr. Alexander explained that the parties had gone up-country, and there was delay in communicating with them.

Ex parte VAN DER BYL.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for an order relieving Mr. Justice Hopley from trusteeship under the ante-nuptial contract of Pieter Gerard van der Byl (deceased) and Johanna van der Byl. It appeared that the application was brought at the request of Mr. Justice Hopley, on account of the difficulty which he had in carrying out his duties. He was at present in Europe, and when in this country, he was mostly engaged in Kimberley. It was proposed to appoint Mr. Harry Hands, of Cape Town, to act as co-trustee with the petitioner. The widow agreed to the proposal, and a letter was read from Mr. Justice Hopley intimating his desire to be relieved from the appointment.

An order was granted as prayed.

REX v. MATHEBUS. 1903. July 29th. " 31st.

Proclamation—aboriginal natives —Proclaimed areas—Section 21 of Act 28 of 1883—Kafir beer.

The Governor has no power to include in any area proclaimed under the 21st section of Act 28 of 1883 any town or tract of country mainly occupied by Europeans, but the fact that an area so proclaimed improperly includes any locality does not affect the validity of the proclamation in regard to other localities which were properly included.

The giving of Kafir beer to an aboriginal native in a proclaimed area constitutes a contravention of the 22nd section of the Act.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Komgha. In the court below the accused had been charged with contravening section 22 of Act 28 of 1883, under Proclamation No. 245 of 1900, page 2,158, by which the district of Komgha is proclaimed to be included in the area in which section 22 of Act 28 of 1883 is enforced by section 21, in that upon or about the day 19 , and at or near Woodford's farm, in the said district, the said Mathebus did wrongfully sell, supply, or give liquor—to wit, a can of Kafir beer—declared to be an intoxicant by section 31 of Act 25 of 1891—to one Kleinbooi, an aboriginal Kafir labourer, and one prohibited under the above Act and Proclamation.

The prisoner pleaded "Not Guilty." Judgment, "Guilty."

Sentence: Fined £5 or one month's imprisonment with hard labour.

The evidence taken in the court below was to the effect that there was a "beer drink" on June 2 at the hut of the accused. The accused, several women, and Kleinbooi were present. Other natives were in an adjoining hut belonging to the accused. There was Kafir beer in this hut, too. Kleinbooi had a can of beer before him, and said he got it from the accused. The beer was not in the actual possession of Kleinbooi. The prisoner heard that accused had permission from the owner to make Kafir beer. Kleinbooi stated that he was in the hut of the accused when the police arrived. He had had some Kafir beer, and told the police that he got it from the accused. Witness was the only man present besides accused. The women present belonged to the house.

In the court below the accused excepted to the summons on the grounds (1) that Kafir beer is not liquor within the meaning of sections 21 and 22 of Act 28 of 1883, or of Proclamation No. 245 of 1900; (2) that the accused had the permission of the owner of the farm to make Kafir beer, and that in giving to his guest, who was also a relative, he was within his rights under section 7 of Act 28 of 1898.

These exceptions were overruled.

Mr. McGregor for the appellant; Mr. H. Jones for the Crown.

Mr. McGregor: See section 22 of Act 28 of 1883 as to prohibited areas and penalties. The words of the section are "sell," "supply," and "give." These words are all "ejusdem generis." "Give" may mean "give as a donation," or "hand over."

[De Villiers, C. J.: The clause says "save any liquor administered medicinally."]

That had not occurred to me.

[Kotzé, J.: The meaning of "give" must be interpreted by the context.]

Exactly, and see section 2, sub-section 2, and sections 67 to 69, which use the word "supply." There "supply" means for money in the way of trade. "Deliever" means "give," in the way of trade; so also in sub-section (5) of section 73. On the other hand, see section 89 of the Licensing Act of 1883, where "give" evidently means "give as a gift."

[De Villiers, C. J.: I do not quite see how the context implies that.]

Yes, there are the two clauses, one prohibiting selling, the other giving. See also section 13 of Act 28 of 1898. There "given or supplied" clearly means "given as a gift." As to the words "or otherwise," see Electric Tram Co. v. Town Council of Cape Town.

[Kotzé, J.: The words "or otherwise" are very wide.]

Yes, but they must be restricted by the context.

[De Villiers, C. J.: Then why is the word "give" used?]

It may be in order to prevent drink being given in exchange for something else (e.g., for empty bottles).

[De Villiers, C. J.: Then would a pour boire be prohibited?]

It might be because that is not a gift pure and simple. Then see section 7 of Act 28 of 1898. That section declares Kafir beer to be an intoxicating liquor, but nevertheless allows it to be made with the permission of the owner of the farm.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It may be lawful to make it and drink it, but it does not follow that it is lawful to sell it.]

No, not to sell, but you may give it, particularly to a guest. If a man may drink in his house, his guest may drink. Of course, that does not apply to what are known as "beer drinks," because there the drinking is not in the ordinary way of use.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You admit that that would be illegal?]

Yes, but there is a distinction between a beer party, and giving drink to a brother or a friend.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Does not Act 16 of 1891, which prohibits Intonjane dances, say something about beer drinks?]

I do not think it does, although I must admit that one of the chief reasons for prohibiting these dances was that they were intimately connected with drinking parties, but I cannot find any reference to beer drinks in the Act.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Yes, I know that that was the reason why these dances were prohibited; but if I may give a drink to a brother, why may I not give one to forty brothers?]

In that case the onus would be cast upon the accused to show that he was acting bona fide.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I do not see how we can interpret Act 28 of 1898, section 7, as altering the previous law. It does not follow that because a man may make Kafir beer, that he may therefore give it away.]

I cannot go so far as to argue that. My next point is one of constitutional law. By the schedule annexed to the Proclamation, the area proclaimed includes no less than eight field-cornetcies, and I submit that an area of that extent could not be legally proclaimed, because it amounts to total prohibition. Section 2 of Act 28 of 1898 shows that the legislature did not contemplate total prohibition. Act 39 of 1887 exempts native registered voters from the incapacities imposed by the later Liquor Acts.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You contend that the area proclaimed is too wide?]

Yes, and that the proclamation is therefore ultra vires.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There is no evidence that natives have congregated in this district?]

No; and my point is that although an area within a district may be proclaimed, a whole district cannot be proclaimed. McBeth and Others v. Ashley (30 L.T.R., 310). This, a Scots appeal under the local Licensing Act, is valuable for the light it casts on the rules of interpretation. There it was held that the power to legislate for certain localities, within a district gave no power to legislate for the whole county, district, or borough.

[Kotze, J.: There the word "locality" was used. In our Act "areas" is spoken of in the plural. Why cannot a whole district be proclaimed?]

That point was touched upon by the Lord Advocate in McBeth's case. Here the Government has not taken areas one by one, but has proclaimed the whole district at once.

[Kotzé, J.: Could not the Governor proclaim a whole district under the Cattle Diseases Act?]

That depends upon the wording of the Act. In this case, "areas within districts" cannot possibly mean the whole district. A wide construction will not be given to any Act which tends to delegate the powers of Parliament to any one individual.

[De Villiers, C.J.: In the absence of evidence, must it not be presumed that the Proclamation is intra vires.

I am not arguing the question of evidence, but I do contend that evidence or no evidence this Proclamation is illegal on the face of it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: For aught I know, the whole district of Komgha may be an area where natives are congregated. If that be the case, surely the whole district can be proclaimed]

I submit not; that would be contrary to the terms of the Act.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Suppose the whole of the district of Komgha is a native location, what must the Governor do?]

He must go to Parliament for more extensive powers.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Might not the Government divide Komgha into two divisions, and proclaim them both?]

That might have been more satisfactory, but in point of fact he has not done so.

Mr. H. Jones (for the Crown): As to the Proclamation, section 21, gives the Governor power to define an area in a district. He has done so. He has defined the district of Komgha.

[Kotzé, J.: Must not all the defined areas be within one district?]

The language of the Act might have been clearer, but I take it that the Governor might proclaim an area consisting of half of one district and of half of a district adjoining thereto. It might have been better had the word "areas" in the plural, instead of "area" in the singular, been used. If the proclamation is invalid as to Komgha, the whole proclamation is invalid.

Mr. McGregor: I contend that the whole proclamation is invalid, but, of course, it is a very simple matter to reissue it in a valid form.

Mr. H. Jones: The argument for the appellant on the word "give" has no force. The argument as to words ejusdem generis clearly has no force where the words are evidently opposed to each other, e.g., "sell" and "give." See section 73, sub-section (6), of Act 28 of 1883. There "sell" and "deliver" must be equivalent, if counsel for the appellant is correct, but the case of Queen v. Robertson (2 Sheil, 235) and Rex v. Francis (11 Sheil, 76) show that this is not so.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Under the Act 28 of 1898 a man may make Kafir beer: may he give his wife a drink of it?]

Strictly speaking, he may not, but I do not believe that any Magistrate would convict under such circumstances. This, however, is quite a different case; for here people were treated who did not belong to the family at all.

[Kotzé, J.: Suppose a native helps himself to Kafir beer which he has not made, is anybody liable?]

Somebody must have put it in his way with the intention that it should be drunk. It is difficult to draw the line in all cases.

Mr. McGregor: The case of Queen v. Robertson is not in point as interpreting sections 21 and 22 of Act 28 of 1883. The words "supply or give" were added to that Act some ten years after it was passed in its original form. If a principle leads to difficulties and absurdities, it stands self-condemned, and I submit that local administrators of the law should not be entrusted with what is practically equitable jurisdiction.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (July 31).

De Villiers, C.J.: The 21st section of Act 28 of 1883 enacts that "in districts where aboriginal natives of South Africa are located or resident, or are congregated upon public or other works or mines, the Governor may define areas within the limits of which it shall not be competent for any Licensing Court to authorise the grant of a licence for the sale of liquor, except with the permission of the Governor." It is clear that such areas should be confined to localities in which natives are actually located, resident, or congregated, and should not include towns or tracts of country occupied mainly by Europeans. It would be a complete evasion of the section of the Act to declare whole divisions as such proclaimed areas without a full inquiry as to whether every portion thereof falls within the requirements of the Act. On this point I cannot do better than quote the words of the Lord Chancellor (Cairns) in the case of Macbeth v. Ashley (30 L.T. Rep., 310), in a case where the question was raised whether magistrates who are authorised by Statute to vary the hours of opening and closing licensed houses in Scotland within any burgh were justified in passing a resolution to the effect that all the licensed houses in a particular locality, which, in fact, included all the licensed houses in the burgh, shoud be closed at ten o'clock at night. "Of this I am quite certain," said the Lord Chancellor, "that neither your lordships, nor any other Court, if they found that magistrates had, under the guise of exercising a discretion, taken portion after portion of their district, not with reference to the view of the particular wants or requirements of each portion they selected, in order, by degrees, to take possession of the whole of their district, and under the pretence of exercising a discretion for each portion, virtually to subvert and change the general rule laid down by the Legislature, your lordships would not be prepared to sanction, but would prevent the exercise of a power which was used in that way." The Government may be firmly convinced that whole divisions should be declared areas within which there should be total prohibition, but the Governor has no right or power to act on that opinion, except in the manner directed by Parliament. The Act provides for the definition of such areas within districts, but the proclamation lumps several districts together, and declares the territory comprising those districts to be an area under the Act. There is much force in the contention of counsel for the appellant that this procedure renders the whole of the Proclamation invalid, but upon the whole I have come to the conclusion that the conviction ought not to be disturbed, if the locality where the alleged offence was committed could legally have been included in the area. Upon this point there is unfortunately no information before the Court, and in the absence of such information, the Court would be justified in presuming that the locality is in a proclaimable area. The charge against the appellant in the Court below was that in a proclaimed area he had sold, supplied, or given Kafir beer to an aboriginal Kafir labourer. The evidence shows that on the day in question there was what is called "a beer drink," at which the accused gave a can of beer to another native, but nothing was paid for the same. The question is, whether in so doing the accused was guilty of a contravention of the 22nd section of the Act? That section enacts that, "save and except as to any liquor administered medicinally, no person shall sell, supply, or give to any aboriginal native any liquor within the limits of any proclaimed area." Mr. McGregor, in the course of his able argument, has contended that the word "give" should be construed by the light of the words "sell and supply" immediately preceding, and that there is no "giving" in terms of the Act, unless there is some consideration for the gift. The word used is a general one, and should receive a general construction, unless the Statute itself contains grounds for limiting its meaning. The fact that the word follows the words "sell and apply" does not constitute such a ground, more especially if other portions of the Act show that the word was intended to be used in its general sense. I find that, with the exception of the sections dealing with natives and with children, the offence of selling liquor is alone declared punishable. In regard to children, the delivery of liquor is declared to be a contravention of the Act, and such delivery may take place without a sale. In the same way, I am of opinion the the giving of liquor to an aboriginal native within a proclaimed area constitutes a contravention of the 22nd section. The question next arises whether the passing of the 7th section of Act 28 of 1898 made any alteration in the law as to the liability of persons giving native beer to natives in any proclaimed area? That section makes it unlawful for any person to make Kafir beer on private property or on land hired from the Crown, without the permission of the owner or lessee, as the case might be, and it is contended that if a person has such permission, he may, after making Kafir beer, freely give it to others, provided only he receives no consideration for it. But, if before 1898 the giving of Kafir beer to aboriginal natives was prohibited, the Act of that year cannot be held to remove the prohibition, merely because the making of Kafir beer is placed under certain restrictions by that Act. The question, therefore, still remains, whether the 22nd section of the Act of 1883 contains such a prohibition, and, in my opinion, the language of the section is too clear to admit of any doubt. The result is a rather startling one, for the person to whom Kafir beer was given in the present case was a guest, and indeed a relative of the accused, and there is no evidence whatever that the so-called "beer drink" led to noise or disturbance of any kind. The case certainly illustrates the necessity of extreme care and caution in the definition of areas under the 21st section of Act 28 of 1883, for an illegal proclamation might have the effect of completely neutralising the objects which the Legislature had in view. In the case of Sigcau v. The Queen (12 S.C.R., 256), this Court refused to recognise the validity of a proclamation by which the Governor exceeded the powers conferred on him by an Act of Parliament, and the Privy Council fully supported the judgment of this Court. There the illegality was apparent on the face of the Proclamation, whereas in the present case it is just possible that the Proclamation may be valid so far as it affects the particular locality in which the alleged offence was committed. The presumption is in favour of such validity, and the appellant offered no evidence whatever to rebut that presumption. The locality where he committed the apparently harmless act of giving some Kafir beer to his friend is within the vast area comprised in the Proclamation, but he has failed to establish any ground for holding that it is not such a locality as the Governor could lawfully have proclaimed under the Act. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

Kotzé, J., concurred.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

REX v. ROSSOUW. { 1903. July 31st.

Theft—Animus furandi.

The taking of the goods of another does not constitute a theft if all the circumstances show that it was done without any animus furandi.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Acting Resident Magistrate of Springbokfontein. The accused had been charged in the court below with having in March, 1902, stolen a wagon, the property of one Christian Brand, which had been left at Hytkoras in the care of one Jan Obies. From the evidence led in the Magistrate's Court it appeared that the accused and one Michael Coetzee, his father-in-law, had lived on the said farm Hytkoras until Coetzee joined the enemy. In March, 1902, Coetzee, accompanied by other armed men, arrived on the farm, and forced the accused to trek with them to Namies, threatening to shoot him in the event of his refusing to do so. Not having a wagon to trek with, he packed his household goods, and placed his family on Brand's wagon, and left with the Boer commando. He did not, however, join the commando, nor was the wagon at any time used for military purposes. With the exception of a few mats, the property of Coetzee, only accused's goods were placed on the wagon, and they were still there when the police came to Namies, after peace had been declared. At Pella the accused reported to the police officer that the wagon was one which had been left at Namies by the enemy, and on this representation obtained possession of it on payment of £5. The Acting Resident Magistrate found the accused guilty of theft, and sentenced him to pay a fine of £25, or, in default, to five months' imprisonment with hard labour. From this sentence the accused now appealed.

Mr. De Waal (for appellant): The prisoner does not deny that he took the wagon and that he put his furniture on it, but denies that he took it with the intention of appropriating it. Coetzee, his father-in-law, who was a rebel, and whose right to commandeer is not questioned, ordered him to remove the wagon to a place of safety. There is no evidence to contradict that. It may be that Coetzee, who was personally interested—Rossouw looked after 150 sheep of Coetzee's—acted beyond his powers, but that cannot affect Rossouw. True, the wagon was, as a matter of fact, not made use of by the enemy, but it was removed to a place where a body of the enemy were stationed, and might at any time have been used by them, when found necessary. Articles are frequently requisitioned during war for possible future use, or for the purpose of preventing them from falling into the hands of the enemy. Rossouw's failure to take the wagon back immediately after the cessation of hostilities to the place from whence he had taken it is consistent with the fact that the wagon was commandeered. If he had removed it, instead of leaving it with the other wagons left at Namies by the Boers, he would have acted as though the wagon were his own, and this would have been evidence of felonious intent. Had he intended to exercise dominion over it, he would have sold the wagon or fled with it, and not bought it, as he did. At most, the removal of the wagon from Hytkoras amounts to a furtum usus, which in our law is not an indictable offence.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Thereby he showed that he did not regard the wagon as his own.]

As to the purchase, he bought the wagon (which was an old one) for £5, and would he have bought it if he already regarded it as his own? I submit that in this case there was not even a furtum usus. See Queen v. Fortuin (1 Ap. C., 290), and Queen v. Dier (1 Ap. Rep., 290). I do not dispute that if the accused had wrongfully removed the wagon, a civil action might have been brought.

Mr. H. Jones (for the Crown): The prisoner had no right to take the wagon, and now he tries to shield himself under the ægis of Coetzee, but then Coetzee himself had no right to take the wagon. Coetzee was a rebel, and certainly he had no right to take goods for his own purposes. See Rex v. Burns (12 C.T.R., 882). The wagon was never used for military purposes, and was taken simply to cart away the goods of a private individual. Coetzee did not want the wagon, but he allowed the appellant to take it.

[Kotzé, J.: There is no evidence against Coetzee.]

The Magistrate finds that when the wagon was taken it was so taken with the intention of depriving the owner of it. The accused never sent the wagon back. There has never been a case in which a man has kept goods for a long period in which the Court has held that only a furtum usus had been committed. Here the accused kept the wagon for three months.

[Kotzé, J.: Namaqualand is not a very thickly populated district. He may not have been able to send the wagon back.]

But he kept his goods on the wagon. If A takes B's property, prima facie A is guilty of theft, and the onus is on A to show that he is not guilty. After peace the accused tried to buy the wagon, in order to make his title secure; but he obtained it under false pretences —by representing that it belonged to the enemy, whereas, in point of fact, it never did.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Oh, yes, it had been commandeered.]

But it was never used by the enemy.

[De Villiers, C.J.: That is quite immaterial.]

Then, again, £5 is a very small sum to pay for a wagon.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But you take his money, and then accuse him of stealing the wagon.]

Mr. De Waal was not called upon in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: If the taking of the wagon had taken place under normal circumstances it would have been difficult to avoid the conclusion that the accused intended to deprive the owner of his property in the wagon, but the special circumstances of the case appear to me to show that there was no animus furandi on the part of the prisoner. There was a state of war, and the burghers of the Republics had invaded the district. The father-in-law of the accused joined the burghers, and forced the accused to take the wagon for the apparent purpose of preventing it from being made use of by the British troops. The accused himself, who seems to have thought that he was in danger from the British troops, took the wagon and placed his personal belongings in it, but he took an early opportunity of taking the wagon to Namies. When peace was proclaimed he took no steps to remove the wagon from Namies, nor did he conceal the fact of the wagon being there from the British authorities, but, on the contrary, he asked them to sell the wagon to him. It is said that he bought the wagon on a false representation, that it had been left derelict by the enemy, but the statement cannot be regarded as false, seeing that the wagon had been left by the enemy after having been in the possession of the enemy for some time. The authorities sold the wagon to him for £5, and after the money had been taken from him a criminal prosecution was instituted against him for the theft of the wagon. Under all the circumstances of this case, I am of opinion that there was no animus furandi on his part, and that the conviction ought to be set aside.

[Appellant's Attorneys: Michau and De Villiers.]

KROOMER V. LOBASCHER.

Mr. McGregor asked leave to move as a matter of urgency for an order restraining Messrs. Stamper and Zoutendyk from parting with the proceeds of a sale of the respondent's goods, pending the result of an action. The petition set forth that the action was for £500 damages for false imprisonment, and malicious prosecution, and that, owing to pressure during the term, it had been transferred from the 24th June to the 5th August. The respondent carried on business as a furniture dealer at Wynberg, and the petitioner had discovered that the contents of the shop were being sold by public auction by Messrs. Stamper and Zoutendyk. The defendant had no immovable property, and it was feared that he would leave.

De Villiers, C.J., said that the Court was of opinion there should be no order on the claim, but that some amount should be retained in the hands of Messrs. Stamper and Zoutendyk to meet the costs of the proceedings of the action. A rule would be granted, therefore, calling upon the respondent to show cause by the 5th August why the auctioneers, Messrs. Stamper and Zoutendyk, should not be ordered to retain the sum of £60 as part of the proceeds of the sale, to meet the costs of the action; the rule to be served on Messrs. Stamper and Zoutendyk, as well as the respondent, and to act as an interdict in the meantime; costs to be costs in the cause.

REX V. FLORIQUY. { 1903. July 31st.

Proclamation—Aboriginal natives—Proclaimed areas.

The Governor, by Proclamation, declared the districts of Victoria East and Stutterheim to be an area under the 21st section of Act 28 of 1883. At the date of the Proclamation the appellant was the holder of an unexpired licence for the sale of liquor in Alice without any condition as to the sale to aboriginal natives. The town of Alice, according to the record, is a seat of magistracy. The appellant having been convicted of illegally selling liquor to a native after the date of this Proclamation.

Held, that the Governor had no power to include a town with a European population and a seat of magistracy in such an area, and that the conviction should be set aside.

This was an appeal from a conviction of the Resident Magistrate of Victoria East, under section 22 of Act 28 of 1883, "in that he (defendant) did on or about the 8th June, 1903, at Alice, wrongfully and unlawfully sell, supply, or give to an aboriginal native within the limits of an area proclaimed by Proclamation 67 of 1903, dated May 26, and published in the 'Government Gazette' of the 2nd June, 1903, certain intoxicating liquor, viz., one bottle of Cape brandy, sold to one Charlie Currie, who is an aborginal native, within the meaning of the Act."

Mr. Burton (for the appellant) said that the conviction was objected to on two grounds. He submitted that the town of Alice was not a place where natives were located. The defendant kept an hotel in the middle of a town of the Colony. The Proclamation had attached to it a schedule which defined for prohibition purposes "an area in and comprising the districts of Stutterheim and Victoria East and limited by the boundaries of the respective districts." He contended that but for this Proclamation the appellant could not have been charged with committing a criminal offence. The Proclamation, he submitted, was too sweeping to be consistent with the powers given by the Legislature, and was ultra vires. The appellant was a European, and was proprietor of the Royal Hotel, in Wienand-street, Alice. Section 21 only gave the Government power to define areas within the limits of which it should not be competent for any Licensing Court to authorise the granting of licences. The proper construction of section 22 was that it should be read in conjunction with section 21, and the meaning clearly was that the sale of liquor to natives where a licence had not already been granted before any area had been proclaimed was prohibited, but where a man had got his licence, where the Licensing Court, acting legally within its powers, had granted him a licence, the Government could not proclaim an area, stopping at once licences which were already lawfully granted. He submitted that if this area were properly proclaimed even then the Proclamation did not affect this man's licence, which had been lawfully granted.

Mr. Howel Jones (for the Crown) submitted that under section 21 of the Act it was clear that the Governor could proclaim prohibited areas, and that that section provided for areas much larger than the location itself. He contended that the Governor had the right to prohibit any man, irrespective of whether he had been granted a licence by the Licensing Court or not, from selling liquor to a native. There should be a reasonable margin outside the location itself, so as to prevent the native from obtaining liquor. Take the natives at the Docks, for instance. He could see no reason why, under the Act, a certain area contiguous to the Docks should not be proclaimed, and any hotel within that area should not be prohibited from selling liquor to natives.

Mr. Burton was not called upon in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: I have not much to add to the remarks which I made this morning in the case of King v. Mathebus. In that case there was no information whatever before the Court to enable it to decide whether or not the locality where the alleged offence was committed was a locality in which aboriginal natives are located or resident or congregated in the sense contemplated by the Legislature. In the present case it appears from the record that the offence is alleged to have been committed in the town of Alice, which is the seat of magistracy of Victoria East. It has been stated on behalf of the prosecution that there are natives congregated near the town, but that statement would be true in regard to every town—in every district of the Colony. Natives are congregated in large numbers at the Docks, and at Uitvlugt, near Cape Town, and if the contention of the prosecution is correct, the Governor would have the power to declare not only Cape Town, but the whole Colony to be an area within which it shall not be competent for the Licensing Court to authorise the issue of a liquor licence, except with the permission of the Governor. It may be very desirable that such a power should be exercised, but if the Legislature had intended such a far-reaching result, it would have used very different language from that actually employed. The Licensing Courts are entrusted with large powers in regard to the granting and withholding of licences and the introduction of conditions into such licences. Among the conditions which they may impose is the very usual one that no liquor shall be sold to any aboriginal native. Where this condition is imposed the applicant for a licence may, of course, reconsider his application, and if the condition would be too burdensome, he would not take out the licence, for the payment of which a considerable sum is required. But if no condition whatever is imposed, and the money is paid by him, he is justified in believing that during the period for which he has paid his licence money no fresh condition shall be imposed upon him. The appellant applied for a licence for the sale of liquor in the town of Alice, and as no restriction was placed on the sale of liquor to natives, he paid the amount of licence money, of which the revenue has had the benefit. One may regret that any revenue should be derived from such a source, but that consitutes no reason for doing injustice to individuals. If the proclamation is valid any European resident in the two districts thereby proclaimed as an area would be liable to a very heavy penalty for giving a glass of beer to any native within such area. If the proclamation is valid, so far as it affects the town of Alice, the appellant would, before the expiration of the period for which he has paid his licence money, be deprived of a right for which he has paid full consideration. It is, moreover, by no means clear that the Licensing Court would have the power to grant him a fresh licence for the following year, even with a condition that he shall not sell liquor to aboriginal natives. I am clearly of opinion that a town like Alice, with its admittedly European population and seat of magistracy, does not constitute a locality which may lawfully be included within any area proclaimed under the 21st section of Act 28 of 1883, and that the conviction must be set aside.

SUPREME COURT

Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C. K.C.M.G., LL.D) and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

ADMISSION. { 1903. Aug. 1st.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for the admission of James Henry Versfeld as an attorney and notary.

Application granted.

Mr. Benjamin moved for the admission of Hubert Bowyer Sampier as an attorney and notary.

Application granted.

Mr. Close moved for the admission of Alfred James Wadeson as a translator in the German, Dutch, and Italian languages.

Application granted.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

ASTROP V. DAY.

Mr. Upington moved for provisional sentence upon a promissory note for £100, and for judgment for £500, being the amount of a dishonoured cheque, with interest and costs of suit.

Order granted as prayed.

SEDGWICK AND CO. V. HARCOURT.

Mr. Upington moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate. The provisional order was granted on the 18th July, 1903.

Order granted as prayed.

VAN REENEN V. WIGGINS.

Mr. De Waal moved for a decree of civil imprisonment of the defendant. On the 16th May, 1903, a writ was issued for the sum of £25 5s. and £10 9s. 8d. costs. The defendant had tendered part payment, leaving £28 11s. still due.

Order granted as prayed.

LETTMANN, LANDSBERG AND OTHERS V. BLOMSON.

Mr. Alexander moved for judgment under Rule 329d, for the sum of £16 4s., with costs of suit, and asked that a provisional claim be allowed to stand over till Thursday next.

Order and application granted.

ALTIE V. HADIE.

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence on a certain promissory note for £325.

Mr. Close, for the defendant, read the latter's affidavit, in which he denied that the mark affixed to the note was his. The plaintiff was indebted to him in the sum of £226, being the balance of the purchase price of certain property. An affidavit by one of the witnesses to the document was also read, in which it was set forth that the plaintiff promised to pay the defendant £25 for re-writing the document.

Mr. Benjamin read the answering affidavit of the plaintiff, in which he denied that he was indebted to the defendant in the sum of £226. He admitted that he owed him £26. When the defendant signed the promissory note he was perfectly well aware of the nature of the document. Counsel also put in the affidavit of Mahomed Isaacs, another witness to the note, which also set out that the defendant was perfectly acquainted with the contents thereof.

Mr. Close pointed out that the defendant had entered an appearance to the illiquid claim, and it might be convenient to fix the same day for the hearing of the present motion.

Allowed to stand over accordingly.

RICHARDSON V. ROBERTS.

Mr. Upington moved for provisional sentence upon a certain promissory note for £30, with interest from April, 1903. There was another matter pending against the same defendant, in which there was an application for provisional sentence upon a judgment of the Resident Magistrate's Court. The provisional sentence was asked for the purpose of having the defendant's landed property declared executable, at the suit of another plaintiff. Under the circumstances, counsel applied, under Rule 36 of Court, to have the property declared executable.

After the hearing of Cloete v. Roberts. the order was granted as prayed, and the property declared executable.

CASTLE WINE AND BRANDY CO. V. BLOMSON.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for provisional sentence on promissory notes of £100, £305 19s. 7d., and for judgment, under rule 329d, for £21 4s. 8d, being an amount of money due.

Provisional sentence granted, but judgment refused on the other claims, on the ground of insufficient notice.

STEER V. HANSEN.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for provisional sentence for the sum of £150, with interest from the 15th November, 1902, at the rate of 6 per cent., being the amount due on a certain mortgage bond, and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable, with costs of suit.

Order granted as prayed.

PHILLIP BROS. V. SUTTON

Mr. Buchanan moved for the civil imprisonment of the defendant on an unsatisfied judgment for £34 17s. 3d., and £6 5s. 2d. costs, for money lent and advanced and goods sold and delivered. The matter was formerly before the Court and allowed to stand over for an affidavit from the defendant, which now set forth that he was a watchman in the Customs Department, and that he had no means of satisfying the debt. He had a wife and six children and could not possibly pay more than £1 per month in liquidation of the debt. The allegation that he had other means was untrue. Counsel read the affidavit of the plaintiff's attorneys, and said that he was instructed that the property had been settled on his wife in 1899, and the debt was incurred in 1897.

Order granted as prayed.

SHUR AND ABRAHAMSON V. STROUD.

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for the sum of £33, with interest and costs of suit.

Order granted as prayed.

Order granted as prayed.

VAN REENEN V. WIGGINS.

Mr. De Waal moved for a decree of civil imprisonment of the defendant. On the 16th May, 1903, a writ was issued for the sum of £25 5s. and £10 9s. 8d. costs. The defendant had tendered part payment, leaving £28 11s. still due.

Order granted as prayed.

LETTMANN, LANDSBERG AND OTHERS V. BLOMSON.

Mr. Alexander moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for the sum of £16 4s.,

with costs of suit, and asked that a provisional claim be allowed to stand over till Thursday next.

Order and application granted.

ALTIE V. HADIE.

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence on a certain promissory note for £325.

Mr. Close, for the defendant, read the latter's affidavit, in which he denied that the mark affixed to the note was his. The plaintiff was indebted to him in the sum of £226, being the balance of the purchase price of certain property. An affidavit by one of the witnesses to the document was also read, in which it was set forth that the plaintiff promised to pay the defendant £25 for re-writing the document.

Mr. Benjamin read the answering affidavit of the plaintiff, in which he denied that he was indebted to the defendant in the sum of £226. He admitted that he owed him £26. When the defendant signed the promissory note he was perfectly well aware of the nature of the document. Counsel also put in the affidavit of Mahomed Isaacs, another witness to the note, which also set out that the defendant was perfectly acquainted with the contents thereof.

Mr. Close pointed out that the defendant had entered an appearance to the illiquid claim, and it might be convenient to fix the same day for the hearing of the present motion.

Allowed to stand over accordingly.

RICHARDSON V. ROBERTS.

Mr. Upington moved for provisional sentence upon a certain promissory note for £30, with interest from April, 1903. There was another matter pending against the same defendant, in which there was an application for provisional sentence upon a judgment of the Resident Magistrate's Court. The provisional sentence was asked for the purpose of having the defendant's landed property declared executable, at the suit of another plaintiff. Under the circumstances, counsel applied, under Rule 36 of Court, to have the property declared executable.

After the hearing of Cloete v. Roberts. the order was granted as prayed, and the property declared executable.

CASTLE WINE AND BRANDY CO. V. BLOMSON.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for provisional sentence on promissory notes of £100, £305 19s. 7d., and for judgment, under rule 329d, for £21 4s. 8d, being an amount of money due.

Provisional sentence granted, but judgment refused on the other claims, on the ground of insufficient notice.

STEER V. HANSEN.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for provisional sentence for the sum of £150, with interest from the 15th November, 1902, at the rate of 6 per cent., being the amount due on a certain mortgage bond, and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable, with costs of suit.

Order granted as prayed.

PHILLIP BROS. V. SUTTON

Mr. Buchanan moved for the civil imprisonment of the defendant on an unsatisfied judgment for £34 17s. 3d., and £6 5s. 2d. costs, for money lent and advanced and goods sold and delivered. The matter was formerly before the Court and allowed to stand over for an affidavit from the defendant, which now set forth that he was a watchman in the Customs Department, and that he had no means of satisfying the debt. He had a wife and six children and could not possibly pay more than £1 per month in liquidation of the debt. The allegation that he had other means was untrue. Counsel read the affidavit of the plaintiff's attorneys, and said that he was instructed that the property had been settled on his wife in 1899, and the debt was incurred in 1897.

Order granted as prayed.

SHUR AND ABRAHAMSON V. STROUD.

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for the sum of £33, with interest and costs of suit.

Order granted as prayed.

CLOETE V. ROBERTS. { 1903. Aug. 1st.

[Interest — Usury — Provisional sentence.

Provisional sentence granted for the amount of a promissory note with interest at 25 per cent. as stipulated for in the note, the defendant raising no objection and the amount of interest claimed not exceeding the capital.

Mr. Upington moved for provisional sentence on promissory notes for the sum of £25, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent., £42, with interest at the rate of 25 per cent. from the 7th April, and for the sum of £11 10s., being the balance of a certain unsatisfied judgment of the Resident Magistrate's Court. There was also an application that certain landed property belonging to the defendant should be declared executable, but, with regard to the interest at the rate of 25 per cent., counsel said that he would leave that entirely in the hands of the Court.

De Villiers, C.J.: The defendant raises no objection to the payment of 25 per cent. as stipulated for in the promissory note, and in the absence of such an objection the Court may assume that sound reasons existed for such a high rate of interest. I fully agree with the remark made by Watermeyer, J., in Dyason v. Ruthven (3 Searle, 312), that "If any stipulation of interest be attacked as liable to reduction, on the ground of usury or extortion, this can only be done by offering proof of the usury and extortion in the particular case." It might have been different in the present case if the amount claimed had exceeded the capital, but only four months' interest is claimed in the summons, and provisional sentence must be granted accordingly.

PHILIP BROS. V. SNAEDER.

Mr. Benjamin moved for the provisional order for the sequestration of the defendant's estate to be made final.

Order granted.

GARLICK AND CO. V. HARTS.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for the provisional order of sequestration of the defendant's estate to be made final.

Order granted.

PURCELL AND OTHERS V. BOND.

Mr. Close moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate.

The provisional order was granted on the 18th July.

Order granted.

HUGHES V CLIFFORD.

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence on certain taxed bills of costs for £61 1s. 9d. and £32 18s. 8d., less £69 paid on account.

Order granted as prayed.

KATZEN V. MOORE BROS. { 1903. Aug. 1st.

Mortgage bond—Three months' notice—Provisional sentence.

To a claim for provisional sentence for the capital of a bond the defence was raised that the three months' notice had been given before the expiration of a year from the time when the interest began to run. The interest was payable half-yearly, and three months' notice was given so as to require payment of the capital after the first six months had expired. Provisional sentence granted.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved for provisional sentence upon a mortgage bond for £900, with interest from the 1st January, 1903. The bond had become due primarily by reason of three months' notice having been given calling up the bond, and also by reason of the non-payment of interest due half-yearly on the 30th June last.

Mr. Buchanan, for the defendant, drew attention to the fact that the summons claimed that it was due on account of three months' notice having been given, but the summons did not claim it due by reason of the non-payment of the interest, which had not been paid on account of the dispute in this case as to whether plaintiff could call up the bond within a year. The affidavit of the defendant, Albert Moore, set forth that he admitted the due execution of the mortgage bond for £900, but denied that the plaintiff had any right to give three months' notice. On the 3rd October, 1902, he bought a property at Diep River, and scarcely a month after the bond had been registered he received notice from the plaintiff to pay the sum. Defendant repudiated plaintiff's right to call up the bond for twelve months.

The affidavit of the plaintiff stated that it was made quite clear to the defendant that he could call up the bond at any time he wished to do so. There was never any suggestion that the plaintiff was not within his right.

Mr. Buchanan submitted that the bond should be taken in the same way as a promissory note, payable on demand, that the clause must be read with the whole meaning of the bond, and that at least one 30th June and one 31st December must elapse before the bond could be called up. Counsel contended that as the insurance was payable yearly, and the bond was a reasonable security, the clause was qualified.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., said that if the plaintiff had sued before the 30th June the case of Wainwright quoted by his learned friend would have been against him. The plaintiff was entitled to ask for the terms of the bond, and custom would not go against the explicit terms of the contract.

De Villiers, C.J.: The case in the Eastern Districts Court is not applicable, for there interest was payable yearly, and a full year had not expired at the time at which payment was demanded. In the present case the interest is payable half-yearly, and a full half-year had expired at the date fixed by the notice. The plaintiff was entitled to ask for payment of the capital on giving three months' notice, and as he has given the notice, he is entitled to provisional sentence.

On the application of Mr. Buchanan, stay of execution was granted for fourteen days to allow the defendants to enter into a new bond.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

PIENAAR V. WEITZ. { 1903. Aug. 1st.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., asked leave to move as a matter of urgency for an order calling upon the respondent to show cause why this case should not be postponed until November next. The affidavit of the defendant, Francis Weitz, of Ceres, stated that he was sued for £84 7s 6d., alleged to be the balance of the purchase price of certain sheep. His plea set up an agreement with the plaintiff whereby the latter agreed to accept £51 in full settlement, and as a satisfactory price for the sheep. In view of the fact that there would be a direct conflict of evidence, the evidence of one A. Snyman, at present in the Transvaal, would be material. His wife also had been in bad health, and it was essential that she should take a sea voyage. The transaction took place in 1901, and the plaintiff's summons was only filed in June, 1903. Since 1901 the plaintiff had never made any application to the defendant.

Mr. Burton, for the respondent, opposed the application, and put in the affidavit of William Krige, the plaintiff's attorney, of Ceres, which stated that the plaintiff lived fully ten hours' drive from the village, and that no post would reach him for many days. The plaintiff had made all arrangements for his witnesses, and Snyman had no knowledge of the case, and the defendant had ample time to communicate with him.

Application granted, the defendant to pay the costs of the postponement.

DE WAAL V. DE WAAL.

Mr. De Waal asked leave to move as a matter of urgency for an order calling upon the respondent to show cause why a curator bonis should not be appointed. The affidavit of the respondent's wife, Winifred Rachel de Waal, stated that the respondent, Dr. Gideon de Waal, of Colesberg, was squandering his money in a most reckless fashion in drink, and that it was necessary to have someone to look after him.

De Villiers, C.J.: Will he squander much between this and Monday morning?

Mr. De Waal: I think so, my lord.

An order was granted calling upon the defendant to show cause, by the 5th August, why his brother should not then be appointed curator bonis, and why the rule should not then be made absolute.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

DAY V. DAY. { 1903. Aug. 3rd.

This was an action, brought by the plaintiff (the husband), now residing in the division of Victoria West, against his wife, for the restitution of conjugal rights, or failing compliance, for divorce. Mr. Buchanan appeared for the plaintiff, and the respondent was unrepresented.

The plaintiff stated that he was married to the respondent in community of property at Bloemfontein on the 14th June, 1898. They lived together at Heilbron until September, 1899, when the plaintiff was compelled to take up arms by the late Free State Government on the outbreak of the war. His wife went to live with her mother at Bloemfontein. On the cessation of hostilities he again saw his wife at Bloemfontein, but she declined to go and live with him. He had received an offer at Victoria West from Mr. Van Heerden, which he had accepted, and he was now farming in that division. He had repeatedly asked the defendant to return to him, but she had refused to do so. She had been residing in Durban, Natal, but had recently come to Cape Town.

A decree of restitution of conjugal rights was granted, calling upon the defendant to return or to receive her husband on the 31st August, failing which a rule would issue calling upon the defendant to show cause on the 4th September why a decree of divorce should not be granted, with forfeiture of benefits of community, the rule to be served personally.

Postea (September 15th).

The Court granted a decree of divorce.

BARLOW V. BARLOW.

Mr. Alexander moved for an order removing this case for trial to the Circuit Court at Oudtshoorn. The defendant was in default, and on the 8th June last the plaintiff was granted leave to sue her husband by edictal citation. The notice of trial was personally served on the defendant, and he had hitherto failed to enter an appearance, and plaintiff petitioned, in order to save expense and inconvenience, that the case might be transferred for trial to the Circuit Court in the district of Oudtshoorn.

Order granted as prayed.

HICKMAN V. HICKMAN. { 1903. Aug. 3rd.

Adultery — Non-access — Non-cohabitation.

The plaintiff did not cohabit with or even have access to the defendant, his wife, for two years, at the end of which time she gave birth to a child.

Held, that this constituted sufficient proof of adultery.

This was an action, brought by Walter Thomas William Hickman, of Kimberley, against his wife, Annie Maud Hickman (born Mustin), for divorce on the ground of her adultery. Mr. Upington appeared for the applicant, and the respondent was unrepresented.

Charles W. H. Smith, clerk in charge of the marriage registers, Colonial Office, gave evidence as to the registration of the marriage.

The plaintiff, an engine driver in the employ of De Beers at Kimberley, said he was married in community to the defendant at Queen's Town in October, 1891. After having been a year at Queen's Town, they removed to East London, and afterwards went to Bloemfontein. In 1896 they quarrelled about his wife going to a dance; he would not consent to her going. He went on duty that night, and found that she had gone to town. She would not come home, and he took the child away. She remained in Bloemfontein for a few days, and then she went to East London against his wish. He then went to Kroonstad, where she returned to him about eight months afterwards. He subsequently sold his effects, and sent his wife and children to her mother at East London. He went to Kimberley to look for work, and he sent money to his wife regularly. In 1898 he heard that she had gone to Natal. He remained at Kimberley, and had his children with him there, but sent them away on the investment of the town. After the siege he went to East London, and subsequently saw his wife in King William's Town. She was accompanied by a child, which she admitted she had had to a man named Evans in Natal. He could not sue then for divorce, because he had no money. He received a letter from her. In September, 1902, he heard further information about her, and in May of this year he instituted proceedings against her. The children were still with their grandmother, Mrs. Mustin. His wife subsequently wrote from Potchefstroom to his solicitors, asking for particulars of the case.

De Villiers, C.J.: The Court always exercises the utmost care in cases where the birth of a child after a period of non access on the part of the husband is relied on as proof of adultery, seeing that a judgment against the wife has then practical effect of declaring the child to be illegitimate. Certainly, there are circumstances in this case which would justify the Court in accepting plaintiff's testimony as sufficient proof of adultery, because, according to his uncontradicted evidence, he had no access to his wife from 1897 to 1900, and in June, 1900, he found his wife with a child apparently about eight or nine months old. She was suckling the child, which could not have been twelve months old, and, as he had had no access to his wife since 1897, and this child was born some couple of years after his last access, that would be conclusive proof of adultery. A decree of divorce will be granted, with forfeiture of benefits of community, the plaintiff to have custody of the children, with the usual order as to reasonable access being given to the defendant.

WIGGETT V. OOSTHUYSEN.

Mr. Searle, K.C., moved for an order calling on the respondent to show cause why this action should not be removed for trial to the Circuit Court at Mossel Bay. The petition of the defendant set out that both parties resided at Mossel Bay, and that, on account of the late arrival of the steamers in Cape Town, it would be necessary to bring all the witnesses down a week before the trial of the case. His wife was in bad health, and if the application were allowed, it would considerably lessen the expense.

Mr. Buchanan (for the respondent) opposed the application, and put in the affidavit of the plaintiff's attorney, which stated that it would be very inconvenient for a material witness, George Brown, of Mowbray, to come to Mossel Bay. The action turned upon a question of account, and involved a matter of either £100 or £67.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It certainly seems more convenient to have the case tried at Mossel Bay. There is only one witness residing here.]

Mr. Buchanan: It might be entirely a matter of convenience.

De Villiers, C.J.: the balance of convenience seems to be in favour of Mossel Bay, and the case is not of such importance as to require three judges to decide it. The case will be removed to Mossel Bay, and the costs will be costs in the cause. If the parties wish to save the expense of a fresh application for a commission, the Court will make the order at once, and will order the evidence of George Brown to be taken on commission, Mr. Van Zyl to act as commissioner.

WAR DEPARTMENT V. WRIGHT.

Mr. Upington moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £76 10s. 3d., value of certain rations, forage, and foodstuffs supplied by the plaintiffs to the defendant.

Judgment as prayed.

WAINER V. SNAEDER.

Mr. Alexander moved, under Rule 329d, for delivery of a certain mortgage bond for £750, of which the plaintiff was the legal holder, by virtue of a certain concession.

Judgment as prayed.

DE WET V. BOTHA.

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence for £3,061 1s., together with interest on the sum of £3,000 from the 31st May, 1903, under certain conditions of sale. The plaintiff, Isabella Catherina Johanna de Wet, was the vendor of certain erven, with buildings thereon, situate at Worcester, offered for sale by auction by Mr. J. J. Theron. The conditions of sale were that the purchaser must pay 2 per cent. of the purchase price to the auctioneer as commission, expenses of transfer, and so on. The conditions having been read over at the sale, the property was put up, but declared not sold at £2,701. It was later in the day sold to Mr. Botha for £3,000, under the conditions of sale, with certain amendments as to possession and so forth. The plaintiff sought provisional sentence for £3,000 purchase price, £60 being 2 per cent. of purchase price due to the auctioneer as fees, and £1 1s. conditions of sale, and also interest from the 31st May on the purchase price, plaintiff tendering transfer.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., read the defendant's affidavit, which was to the effect that he did not dispute the sale of the property to him by the plaintiff for £3,000, but he repudiated liability for the auctioneer's commission and conditions of sale, £61 1s. He went late to the sale, and he saw the property withdrawn at £2,701, which was his bid, following a bid of £2,700, which had been made by someone else as a blind. He afterwards entered into negotiations with the plaintiff for the purchase of the property, and after some bargaining, he agreed to buy at £3,000. He did not agree to pay the auctioneer's commission, and, in fact, nothing was said at the time about it. Theron took no part in the transaction. Deponent did not buy under the fall of the hammer. The bargain was one purely and simply between the plaintiff and himself direct. He subsequently went down to the auctioneer's offices at the request of Mr. Theron, jun. He was not a man of letters, and he signed a document that was put before him without understanding its meaning. He signed the document in good faith, wherein he agreed to discharge auction dues. If he had known that he would have to pay commission he would not have bought the property at the price. He considered that he was duped into signing the document, as he should not have signed it if he had known its stipulations.

Mr. Benjamin read the affidavit of Mr. Theron's son, who was acting as his father's manager, in which he stated that he distinctly remembered the defendant being present at the sale when the conditions were read over. He emphatically denied that the defendant was duped into signing the conditions of sale. He denied that defendant made a legal tender. A corroborative affidavit was also sworn by a wagon builder at Worcester.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (August 10th).

De Villiers, C.J.: In this case the plaintiff is clearly not entitled to commission, and provisional sentence will, therefore, be granted for the amount of £3,000. The plaintiff will pay all costs incurred subsequent to the date of tender.

HILLS V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT. { 1903. Aug. 3rd.

Award of arbitrators—Costs.

This was an application for judgment in terms of a certain award of referees, to whom certain accounts between the applicant and the respondents had been referred by judgment of the Court in March last. The report set out that the referees found that the actual cost incurred in the construction of the railways taken over by the Government, viz., the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line, the Somerset East-Fort Beaufort line, and the Fort Beaufort-King William's Town line, including buildings, plant, and material, subject to certain suspense accounts, amounted to £1,153,283 7s. 4d. The payments made to the contractors on account amounted to £1,005,232 14s. 1d. The moneys retained by the Government from time to time amounted to £70,689 14s. 5d. The latter amount covered retention money on the work done up to the 12th May, 1902, when the Government took over the works. Certain amounts had been expended by the Government since the 12th May, 1902, in making good certain faulty work at various points on the lines, and these amounts the referees considered should be recovered from the retention money. One item of £851 15s. 11d. called for special comment. In 1898, under an award in arbitration between the estate of the late Sir Andries Stockenstrom and the contractor, the latter was empowered to acquire from the estate whatever land was necessary for railway purposes at Bedford. For some reason not explained he omitted to acquire all the lots necessary, and at some later date the land not so taken was sold for the estate named. The Government had since to expropriate this land, and the price in advance of the original cost, viz., £98 4s. 1d., should be charged against the retention money. It was impossible to prepare a complete list of the London accounts, but all Colonial accounts were passed that were in order. The suspense account consisted of: (a) unpaid wages; (b) unpaid salary; (c) unvouched amounts, London accounts, which might be added to "actual cost"; and (d) unpaid London account, which might be excluded from "actual cost." They submitted as fair to both parties that the unpaid wages should be paid by authorised agents of the Government, or both parties. Although the contractor's representatives had been asked to supply the necessary details of the unvouched expenditure of the London account they had so far failed to do so, and that had been placed to the suspense account. The parties to whom payments were made were solicitors, or agents, acting solely in the interests of the contractor in the negotiations with the Government in connection with alterations in the contract. They held that there was every presumption that these charges were for the benefit of the contractor, and on these grounds they were of opinion that they should not be allowed, but Mr. Roy held that they were part of the actual cost. The item of £1,135 9s. 6d. for passenger traffic should, in accordance with a former agreement, be handed over to charities. The balance due to the contractor was £76,225 9s. 4d.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Close), for the applicant. Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. McGregor), for respondent.

Mr. Searle, K.C.: All the referees are agreed that the Government should pay out the claims of all the employees. That will make £95,000 to be added to the £76,000 for actual costs. Then the law costs incurred in negotiating these contracts ought not to be struck out, though possibly they might be reduced.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What about the charges for Urquhart and Ainsley?]

Urquhart is a fully qualified engineer, who stayed out here for a year supervising the work. He also gave evidence at the trial. Ainsley was out in the Colony for six months, and negotiated the second contract. I submit that the payments made to both these gentlemen were part of the actual costs. The referees want the opinion of the Court as to these actual costs; but it is quite a wrong principle that the Government are not liable for services from which they have not derived any actual benefit. Since office charges have been allowed, exchange has been allowed, and even the London charges have been allowed, I would submit that a reasonable sum should be allowed for the salaries of Urquhart and Ainsley. Again, as to the question of interest, the Court said that interest was not to be allowed; but the report (at p. 15) shows that it has been allowed to the extent of £8,152 under various items. Over £2,000 of this was for overdrafts. So, also (at page 30), some £34,921 are allowed for interest, of which a considerable sum was on overdrafts. I take it that when the Court refused to allow interest it meant interest on capital, not such as would be charged by the bank in the ordinary way of business. The Government claimed £70,000, and now refuses to pay us the £100,000 which it clearly owes us. I submit that the Government should pay costs.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for the Government): The award of the referees includes costs incurred in London and in this colony. Paragraph 7 of the Report includes certain charges in respect of land which the contractor is bound by his contract to transfer to Government. Subject to these remarks, I am not prepared to oppose judgment for £76,000. As regards the items on which the referees have not reported in favour of the Government, the plaintiff has nothing to go upon. It is for him to obtain a judgment of Court for such sums as he alleges to be due. As to the £19,000, the referees decline to report upon that. I would suggested that some person connected with the Court should have £19,400 deposited with him to meet any claim in respect of wages.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why not deposit that sum with the Government?]

We have no special knowledge of what wages are due, and I would submit that if further information is required the matter should be referred back to the referees. Take, for instance, the case of the claim of Orpen, the surveyor; we are quite willing that he should sue the Government, but we must be put in the position of the contractor, so that we may have his defences. The claim as to the £76,000 is common cause, and it would hardly be fair to refer that back. The arbitrators crave the direction of the Court as to other four items. The Court can remit the whole matter back to the arbitrators. The contractor owes a number of debts (e.g., in England), and we want to be sure that the money due to these creditors will not be applied to some other purpose.

Mr. Searle (in reply): The arbitrators were unanimous that the £19,404 could be dealt with under par. 3 of the report. As to wages due, we will give all the information we can. It may be that many of those to whom wages are owing will never come forward to claim them, and, of course, the Government will benefit by that. I would suggest that the matter be referred to Mr. Tippets.

[De Villiers, C.J.: He could hardly act for both parties.]

Well, then, I would suggest that the matter should be referred back to the arbitrators. In reference to the £6,000 the arbitrators ask the direction of the Court. We have no objection to being ordered to give transfer of the land in question. As to the £4,000 (item 3 of expenses), that is money most of which has been paid out, and it is therefore not on the same footing with unpaid wages.

Mr. Schreiner: With regard to the £19,000, there are many claims for wages, and I would ask that if the Government undertakes the administration of this estate, it should be allowed reasonable expenses.

Mr. Searle: I do not object to that, but would suggest that judgment should be given for £148,050, and also for the £70,000 retention money. Annexure D shows a balance of £223,310. That balance they have now reduced to £148. The matter of the retention money was to be a question of set-off (see sections 47 and 49 of the Contract of July 4, 1900). The real question is as to the £10,000 forfeit. As to the costs, they have been enormously and unnecessarily increased by a count on which counsel for the Crown was not even heard. I submit that the plaintiff should get half his costs. The whole of the first count of the declaration, as to the particulars of the breach of contract, was given up.

Mr. Schreiner: I join issue with applicant's counsel. The bulk of the costs was not incurred in respect of the first count. We had to go into the claim in reconvention at great length. It is a good principle that if a plaintiff succeeds in recovering a large sum, the defendant should bear the brunt of the costs.

De Villiers, C.J.: According to the referees' report, there is due by the defendant the sum of £76,225 9s. 4d. This sum is arrived at by finding that the actual cost of the works was £148,050 13s. 3d. From that amount are deducted two items: Retention money, £70,689 14s. 5d.; and an amount of passenger traffic receipts, not due to the Government or belonging to the contractor, but in the hands of the contractor, £1,135 9s. 6d., leaving a balance of £76,225 9s. 4d. But then there are certain items which the referees have placed in the suspense accounts. With regard to (d), in the opinion of the Court there should be no judgment for the plaintiff in respect of that amount. The matter was referred to the referees, and a majority of the referees, after very careful inquiry, have given a definite decision on that point. The referees' statement is as follows: "The subdivision of the suspense account consists of items for which full details are not forthcoming and in regard to which we are unfortunately unable to report with complete unanimity. Acting on the principles by which we have been guided through our investigation, two of us maintain that to be consistent, we cannot allow these items to form part of the actual cost. The parties to whom the payments were made are solicitors or agents, acting solely in the interests of the contractor in the negotiations with the Government, in connection with the several alterations in the contracts. We hold that there is no presumption that these charges were 'for the benefit of the Government,' but that there is every presumption that they were for the benefit of the contractor. On these grounds, we are of opinion that they should not be allowed. On the other hand, Mr. Roy is of opinion that legal and other charges incurred by the contractor in drawing up with the Government the different contracts for the building of these lines, form an essential part of the actual cost." The view taken is a correct one, and therefore nothing should be allowed in respect of (d). In regard to the items (a), (b), and (c), it is admitted they are owing, but the contractor cannot recover anything in respect of them unless he can prove they form part of the actual cost, and have actually been paid by him. The suggestion of the referees seems to me a reasonable one, that the money should not be at once paid by the Government to the plaintiff, but that it should be held over by the Government for the purpose of being paid to the persons to whom the amounts are due. It appears to the Court, in giving judgment for £76,225 9s. 4d., that it should be an understanding that the defendant in his capacity as Commissioner of Railways undertakes the liability in respect of items (a), (b), and (c), to pay the same or such portion thereof he should find to be due, not exceeding in any case £19,404 1s. 9d., £99, and £4,426 18s. 3d., respectively. On the question of costs there is no doubt that plaintiff has succeeded on the main question. In consequence of that decision, a very large balance is found to be in favour of the plaintiff. No doubt the plaintiff had raised certain questions upon which he has failed, but on the main question he has succeeded. I do not consider that the other count adds very materially to the costs, and upon the whole it is only fair that the Government, having failed upon the main question before the Court, and the plaintiff, having succeeded in obtaining a large balance in his favour, the ordinary rule should be applied that the unsuccessful party should pay the costs, including the referees' fees. There will therefore be judgment for £76,225 9s. 4d., with costs, to include the referees' fees.

AFRICAN BANKING CORPORATION V. CAPE JUNCTION RAILWAYS. { 1903. Aug. 3rd.

Interdict.

The Court granted an interdict restraining the Colonial Government from paying over to the respondents any portion of a sum of money which the Court had found to be due to the manager of the Grand Junction Railways, pending an action to be brought by the applicants to recover certain moneys alleged by them to be owing to them by the respondent.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for the applicants, moved for an order restraining the Colonial Government from paying over the money to the respondents awarded to them in their action against the Colonial Government, pending the institution of an action. Counsel put in the affidavits of the joint managers of the African Banking Corporation, which set out that £59,384 had been advanced to the partnership, for which debentures issued by the Grand Junction Railways had been pledged as security. It was contended that, by virtue of the said debentures, the claim should rank as preferent.

Mr. Searle, K.C., for the respondents, put in the affidavit of the respondents' attorney, which set out that he was unable to communicate with the said Hills, and that the applicants had had ample time to institute proceedings. It would be most unfair to the other creditors to withhold the money. Counsel suggested that a receiver should be appointed to deal with these claims.

Mr. Searle, K.C.: We admit that the applicants have a claim, but say that they have no preferent claim, and we object to the case being hung up until preference is established. The money has been placed in the hands of the Registrar.

Sir H. Juta: There is nothing to prevent an application to-morrow to order the Registrar to pay out this money.

[De Villiers, C.J.: When can you bring your action?]

In the November term.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Can you not bring it on in August?]

Yes, if the defendants will waive their rights as to notice of set down.

Mr. Searle (in reply): A large quantity of goods are in the hands of the Sheriff, and expenses are running up. We want to release these goods, and there should be a distribution among the creditors, unless the plaintiffs are prepared to go to trial this term.

De Villiers, C.J.: For the present, it is only necessary to make an order restraining the Government from paying any portion of the judgment in the last case until August 31 next. In the meanwhile, the applicants will proceed with their action, and they will do so in as speedy a manner as possible. Then the Court can decide upon the question of interest. By giving this order, we do not wish to prejudice the rights of the Government in regard to interest. Costs to be costs in the cause.

Ex parte COOTE.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for a rule nisi to be made absolute granted under the Derelict Lands Act.

Granted.

Ex parte ROBERTS.

Mr. Benjamin moved that a rule nisi be made final granted under the Derelict Lands Act.

Granted.

WALTERS V. WALTERS.

Mr. Gardiner moved for a decree of divorce and the custody of the minor children under the marriage, and for an order calling upon the defendant to show cause why he should not pay £4 a month for the maintenance of children. Personal service had been effected of the order of Court, granted May 19, directing the defendant to return to his wife. The defendant had failed to comply with this order.

Decree granted.

RAPLEY V. RAPLEY.

Mr. Upington moved for a decree of divorce. The respondent had failed to comply with an order to make restitution of conjugal rights.

Granted.

LYONS V. THORNTON.

Mr. Close moved for the making absolute of the rule nisi granted on July 3, 1903.

The rule was granted for the purpose of restraining the respondent from parting with certain furniture. Judgment had been entered, but the respondent was in default.

Granted.

REHABILITATIONS.

Ex parte DU TOIT. { 1903. Aug. 3rd.

Mr. M. Bisset moved, under section 117 of the Insolvency Orders, for the rehabilitation of Gideon Johannes du Toit. The estate was surrendered on the 19th February, 1900, and the necessary number of creditors had consented to the discharge.

Granted.

Ex parte OLIVIER.

Mr. Benjamin moved for the rehabilitation of Gert Cornelius Olivier. The estate was voluntarily surrendered in November, 1884. The trustee's report was favourable.

Granted.

Ex parte LOUBSER.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for the rehabilitation of Gerrit Jacobus Loubser. All the creditors had signified their consent to the discharge.

Granted.

Ex parte RATTRAY.

Mr. Benjamin moved for the rehabilitation of Wm. Patrick Rattray. The estate was surrendered in March, 1895, when the proven debts amounted to £590, and the assets, £51. There was a passage in the trustee's report that he was unable to trace any dealings of the insolvent, who kept no books.

Leave was granted to apply again in three months.

Ex parte RAUTENBACH.

Mr. Benjamin moved, under section 107, for the rehabilitation of G. F. Rautenbach. All the creditors had been paid in full, but the vouchers had not yet been returned.

Granted, subject to the production of the trustee's report.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

MUNRO V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT. { 1893. Aug. 4th.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., moved for a date to be fixed for the trial of this action, which was for damages for injuries sustained by a railway accident.

Mr. Schreiner (for the Colonial Government): It is only a question of amount; there is a tender, my lord.

The case was set down for trial on Wednesday, September 2, costs to be costs in the cause.

Ex parte LOUWRENS.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for the rule nisi relieving petitioner from a trusteeship and granted on July 7 to be made absolute.

Rule made absolute accordingly.

Ex parte BARNES AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Buchanan moved on behalf of petitioners for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds at King William's Town to register transfer of certain property, in which certain minor children were interested, valued at £300, in the estate of the late David George Barnes, of which petitioners were executor and executrix respectively.

The Master recommended that transfer be granted.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte MCMILLAN.

Mr. Buchanan moved on behalf of the petitioner for leave to pass transfer of property in Griqualand East, held at present in trust for his minor son, Richard H. McMillan. The petitioner had settled upon his son a property originally valued at £300. He had had the option of purand he had decided to take up this option. He wished to sell the property, which he formerly gave to his son. The said property was now of the value of £600 and he also wished to apply this £600 towards the purchase of the farm Balmoral for £2,040 6s. 8d., and make up the remainder of the purchase price by donating that sum to his son, and having the farm registered in the name of his son.

The Master recommended that the prayer of the petition be granted, on the understanding that the interests of petitioner's creditors be safeguarded.

Order granted in term of Master's report, empowering the petitioner to pass transfer, subject to the Master being satisfied that the petitioner's creditors, if any, would not be prejudiced by the proposed transfer.

BOBBINS V. LE ROUX.

Mr. Upington moved for an order to compel the defendant to remove certain building and other material deposited by him upon a certain lane at Rondebosch, alleged to be the property of the applicant, to call upon him to show cause why he should not be restrained from using such lane and trespassing thereon in the future, and also why he should not pay the costs of the proceedings. The matter, said counsel, had already been before the Court, and was standing over pending the production of certain documents.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers appeared for the respondent.

The Chief Justice said the case should come before the Judge who had the matter before his originally.

REWN V. REWN.

Mr. Buchanan moved for a rule calling upon respondent to show cause why applicant should not be granted leave to sue in forma pauperis.

A rule was granted, returnable on the 27th August.

MOTHULI V. MOTHULI.

Mr. Pyemont moved for leave to applicant to sue his wife, who was resident in the Orange River Colony, by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, for divorce.

The application was granted, personal service to be effected, the citation being made returnable on the 27th August.

Leave was also granted to serve intendit and notice of trial with the citation.

STYERS V. STYERS.

Mr. Alexander applied for leave to applicant, Martha Styers, to sue in forma pauperis for divorce. Counsel said applicant was not in court. She lived at De Aar, and could not come to court owing to the cost.

De Villiers, C.J., said the Court had said that in these cases the application should be personally made. Applicant could apply at the next Circuit Court.

FEITELBERG AND GOTTCHALK V. DU TOIT.

Mr. Close moved for leave to sue by edictal citation. Respondent was last heard of in Pietersburg, Transvaal.

The application was granted, personal service to be effected, with leave to serve intendit and notice of trial with citation. The citation was made returnable on the 27th August.

Ex parte KETS.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved for leave to sue by edictal citation for balance of certain money due on property purchased by respondent, Arnold Marrival, whose present whereabouts were unknown.

A rule was granted, returnable on the 12th September, personal service to be effected, otherwise service by publication in the "Gazette" and in a Cape Town English newspaper. Leave was granted to serve intentit and notice of trial with the citation.

BYDIEN V. ESTATE SAMAO. { 1903. Aug. 4th.

Fraud—Relief—Prescription.

A person who has been defrauded is not deprived of his right to relief by reason of thirty years having expired since the fraud was committed, provided that this action is brought within a reasonable time after discovery of the fraud.

This was an application to have made absolute a rule nisi granted in chambers for an interdict restraining the respondent from transferring certain premises situated in Castle-street, and restraining them from parting or dealing with the proceeds of the sale of same, pending an action to be instituted by the applicant. The affidavit of the applicant stated that he intended proceeding with an action to set aside a transfer and sale on the ground on fraud and forgery, alleged to have been committed in connection with a sale and transfer to the late Samao thirty-four years ago, the applicant being a minor at the time. Certain other affidavits set forth in detail the circumstances connected with the sale and transfer in respect of which fraud was alleged. The affidavit of respondents stated that the sale was a public one. In a replying affidavit, applicant alleged that the sale was privately made. It was further stated on affidavit that respondents were about to leave for Mecca.

De Villiers, C.J.: In this case it would not be right for me to say anything at the present stage that would prejudice either party to this suit. The charges made against the late Samao are very serious. They are charges of fraud, forgery, and duress, and some prima facie evidence is given on affidavit in support of these charges. If the charges are true, the plaintiff would not be deprived of his right to relief by reason of thirty years having elapsed since the fraud was committed, provided, of course, his action is brought within a reasonable time after discovery of the fraud. (See Voet, 4, 1, 20.) This is not a case in which the rights of bona fide purchasers would be affected, for the action is brought against the executors of the very man who is alleged to have committed a fraud on the plaintiff. More than that I do not think I ought to say at the present stage. I think that no prejudice can be done if the defendants are interdicted from parting with the proceeds of this sale. The second sale appears to have been fair, full notice has been given of it, and the price is admitted to be a fair one. It is right, therefore, that transfer should go through, and should not be interdicted; but as to the proceeds of that sale, I think the respondent should be interdicted from parting with them. The costs of this application will be costs in the cause.

The judgment of the Court will be in the following terms: Order granted restraining the purchaser of the property in question from paying the proceeds thereof to the respondents, and ordering payment thereof to Mr. G. W. Steytler, in his capacity as secretary of the Colonial Orphan Chamber, who will retain the same, pending further order of Court. Costs of this application to stand over.

WALKER V. WALKER.

Mr. Benjamin moved for leave on behalf of petitioner (the husband) to sue by edictal citation for divorce, on the ground of his wife's adultery. Counsel said that the respondent had given birth to two illegitimate children, and was now supposed to be in England.

Leave granted, personal service to be effected if possible, failing which one publication in the "Daily Telegraph," London, the return day to be November 1.

HYMAN V. HYMAN.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for leave on behalf of the husband to sue by edictal citation for divorce, on the ground of his wife's adultery while living in a house of ill-fame in Buenos Ayres. The defendant, it appeared, belonged to Newark, New Jersey, and the parties were married in America. The plaintiff had been residing in Cape Town at least three years, and carrying on his trade as a carpenter.

Leave was granted, personal service to be effected if possible, failing which publication in a newspaper circulating in Newark, New Jersey; November 30 being fixed as the return day.

Ex parte VAN ROOYEN.

Alteration of surname—Rectification of transfer.

The applicant having changed his name after land had been transferred to him, applied for a rectification of the transfer in the Deeds Office.

Held, that he was not entitled to the assistance of the Court.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved for an order authorising the amendment of certain deeds of transfer, altering the name of the applicant from David Reiters to David van Rooyen. The petitioner was resident in the native section of Tembuland. It appeared that his father had been a slave in the Cape district, and his name was changed by his master. The applicant had only recently ascertained from his grandfather what his real name was.

De Villiers, C.J.: It would be a very serious precedent if the Court granted this application. At the time when the transfer was passed the applicant's name was Ruyters. He subsequently changed his name to Van Rooyen, and he now asks that the transfer deed be amended accordingly. There appears to be no necessity for granting the application, for if he wishes to deal with the property he has merely to do so under his former name, adding, if necessary, the fact that he is now called by another name

Ex parte METERLEKAMP.

This was an application for leave to transfer certain property. The petition set forth that petitioner was was the sole trustee and only creditor in the insolvent estate of one Van der Walt. Certain land belonging to the insolvent had been twice submitted for sale by public auction, but the highest bid made was £400. Petitioner desired to purchase the property for £420, and asked the authority of the Court to the transfer to himself of the property. A sworn appraiser stated on affidavit that £420 was a fair price. Mr. Benjamin moved.

[De Villiers, C.J.: In what paper was the sale advertised?]

Mr. Benjamin said he had no information on this point.

De Villiers, C.J.: The Court must have better information. A trustee, in seeking the authority of the Court to buy property in an estate, must bring clear proof that every effort had been made to get the very best price. The advertisements of the sale should be produced, so that the Court might be able to see whether they were in a form likely to attract the attention of purchasers. The matter will stand over for further information.

Ex parte REID.

Mr. Bisset moved for leave to transfer certain property. Petitioner was the executor testamentary in the estate of the late Henry Reid. All the children consented.

The application was granted.

Ex parte MULDER.

This was an application for the appointment of a curator ad litem to represent the estate of the late Stephanus Fourie. The petition stated that the applicant was desirous of bringing an action against certain parties for declaration of rights, and it was necessary, in order to have the record complete, that the estate of Fourie should be joined as a defendant in the action. The executor in the estate had died. Petitioner suggested the appointment of Mr. Timothy Smith, attorney, Oudtshoorn, as curator ad litem for the purposes of the action.

Mr. Burton for applicant.

De Villiers, C.J., said that the matter had better stand over in order to give the Master an opportunity of calling a meeting of the next-of-kin with a view to the appointment of an executor.

The application was ordered to stand over.

ESTATE ANTHONISSEN V. NATIONAL MUTUAL LIFE ASSOCIATION OF AUSTRALASIA, LIMITED.

This was a motion on behalf of the petitioner, Daniel Brown, the executor dative of the late John Edward Anthonissen, for an order compelling the defendants to pay a certain policy of insurance. It appeared, from the affidavits of the petitioner and others, that the late Mr. Anthonissen formerly resided at Port Elizabeth, and that in November last he removed to Alexandria. He was drowned on the 2nd January this year while bathing at Alexandria. The deceased had been insured with the defendant company for £300, all the necessary premiums had been paid, and the policy was in force when he met with his death, but although diligent search had been made, petitioner was unable to trace the said policy, and he verily believed that it had been lost or mislaid. He had applied to the Port Elizabeth office of the company, but payment of the policy was refused unless an indemnity were given to the company against the claim of any one in legal possession of the said policy. Petitioner had no reason to believe that the said document had been ceded or otherwise dealt with.

On the motion of Mr. Gardiner, a rule was granted calling upon all persons concerned to show cause on the 31st August why respondents should not be authorised and ordered to pay the amount of the policy to the applicant, rule to be published once in the "Government Gazette," and twice in Port Elizabeth newspapers, and served on the agent of the respondents at Port Elizabeth.

Postea (August 31st). The rule was absolute.

THERON V. THERON.

Mr. Burton moved for the appointment of a commission to take the evidence of the petitioner and of the Dutch Reformed minister at Calvinia in an action brought by the petitioner against her husband for the restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce. Petitioner resided at Vlokfontein, about 33 miles from Calvinia, she was poor, no appearance had been entered in the suit for the defence, and it would be convenient if a commission were appointed.

Order granted as prayed, the Resident Magistrate of Calvinia being appointed to take the evidence of the petitioner and of the minister of the Dutch Reformed Church on commission.

Ex parte MURRAY.

This was an application for the appointment of a curator bonis to take charge of the estate of Lionel Brough Steary.

The affidavits filed on behalf of petitioner showed that Steary had received sums of money from England, and that there were at present remaining in the hands of Mr. Brady, attorney, certain moneys to which he was entitled. Steary had given way to intemperate habits, was wholly negligent in regard to his presonal habits and appeared unfit to take care of his property. He had been squandering his money. The petitioner was the Mayor of Swellendam, and he was prepared to act as curator bonis pending the appointment of a curator ad litem, for the purpose of having Steary declared unfit to manage his own ffairs. During the last three months Steary had nearly lost his sight.

Mr. Benjamin moved.

De Villiers, C.J.: It looks to me to be merely a case of intemperance and prodigality.

A rule was granted calling upon Lionel Brough Steary to show cause on the 20th August why he should not be declared incapable of managing his own affairs, and why John Watson Murray should not be appointed curator of his property, pending a further order of this Court.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE]

WOLFF V. RUDWICK. { 1903. Aug. 4th.

This was an action to recover the sums of 16s., £93 6s. 9d., and £131 10s., in connection with certain work on property in Canterbury-street and at Sea Point, which the defendant undertook to complete.

The declaration shewed that the defendant undertook to do certain work in Canterbury-street and Sea Point for a contract price of £417 8s. The sum of £418 4s. had been paid, and the work was not completed. The 16s. was in respect of an excess on the Canterbury-street, and the non-completion of the work there amounted to £131 10s. £216 19s. 6d. had been paid in respect of the Sea Point property, which was £93 9s. 6d. in excess of what the plaintiff was liable for

Mr. Benjamin for plaintiff. Defendant in default.

Abraham Woolff, plaintiff, identified the contracts that had been entered into with the defendant, and produced his books showing the amounts on each occasion that had been received and initialled by the defendant.

Judgment as prayed.

GARVIE AND CO. V. WRIGHT AND DONALD. { 1903. Aug. 4th. " 5th.

Offer to sell—Acceptance—Option to buy—Consideration.

A promise to keep open an offer to sell for a certain time is not binding in law if no consideration is given for the promise, but it has the effect of an offer to sell, which can be withdrawn at any time before acceptance, and the acceptance of which before withdrawal within a reasonable time concludes a contract of sale.

The acceptance must be upon the same terms as the offer.

On the 24th April the defendants gave the plaintiffs the option of buying their shop until Monday, the 29th of April, at 12 o'clock. No consideration was given by the plaintiffs. The offer was accepted by the plaintiffs before noon on Monday.

Held, that although the defendants were not bound to keep open the offer till Monday, the contract of sale was concluded upon the acceptance of the offer before its withdrawal upon the conditions upon which the offer had been made.

This was an action brought to enforce the performance of a certain contract of sale entered into between the plaintiffs and defendants, or £250 damages for failure on the part of the defendants.

The declaration set forth that the defendants carried on the business of the Falcon Ironworks, in Sir Lowry-road. On the 24th April last Walter William Wright and James Garvie agreed that the latter should have the option of purchasing the business for the sum of £400, and a certain quantity of steel for a further sum of £25, and plaintiffs claimed that, by virtue of the agreement, they could exercise their option up to noon on the 27th April, 1903. The plaintiffs adhering to their right, gave notice of their intention, and tendered payment of £400. Plaintiff claimed (a) that on their tendering £425, the engineers' shop should be delivered up to them; (b) £250 damages; (c) alternative relief; (d) costs of suit.

The plea admitted the option, but stated that no consideration was given for it, and the defendants denied dealing with the firm. Garvie offered £100 down, and £300 per post-dated cheque.

The replication set out that the agreement between Garvie and Wright was on behalf of the respective firms. The post dated cheque was offered in order that the defendants might have a chance of producing the inventory.

Mr. M. de Villiers for the plaintiff; Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Russell) for the defendants.

Charles Houston Griffiths, accountant in the Standard Bank, at Woodstock, said that if the firm of Garvie and Co. had drawn a cheque on the 27th April last for £425, it would have been met.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He could not produce the pass-book, and books of account. The cheque would have been met, although the plaintiffs had not sufficient funds in the bank at the time. They had only opened an account with the bank a short time previously.

James Garvie, plaintiff, said that he was partner with Mr. Haggar in an engineering firm in Sir Lowry-road. In consequence of information received from Mr. Bultitude he proceeded to see Mr. Wright on Friday, 24th April. Wright said that he was preparaed to take £400 for the business, and £25 for a quantity of steel. Wright gave witness a written option at that price until Monday at noon. Wright agreed to give thirty days' credit on the quantity of steel. On the following Saturday witness and Mr. Haggar went to see Mr. Wright about the completion of the contract on Monday. Mr. Wright seemed pleased that the matter was being settled up. At that time Mr. Wright was out on bail on a criminal charge brought against him by the Tramway Company. Satisfactory arrangements were made at the bank to meet the cheque on Monday morning. When the plaintiffs saw Wright on Monday he said that his partner wanted £425 down. The inventory was not forthcoming, and witness offered £100 down to bind the bargain, and £300 on production of the inventory. Wright refused the offer, and witness further offered £100 down and a post-dated cheque for £325, but Wright said he would rather see Donald. Donald said that his brother had the inventory upcountry, and then asked for £450, which witness refused. Donald asked time to see his father, and then witness left the shop, and consulted his solicitors. He would rather have taken the business at £450 than have his damages of £250 awarded.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He had negotiations about the premises in March, when the price asked for was £625. It was untrue that witness drew out of an agreement at that time. It was understood at the time that it was to be a cash transaction. He would not be sure that the first mention of credit for the steel was made on the Saturday. Mr. Wright did not say that if the cheque was cashed at the bank he would be quite satisfied. The cheque would have been cashed at the bank, although there was not sufficient cash there to his credit.

Re-examined by Mr. De Villiers: Eventually he would have accepted the place without an inventory.

Thomas Henry Brown Gibson, manager of the Standard Bank, at Woodstock, said that he remembered the plaintiffs calling at the bank on the morning of the 27th April between ten and eleven o'clock. The defendant's place was about ten minutes distance. Had a cheque been presented for £425 it would have been met.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He had sufficient guarantee for the overdraft. Garvie and Haggar opened an account that morning.

James William Haggar, partner in the plaintiff firm, said that he found from the books of the defendant that he was barely turning over £75 a month, and Wright attributed it to the falling off from the Tramway Company. Witness was present when Mr. Garvie told Mr. Wright that the contract would be fulfilled on Monday for £425. Wright said that he was glad it was settled, and it was arranged that Donald should be present on Monday morning. Wright promised to have the inventory on Monday morning, and when witness and Garvie kept the appointment Wright said that Donald wanted it to be a cash transaction and no credit was to be given for the steel. A cheque was offered to Donald for £425, but it was refused on the ground that it was too cheap, and Donald, after speaking of giving the business to a brother in Australia, asked for £450, which was refused. Donald then said he would like to see his father about it, and subsequently the matter was put into the lawyer's hands. If any cheque had been presented at the bank it would have been cashed.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He went into partnership with Mr. Garvie on the Monday morning they visited Wright. On the previous Saturday Mr. Garvie raised the question of having credit on the purchase of the steel. There was no mention of paying by instalments on the Saturday, and Mrs. Wright was not present at the time the affairs were being discussed. Mr. Garvie said on the Monday that he would give £100 down, and the remainder on production of the inventory, and subsequently he offered a cheque for £425, which Wright could not accept without consulting Mr. Donald. To his knowledge there was no mention of a post-dated cheque. Witness could not have made any agreement on the Friday if he only went into partnership on the following Monday. Their turnover was £700 in three months, on which they should have made about 20 instead of 5 per cent.

Re-examined by Mr. M. de Villiers: He went to Mr. Wright's on the Saturday because he had decided to go into partnership. Wright was well aware that they were partners. The money would have been at the bank on the production of the inventory.

For the defence, Mr. Searle called Walter William Wright, who stated that he had carried on business with Donald for about eighteen months. Witness conducted the negotiations with Garvie. Witness considered the previous transaction of £625 as settled, and the plaintiff failed to keep the contract. Garvie knew exactly what was in the shop. Witness gave Garvie the option before Bultitude, and made it clear that it was for cash. On the following Saturday Garvie offered £100 down in cash, and post-dated cheque for the following Tuesday. There was no mention of an inventory. Nothing was mentioned about the inventory at the time he signed the option. At a quarter to twelve on Monday, Haggar and Garvie came to witness's shop. Garvie offered £100 on account, a post-dated cheque for £300, and terms for the steel. Witness consulted Donald, and it was then past noon. Witness said he would accept a cheque for £425 if they would assure him that it would be met. Donald refused to accept anything but cash. The following Tuesday a boy from the plaintiff's attorney brought a cheque for £425, which was refused.

Crossexamined by Mr. M. de Villiers: When Garvie came on Monday morning he said that he had come to exercise his option. Witness was prepared to go to the bank with Garvie. Next day the cheque for £425 was tendered through the plaintiff's attorneys unconditionally. He was anxious to get money to defend the criminal proceedings against him. Mr. Donald said that he would accept £450.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: There was more business when Garvie entered into the agreement on the first occasion.

David Donald, partner in the defendant firm, said that he first saw the plaintiffs in connection with the sale on Monday, 27th April. He saw Garvie and Haggar about twenty minutes past twelve. Witness refused to give any terms, and held that it must be cash. Garvie then made the offer of a post-dated cheque for the full amount. They never produced any cheque. As far as he knew, nothing was said about an inventory at all.

Thos. Hawkins said that last April he was a collector for Mr. Wright. On April 27 he remembered Mr. Garvie offering two post-dated cheques, and Mr. Wright refused, saying that it must be a ready-money transaction.

Martha Louisa Wright, wife of the defendant, said that she remembered Mr. Garvie asking her husband if he would accept £100 on Monday, the balance on Tuesday, and terms for the steel. Mr. Wright said that he would have to consult Mr. Donald.

Counsel were then heard in argument on the facts.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (August 5):

Maasdorp, J.. The plaintiffs sue the defendants for the delivery of the possession of an engineer's shop, including the goodwill, tools, machinery belonging to the same, and a quantity of steel, tendering to pay them the sum of £425, being the purchase price thereof, or in case the defendants fail to make delivery, to claim £250 as damages suffered by them through breach of contract. It appears that on the 24th of April, 1903, the defendants agreed to give to Garvie "the option of buying their shop until Monday, 27th, at 12 o'clock, at a price of £400, and steel to be taken over by him at £25." The plaintiffs allege that on the 25th of April Haggar entered into partnership with Garvie, and they together, under the firm of Garvie and Co., exercised the option, and bought the property. The defendants in their plea allege that they contracted with Garvie, and deny that they in any manner dealt with the plaintiffs as Garvie and Co. It may be well to dispose of that point first. It appears from the evidence that after Garvie had secured the option, he and Haggar entered into partnership on the 25th of April, and went together on that day and on the 27th to transact the further business with the defendants, and they say they were recognised as being jointly interested in the concern. I think this point is established in the plaintiffs' favour by their evidence, and by the letter of the defendants of the 28th of April to the plaintiffs' attorneys, in which they write: "In reply to yours, re Messrs. Garvie and Co., for the option of engineer's shop at £425 cash,—The said Messrs. Garvie and Co. did not offer us cash, but a post-dated cheque for £400, and wanted terms for the £25 for steel, which we decline to accept." The next point raised by the defendants is that no consideration was given for the option. Upon that point, I may say I am of opinion that, in the absence of consideration, the defendants were not bound to keep the option open until noon on Monday, but that it still amounted to an offer to sell, the acceptance of which within a reasonable time and before it was withdrawn by the defendants would conclude a contract of sale. Upon the question of reasonable time, I think we may take it that, within the contemplation of the defendants themselves, as expressed in the agreement, any time up to noon on Monday would have been reasonable. Then the question remains, whether the plaintiffs closed with the offer before it was withdrawn. The plaintiffs say they went to see Wright on Saturday, and Garvie told him they had decided to buy, but asked for three months' credit for the £25 for the steel, and that Wright consented to that. Wright told them that he had seen the landlord of the shop, and the lease was all right. They requested Wright to have the inventory of the articles in the shop and the contract ready by Monday. It was proved that on Monday they made arrangements at the Standard Bank for a credit in their favour, to enable them to draw on the bank for £425, and immediately after they went to see Wright. They told him they accepted his offer to sell, and upon his informing them that the inventory was in the possession of Donald, Garvie offered to pay £100 in cash, and the remaining £325 upon receipt of the inventory. Wright objected to this, and said Donald wanted the whole sum of £425 paid in cash. Thereupon Garvie offered to give a cheque for the whole amount, but Wright said they should go and see Donald. This they did, and after some talk Donald refused to sell, and said he would take £450 for he property. Garvie then offered him a cheque for £425, and upon his refusing to take it, the plaintiffs went immediately to consult their attorneys. The plaintiffs say the interviews with the defendants took place before noon on Monday. The defendants, on the other hand, say that at these interviews the plaintiffs, instead of closing with their offer, which was to sell the property for £425 cash, offered them £100 cash, and the balance to be paid by a post-dated cheque. If that were so it would not have amounted to an acceptance of the option, and the defendants would have been justified in crying off the transaction. Wright says that at the interview with Donald he was still prepared to take £425 cash, and offered to take a cheque if it would be cashed at the bank, and that Donald also said he would take cash. Nothing was then said about its being past twelve o'clock, and too late to exercise the option. The defendants say the plaintiffs left without offering either a cheque or cash. Now it is quite certain that the plaintiffs were anxious to buy the property, for they went on the same afternoon to their attorneys, who wrote insisting that the contract should be carried out, and it was also quite certain that after having made the arrangements with the bank they were in a position to pay cash. There was, therefore, no conceivable reason why they should have taken up the attitude ascribed to them by the defendants. I think the true state of the case is correctly set forth in the letter written to the defendants by the attorneys of the plaintiffs on the 27th of April, shortly after the above-mentioned interview, where they write: "The option expired at noon to-day, and our clients instructed us to state that at 11.30 to-day they called at your premises, gave notice of their intention of exercising the said option ,and tendered you their cheque for £425 in payment, which you for some reason or other unknown to our clients declined to accept." If this cheque was tendered it must, under the circumstances, be taken as a good tender of the money, as no objection was taken to the form of the tender, and Wright said he would have taken a cheque if it would be cashed at the bank. Upon this evidence I come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs not only accepted the offer to sell before noon on Monday, but tendered the price, and in so doing went further than it was necessary for them to go to conclude the sale. The plaintiffs, being prepared to pay the purchase price, are now entitled to delivery of the property, or to damages. It would be difficult in this case to decree specific performance, especially when we remember that there may be difficulty about the lease. The landlord was represented by Wright in April to have consented to the lease passing to the plaintiffs, but no order of the Court would affect him now. Under the circumstances the plaintiffs are entitled to damages for breach of contract. The evidence as to damages is of a very speculative character, but there is some proof that the plaintiffs had a fair prospect of making from £30 to £40 a month out of the business, and defendants admit that they sometimes made as much as £50 a month, but they say that their profits varied. The plaintiffs have hitherto failed to secure other suitable premises, but then they have made no great effort to get them. I think we should allow the plaintiffs damages for a period of two months, in which they might reasonably have been expected to make other suitable arrangements for carrying on their engineering business, and that the sum of £70 would be a fair award as damages.

Judgment is given for the plaintiff for £70. with costs of suit.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZÉ.]

KROOMER v. LOBASCHER. { 1902. Aug. 5th.

Malicious prosecution—False imprisonment — Malice — Reasonable and probable cause—Setting the law in motion.

The plaintiff went in the absence of defendant into a room occupied by him and a woman who lived with him as housekeeper. He induced the woman to leave the place, and according to his own admission assisted her to carry articles out of the room without enquiring whether they belonged to the defendant. Amongst other things he carried off an accordion belonging to the defendant. The woman informed the defendant that plaintiff took the accordion after he was told it belonged to the defendant.

Held, in an action for malicious prosecution and false imprisonment that the defendant, in charging the plaintiff with theft of the accordion, had set the law in motion, and was responsible for the prosecution. That under the circumstances he had not acted with malice or without reasonable and probable cause. That he was not liable for false imprisonment, because the police, upon receiving the charge of theft, arrested and imprisoned the plaintiff instead of taking out a summons for his appearance.

This was an action brought to recover £500 damages for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution.

The declaration set out that the plaintiff was a wholesale baker, carrying on business at Plumstead, and the defendant a furniture dealer in Wynberg. On the 3rd April the defendant had the plaintiff arrested and falsely imprisoned on a charge of theft of the defendant's accordion. The plaintiff was imprisoned until the next day, when the charge was withdrawn before the Resident Magistrate. By reason of the acts of the defendant, plaintiff had suffered damages in his character, and he claimed £500 damages alternative relief, and costs of suit.

The plea admitted the formal allegations, but set out that on the 28th March, 1903, the plaintiff wrongfully and unlawfully took and removed from Simon's Town an accordion, the property of the defendant, and two rings, the property of a nurse. The plaintiff caused the defendant to be arrested on a charge of assault, and the latter denied that he caused the plaintiff to be imprisoned. The plaintiff was not imprisoned for a day, as he was liberated on bail shortly after he was arrested.

The replication was general.

Mr. McGregor for plaintiff. Mr. Benjamin for defendant.

Hessel Kroomer, plaintiff, said that he was a wholesale baker, carrying on business at Plumstead. Helena Kinser had been living with him until early in March. Witness read a letter from a Mr. Robert Smith, law agent, Wynberg, dated the 20th March, warning him against trespassing on Lobascher's property, and stating that if he caused any further annoyance, legal proceedings would be instituted. Helena Kinser went to Simon's Town, and on the 23rd March witness went and asked her to come back. She agreed to do so, and they returned in the train. Kinser brought some parcels. In the train, witness gave the accordion to the stationmaster at Plumstead. At Wynberg Kinser went into Mr. Lobascher's place, and did not come out. Lobascher had a room at Simon's Town, and went out there every night. When they returned to Wynberg, Kinser told witness to wait until she returned from Lobascher, but she remained there. Witness afterwards called the same evening for the accordion, and obtained it. On the 1st April witness received a letter from Mr. Bailey, attorney for the defendant, demanding payment of £6 for the accordion. Witness gave this to Mr. Duncan, his law agent. Before he saw Mr. Duncan, he saw Helena Kinser. She handed over to him two rings, which he took with him. In reply to the letter of the 1st April, Mr. Duncan replied repudiating any liability. On the 3rd April Lobascher assaulted him in the public street, and called him a thief, accusing him of stealing an accordion and some rings. Witness called for the police, and the constable told them to come to the station, the constable walking alongside. No policeman accompanied Lobascher. At the police station Lobascher said nothing about stealing rings but charged him with the theft of his accordion. Witness said he knew nothing about Lobascher's accordion. Lobascher mentioned Kinser, and the latter was sent for by the police. There was a conversation between Lobascher, Kinser, and the police, which witness did not hear. Lobascher again charged him with the theft of the accordion, and the police informed witness that he was in custody on a charge of stealing Lobascher's accordion. Witness said he knew nothing about it. He was locked up until next morning. Witness had to pay his legal adviser to defend him. He lost £22 to £25 through not being able to bake that night, and he also lost customers. Altogether he had lost quite £100.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: It was not a fact that he hired a room from Miss Kinser's mother. Witness hired the house from a Chinaman. Witness told his attorney that he got the accordion from the girl. He could not say whether the defendant or the police sent for the girl. Witness did not snatch the rings off the girl's finger. When Lobascher came up to assault him witness blew a whistle, and brought the police. Both of them went to the police station, where the defendant charged witness with theft. The accordion was returned to Lobascher. Witness helped the girl to take the parcels from the defendant's rooms at Simon's Town. He could not sell stale bread, and all his baking for Saturday was disposed of at two shillings a bag.

Re-examined by Mr. McGregor: He lost custom through his failure to supply bread on that Saturday morning. The accordion was deposited with the station-master in order to bring the girl back.

[Kotzé, J.: According to your evidence you were not the attraction, but the accordion.]

David Pew, formerly acting station-master at Plumstead, said he saw the plaintiff one day coming from Simon's Town. The plaintiff was accompanied by a lady. Witness received from him an accordion. It was arranged that he should keep the instrument till plaintiff called. He did not know who took it away, but it was gone the following day. The lady appeared to be satisfied with what took place.

John Blake, cab proprietor and driver, at Wynberg, spoke to a certain day in April when the defendant came to the plaintiff in the street at Wynberg. He saw defendant go to the plaintiff's cart, and heard him say, "You thief, you stole my two rings," and the defendant wanted to pull him off the cart. One of the parties called a policeman, and they went to the police station. He heard the defendant accuse the plaintiff of having his accordion. Witness was sent to Kroomer's house for the instrument. The police searched Kroomer, and locked him up. Witness offered bail, but it was refused.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He did not hear anything that took place between the parties. He did not hear Kroomer charge Lobascher with assaulting him.

J. Chiet, partner of the plaintiff, said he remembered hearing in April last that his partner was locked up. He went and asked the police what the bail was, but they declined to accept bail. He handed over the accordion.

Robert Duncan, law agent, Wynberg, said he was consulted by plaintiff as to a letter he had received from Mr. Brady on behalf of defendant. He afterwards went to the court in April, and saw his client, who was placed in the dock on a charge of theft of an accordion. Witness then said he appeared for the prisoner. Mr. Smith, a law agent, practising at Wynberg, said he wished to withdraw the charge on condition that the prisoner do not trespass on his premises. Mr. Williams, the Magistrate, asked Mr. Smith who he appeared for. Mr. Smith replied that he appeared to assist in the prosecution. The Magistrate said he could not recognise such assistance, and he turned to the Inspector of Police, and asked him whether he intended to go on with the case. The inspector said that he did not, as the complainant withdrew, and the prisoner was discharged.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: Witness received the rings, one of which was returned.

For the defence, Mr. Benjamin called the defendant,

Leopold Lobascher, who stated that he was an auctioneer, carrying on business in Wynberg. Helena Kinser was attending to him in March, when he was laid up at Simon's Town with malarial fever. In March the girl came from Simon's Town to Wynberg, and reported to witness that the plaintiff was insisting on her leaving the defendant. She said that the plaintiff took the accordion away from the defendant's room. When witness accosted the plaintiff about the accordion, he merely put his foot on the step of the car, and then the defendant blew a whistle and attracted a crowd. They went up to the police-station, and the plaintiff charged witness with assault.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: He was surprised when he heard that Miss Kinser had lived with the plaintiff. Kroomer used to ring the bell for hours while witness was laid up with malarial fever. After that witness got his law agent to write the letter about trespassing. He had never seen the plaintiff's carts until this incident. Witness was not annoyed at the plaintiff trying to see Miss Kinser. Witness was told by Miss Kinser that the plaintiff took the accordion from the defendant's room at Simon's Town. On being told by Miss Kinser that there would be trouble, the plaintiff said that it was all right, and he could pay any expense. Witness was excited when he accosted the plaintiff, but he did not call him a thief. Miss Kinser told witness that the plaintiff had forced the rings from her finger. The policeman said that if witness would not go up to the police-station, he would take him there. He never mentioned a word about the accordion and the rings until they got to the police-station. Sergeant Parks asked him if he was the owner of the accordion, and then asked him to sign a paper. He did not remember whether he charged Kroomer or not, but he told the sergeant that the plaintiff had stolen or taken the accordion from his room. He said nothing about the rings until he got up to the police-station, where he told Sergeant Parks about the accordion also.

Helena Kinser said that she knew the plaintiff, who had a room in her mother's house. The plaintiff never paid the rent of the house. From February she acted as housekeeper to the defendant. She remembered the plaintiff at Simon's Town asking her to come back to Wynberg. From February to March the plaintiff had boarded with witness's mother. At Simon's Town the plaintiff took the accordion from the defendant's room. The plaintiff forced the two rings from her finger, and said he would not return them, except she returned to him. Witness told the sergeant at the police-station what the plaintiff did.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: The plaintiff was boarding at her mother's house during February and March. At Simon's Town witness followed the plaintiff to the station in order to get the accordion. The plaintiff paid for her ticket. When the plaintiff took the rings, witness asked the defendant to get the rings back for her. She asked the defendant to complain to the police that the plaintiff had taken the rings.

Mr. McGregor (for the plaintiff): This is an action for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution. In the case of malicious prosecution it is necessary to prove malice and absence of reasonable and probable cause. Not so in the case of false imprisonment: that is really a species of assault.

[Maasdorp, J.: You contend that the prosecution was carried on by the defendant, and that it is for him to prove the absence of malice, and that he had reasonable and probable cause for prosecuting?]

If he had not reasonable and probable cause, the Court will presume malice; but here we have direct evidence of malice. We have only to consider in what relation the woman stood to the two men. After she had left the plaintiff and gone to live with the defendant the plaintiff still wanted her to talk to him, and wanted her to return. The defendant's evidence is not such as the Court will regard with favour. It is very improbable that the defendant knew nothing about the plaintiff and the previous relations of the woman with him, or that he did not know that the defendant had a bakery at Plumstead. Defendant's attorneys' letter to plaintiff is a very ordinary letter, and simply asks him to return certain articles, threatening legal proceedings should he fail to do so. Defendant subsequently assaults plaintiff in the public street, and it is very important to note that the very day before this assault Eleanor had spoken to defendant about plaintiff having taken her ring, and had suggested that plaintiff should communicate with the police. Defendant's story is that plaintiff attempted to drag him off his horse, and then defendant shouted for the police, and complained of the assault. The plaintiff gave his evidence very fairly, and his is the more probable story. Defendant, however, corroborates plaintiff in all important particulars. His memory, however, seems to be very defective. He does not even remember whether he gave plaintiff in charge or not. But surely if he accused the plaintiff to the police of having stolen his property, that was equivalent to giving him in charge. He waited at the police-station to see plaintiff locked up, and appeared in Court the next morning to give evidence for the prosecution. His actions show that he did not believe that plaintiff intended to steal the accordion, for he was willing to withdraw the charge on certain conditions. As to the presumption regarding reasonable and probable cause, see Rademeyer v. Van der Merwe (12, S.C.R., 450). As to damages, we have evidence that the plaintiff lost heavily by being locked up, and by being thus unable to attend to his business. He also lost customers by being unable to supply them on the Saturday. We do not ask for vindictive damages, but I submit that we are entitled to substantial damages.

[Maasdorp, J.: If the Court holds that the prosecutor was justified in prosecuting, how can he be guilty of false imprisonment?]

He is if he acted unlawfully; and he did so, as he ought to have taken out a summons.

[Kotzé, J.: The whole question is, whether the defendant had reasonable and probable cause for his action.]

I submit not. He should have followed the ordinary course of procedure by taking out a summons.

[Maasdorp, J.: Is it always necessary to take out a summons?]

In a case like this it certainly is. See Rudolmeyer v. Van der Merwe (12, S.C.R., 450), and cases there referred to. If a man summarily arrests another on a charge of theft he does so at his own risk.

[Maasdorp, J.: What risk does he run if he has reasonable and probable cause to believe the accused guilty?]

The risk that his suspicions may prove to have been unfounded, and then he will be liable in an action for false imprisonment. See Encyclopædia of the Laws of England (Vol. 5, p. 312) as to the burden of proof in malicious prosecution and in false imprisonment. In the latter it is for the defendant to prove the absence of malice; in the former it is for the plaintiff to prove malice.

[Maasdorp, J.: Usually false imprisonment has nothing to do with malice.]

I would compare such a charge with one of libel; both are injuriæ, and in both cases if a man pleads privilege he must disprove malice.

[Kotzé, J.: If the defendant acted lawfully your whole case falls away?]

Yes, that is so, but that only brings me back to the question, was he acting legally? My point is that my client was acquitted by the Magistrate, and is therefore an innocent man. What right had defendant to lock up an innocent man? As to the illegality of defendant's action, see Warner v. Riddiford (4 C.B.N.S., 180).

Mr. Benjamin (for defendant) was not called upon.

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiff in this case claims damages from the defendant in this action for malicious prosecution and false imprisonment. The first point in issue between the parties is raised by the denial of the defendant that he instituted the prosecution, or that he is responsible for the criminal proceedings that were taken. Before going into the evidence on that point, I may refer to the law that bears upon the subject. Clerk in his work on torts says that a person who simply makes a candid statement of facts to a Magistrate without formulating any charge is not responsible for the consequences or for any step the Magistrate may deem fit to take. But if an actual charge is made, a prosecution is thereby instituted. In this case I am of opinion upon the evidence that the defendant did not merely give a general statement of facts which were within his knowledge, and leave it to the police to draw their own conclusion as to whether a crime had been committed or not, but he made a definite charge in saying that the plaintiff had stolen his accordian. Upon making that charge he set the law in motion because he must have known that the police would immediately take action, and that action would result in a prosecution, but I go further, and say that it was his intention that the prosecution should proceed, because we find that he was aware steps were taken in the case, and upon the day that the trial was to come on he was there, and instructed his agent to withdraw the prosecution on certain conditions. If he was under the impression that it was within his power to withdraw the prosecution it must have been on the ground that he was well aware that he had instituted that prosecution. Upon that evidence I come to the conclusion that the defendant set the law in motion, and he is responsible for the prosecution. Upon that the plaintiff grounds an action for malicious prosecution and false imprisonment. It is necessary for the plaintiff to prove in respect of his claim upon the ground of malicious prosecution that the defendant acted maliciously, and that he acted without reasonable and probable cause. Having all the facts now before us, and without too critically going into the question as to whether the burden of proof lay upon the plaintiff or the defendant, we are now able to decide whether the defendant acted with or without reasonable and probable cause. If we take the facts as narrated to us by the plaintiff himself, it is certainly a question whether, upon that only, we should not be justified in coming to the conclusion that the defendant did not act without reasonable and probable cause, but that he had reasonable and probable cause for his action. The plaintiff told us he went to a room occupied by the defendant at Simon's Town, where he found a person he was living with with the defendant, and who, we may take it, was in the service of the defendant. He proceeds to assist her to carry away a number of articles out of that room, and he has told us that he carried away the articles without knowing whether they belonged to the defendant or not, and, as it so happened, among the articles was an accordion belonging to the defendant. Upon these facts alone, if this had come to the knowledge of the defendant, I am not sure that the defendant would not have been justified in coming to the conclusion that this man had clandestinely appropriated his property. But the facts rather came to the defendant's knowledge in another form. The complaint was made by this girl Kinser, who was in his room at Simon's Town, that the plaintiff had been to the place, and had, against her will, taken the accordion, which she had told him at the time belonged to the defendant. That certainly increases the suspicious nature of the action of the plaintiff. The defendant, thereupon, having been informed that his property had been taken away, instructs his attorney to claim £6 for the accordion, and the answer is sent by the defendant's attorney, in which he says: "I am instructed by the defendant (that is the plaintiff in the present case) to deny any liability." That is another circumstance which doubles the suspicion, because not only was the property carried off, but there is a denial of any liability in the matter. That would justify the owner in concluding that the accordion was unlawfully appropriated by the person making that denial. Under all the circumstances of this case, I think, considering the relationship that existed between the plaintiff and the defendant, that the defendant had reasonable and probable cause for coming to the conclusion that the plaintiff had unlawfully removed his property, and under circumstances that would constitute a theft. Now, when it is once decided that a person instituting a prosecution had reasonable and probable cause for taking the steps which he did take, then whether he acted maliciously would in no way affect the case. I would, nevertheless, refer to this question of malice for the purpose of ascertaining if it throws any light on the rest of the case. It has been proved that the plaintiff was an utter stranger to the defendant. He did not know of his residence; he did not know of his business, and he had never seen him before. This girl, who seems to have been on familiar terms with the plaintiff, and afterwards went to the defendant, says that the defendant was not at all acquainted with the plaintiff, and that she never told him of the relationship between them. I am quite prepared to believe that, under the circumstances the girl on ceasing her relationship with the plaintiff and going to live with the defendant would conceal the intimate terms she had been on with the former. I am satisfied there could not have been any active malice on the part of the defendant against an utter stranger. When the case closed I was satisfied that as no malice had been proved, and that as the defendant had reasonable and probable cause for the action, it was not necessary to call upon counsel for the defendant. Thereupon, a further question was raised by Mr. McGregor, and that was to the effect that in respect of the claim for false imprisonment, certain other considerations arose affecting the decision of that question; and he bases his attitude on the contention that even if a charge of theft could have been laid against the plaintiff in this case, that he should not have been arrested, and even if a prosecution was justifiable, it should have been commenced by summons, and not by arrest. Well, he has cited no law which makes it compulsory for persons to proceed by way of summons. Under all the circumstances, I think the police acted in the ordinary course, and they acted in a manner which was justifiable by law. The defendant did not instruct them what course to take, but, having laid the charge of theft, they took the usual step, and arrested the plaintiff, and the charge being justifiable under the circumstances, the arrest is also justifiable, and the question of false imprisonment falls to the ground. I am of opinion that there should be judgment for the defendant, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.].

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

LEE, SON AND CO. V. HEDDLE BROS. 1903. Aug. 6th.

Mr. Buchanan moved for judgment on certain bills of exchange accepted by the defendants. A consent paper had been filed by the defendants agreeing to judgment.

Judgment in terms of consent.

JAGGER AND CO. V. JACKSON AND LEVITT (trading as Empire Furnishing Co.).

Mr. Upington moved for the final adjudication of the defendants' estate.

Order granted as prayed.

FISK V. COLLARD.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for provisional sentence for £65 sterling on a mortgage bond, due by reason of the non-payment of interest, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. from the 1st January, 1903; also for £50 on a mortgage bond, due for a similar reason, and also costs of suit.

Order granted.

WAKELIN AND ANOTHER V. FROST.

Mr. Buchanan moved for judgment for £51 4s., due from the defendant by virtue of certain conditions of sale in the purchase of certain land at Hout's Bay at public auction by the defendant from the plaintiff, with interest at 6 per cent. from the 11th December, 1902, and costs of suit.

Order granted.

BRUCE V. SALODIEN.

Mr. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence for £1,400 upon a mortgage bond, together with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. from the 1st January, 1903, and also for the land specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Mr. Alexander, for the defendant, said he had only just been instructed, and the affidavits had not yet been prepared. He was instructed to point out that there was nothing in the summons to allege why the bond had become due, and, again, notice could not be given of the bond within twelve months of August, 1902.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The summons says by reason of the non-payment of interest.]

There is nothing in our summons to show that. I do not know what the defence is precisely, but I understand that the defendant said that he had handed over the interest to an agent to be paid to the plaintiff.

De Villiers, C.J.: You should state what your defence is; provisional sentence will be granted, with stay of execution for a week.

SMIDT V. SMILES.

Mr. Alexander moved for provisional sentence for £250 on a promissory note, with interest from the 1st January, 1903, and costs of suit.

Order granted.

ESTATE SPANIER V. LE SUEUR.

Mr. Upington moved for a decree of civil imprisonment against the defendant upon an unsatisfied judgment of this Court, under which £160 11s. 11d. was due. It appeared that the defendant was a Civil Servant at Graaff-Reinet, that he had offered to pay £5 a month, and that he had stated that his salary was reduced during the operation of martial law at Graaff-Reinet. Counsel suggested that the instalments should be fixed at £10 a month.

A decree of civil imprisonment was granted, to be suspended if the defendant paid £5 a month until the capital and interest were discharged, the first payment to be made on the 1st September.

FRANK V. BLACK.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for provisional sentence for £231 14s. 9d., upon a promissory note, together with interest from the 14th May, 1903, and costs; also for provisional sentence for £98 on a cheque signed by the defendant in favour of the plaintiff, with interest from the 22nd July, 1903, and costs.

Order granted.

LUYT V. HOUGH. { 1903. Aug. 6th.

Consideration—Promise to extend time of payment—Defence.

The defendant, being indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of £225, offered to pay £100 in cash and to give a promissory note for the balance, which offer the plaintiff accepted. Thereafter the defendant tendered £100 in cash and a promissory note made by himself, but the plaintiff refused the tender and sued the defendant for provisional sentence. The plaintiff held no security for the original debt.

Held, that as the tender was in terms of a definite agreement between the parties, the plaintiff was not entitled to provisional sentence.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for provisional sentence on a good-for for £25, given by the defendant, J. P. Hough, of Ceres, and payable on demand, interest to be at the rate of 6 per cent. The summons also claimed a sum of £200 5s. 9d. for goods sold and delivered, but (said counsel) he was informed that that matter would form the subject of a subsequent action.

Mr. Upington, for the defendant, said that on the 30th June the local attorney of the defendant wrote to the plaintiff's attorney stating that he would be prepared to pay him £100 on the 31st prox., and give him a promissory note for the balance, payable on the 20th December. Correspondence read by counsel showed that the plaintiff raised some objection to this course, as defendant did not propose to have this promissory note backed by independent security.

De Villiers, C.J.: It seems to me reasonably clear that the demand made on the 26th June on behalf of the plaintiff for £225 5s. 9d. includes the good-for of £25 which is now sued for, and the defence raised is that in respect of that claim of £225 5s. 9d. there was a clear agreement between the parties to give the defendant further time for payment upon certain terms. The defendant's attorney, on receipt of the letter, writes as follows: "Mr. J. P. Hough has instructed me to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 26th, and in reply thereto to state that he will be prepared to pay you £100 on the 31st prox., and to give you a promissory note for the balance payable on the 20th December, 1903. Kindly acknowledge receipt of this and reply." The reply stated that the plaintiff was prepared to accept this offer. Here, therefore, there is a clear agreement to accept a deferred payment, and the only question is whether the promissory note here clearly means a secured promissory note, a promissory note with the name of an endorser, or the promissory note of the defendant himself. Clearly it can only mean the defendant himself. If it had been intended that there should be security it would have been stated. There was no surety for the good-for, at all events it was without any endorser, and if the parties had intended that this promissory note which was to be given should be a promissory note with security, or with an endorser, they would have said so. There was no consideration for the promise to extend the time made, and on the principle laid down in Malan v. Secretan (Foord 94) the Court should not render any assistance to the plaintiff in receiving judgment for a debt the payment of which he has definitely pronounced to defer. The defendant has tendered the part payment which under the agreement he has promised to make, and provisional sentence must be refused, with costs.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte KEMP. { 1903. Aug. 6th.

Mr. Bisset moved for a rule cancelling a certain mortgage bond. The bond was passed in favour of one John Fuller, who subsequently became insolvent, having previously ceded the bond to the firm of Enfeller and Otto, 19 years ago. No interest had been claimed on the bond, and the whereabouts of either member of the firm of Enfeller and Otto were not known. The bond was informally ceded by Fuller, the document not being registered. Fuller renounced interest in the bond, which was now in the possession of the executor of the estate of the late Jacob Francois Cloete, who was one of the subsequent purchasers of the property.

A rule was granted calling on all persons interested to show cause on the 27th August why the bond should not be cancelled as prayed, the rule to be published once in a Cape Town Dutch newspaper and in a Cape Town English newspaper, and to be served on the executor of the estate of the late Jacob Francois Cloete.

Ex parte DYER AND WIFE.

Mr. Buchanan moved for leave to execute a contract after marriage to have the force and effect of an ante-nuptial contract. The parties were domiciled in England at the time of their marriage, but married in order to come out to Cape Colony, and to be domiciled here thereafter. At the time of the marriage they were informed that the marriage would be subject to the Married Women's Property Act as far as the property in England was concerned, but that as regarded other property they would require to take legal advice in this colony. They wished now to have a contract registered in this colony, excluding community of property.

De Villiers, C.J.: An order will be granted authorising the Registrar of Deeds to register a contract carrying out the agreement of the parties before marriage in the terms proposed.

ESTATE YOUNG V. MEYERS.

On the motion of Mr. Russell, leave was granted to attach certain property ad fundandam jurisdictionem, and to sue by edictal citation, returnable on the 12th October, the citation to be served by registered letter, posted to the defendant's address in Nyassaland, and to be published in the "Gazette," if any published in Nyassaland.

Postea (October 12).

Mr. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond, sued upon by virtue of this edictal citation. The summons asked for provisional sentence for the sum of £724 3s. 4d., with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. There was also a claim for £68 4s. 6d., for quitrent, and other taxes due on the property, but this appeared to be money expended for the purposes of the defendant.

Provisional sentence granted on amount of bond.

MEDALLIE AND SCHIFF V. ROUS. 1903. Aug. 6th. „ 17th.

Deposit—Bailment—Sale by depositary — Negligence — Damages.

It is no valid defence to an action by a depositor for the return of the goods deposited or for damages that the depositary has sold them unless it is clear that the sale was under the circumstances necessary and for the benefit of the depositor in which cases the depositary would only be liable for the price realised.

This was an appeal against a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Aliwal North in an action in which appellants claimed delivery of a cart and harness, left by them with the defendant, or the value thereof. The summons alleged that in January, 1901, the plaintiffs deposited for safe-keeping with the defendant one Cape cart, of the value of £17, and a set of harness, valued at £3. They had demanded delivery of the same, but defendant had failed to comply with the demand. The plea was that the sum of £3 11s. had been tendered, being the balance, after deduction of expenses, of the proceeds of the sale of the cart and harness, which sale was duly advertised. The evidence for the plaintiffs was to the effect that they formerly lived with the defendant, and during the war were deported by the military. They left a power of attorney with Messrs. Stroyan and Osler to dispose of their property. They were expelled at 24 hours' notice, and left the cart and harness with defendant, directing him to keep them until they took them away or ordered someone else to do so. They were absent for about two years. They intended Mr. Stroyan to sell the cart and harness, but fixed £20 as a reserve. On behalf of the defendant, evidence was given to show that defendant kept the wagon from January until September, 1901, and then caused an advertisement to be inserted in the "Northern Post," to the effect that unless the cart and harness left by Messrs. McDally and Roberts were claimed by a specified date, they would be sold. As they were not claimed, defendant instructed Mr. James McTaggett to sell them, and they were accordingly sold by public auction for a sum which, after deducting a charge for rent, advertising, and sale expenses, left an amount of £3 11s., which defendant tendered to the plaintiffs. At that time carts were fetching a low price. The Magistrate gave judgment for the amount of the tender, and ordered plaintiffs to pay the costs. In his reasons, the Magistrate stated that Mr. Stroyan had every opportunity of seeing the notice of the sale. Defendant acted bona fide, believing he had the right to sell the property, and knowing that plaintiffs would not be in any worse position by receiving the proceeds, less expenses, of the sale by Mr. McTaggett than they would have been had Mr. Stroyan sold the property as instructed by plaintiffs.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for appellant): The Magistrate's reasons are very difficult to follow; particularly what he says as to a nudum pactum. He seems to lay down that if the goods of a depositary are left in a man's hands, the person receiving such deposit must take what he can get for them at a public auction. In this case the defendant had no right to sell at all. Then, again, he did not keep to the reserved price. The auctioneer's advertisement shows that he had no order to sell. Even a pledgee may not sell without a judicial order. In the forced sale the goods were sold for £5 10s. instead of £22, the reserved price. That was not to the interest of the owner, and therefore the defendant could not claim the privileges of a negotiorum gestor. Then, again, the names of the plaintiffs were incorrectly advertised, and we cannot assume that Roux knew by whose instructions the cart, etc., were sold. As to Actio directa depositi, see Voet (16, 3, 4, and 6, 1, 8). A depositary has no right to alienate, but must hand back the thing itself. Voet does not allude specifically to the point here raised, but see Story on Bailments (sec. 100), Pothier on deposits and Digest (16, 3, 1, 1). Even if a creditor has a lien it does not follow that he can sell. See also Wilson v. Shaw (1 Shiel, 299).

[De Villiers, C.J.: May not the depositary act as a negotiorum gestor in the interests of the depositor and of all parties?]

Here the depositary was acting solely in his own interests.

Mr. McGregor (for respondent): The case of Wilson v. Shaw does not apply, and in these cases the Court will construe the contract between the parties very strictly. See Burge (vol. 3, p. 603), and Storey on Agency (sec. 371), Kent (vol. 2, 642), Grueber (2, bk. 48, sec. 14).

[De Villiers, C.J.: But that surely means that the pledgee can sell if he first obtains the judgment of the Court, or if he is allowed to do so by special pact with the pledgor.]

Then I submit that the respondent could avail himself of his rights as a negotiorum gestor. It has been argued that he acted for his own advantage, but a negotiorum gestatio operates both in favour of the negotiorum gestor and in favour of the man whose business he takes in hand. McTaggett should have proved his claim in the Magistrate's Court. If a mandatory acts bona fide he cannot be met by the exceptio doli mali. If I claim an article I must tender payment. Here there was no tender, not even of costs of sale. Even if we did dammify the appellant, and the case should go against us, he cannot claim costs. On the overruling of the exception see Van Leeuwen (vol. 2, p. 216, Kotzé's Translation). The plaintiff sustained no damage by the sale of this cart, and I would even go further, and say that the defendant, having acted bona fide, and having benefited the plaintiff by saving him from further expense, must be regarded as a negotiorum gestor. As to the exception doli mali see 6 Promptuarium Juris Nori (480).

Mr. Schreiner (in reply): The plaintiff was not absent two years, and the cart was sold at the end of six months.

[De Villiers, C.J.: According to the summons the deposit was paid at the end of 1901.]

Yes, a mistake was made as to the date.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is the value of the cart and harness?]

Over £35, and I submit that our claim is a very reasonable one. Then see sec. 92 of Act 28 of 1883. A licensed person may sell property left in his custody and not reclaimed within six months; a boarding-house keeper has no such right.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (August 17).

De Villiers, C.J.: The facts of this case are very simple, and its right decision depends upon the application of certain elementary rules of law. During the recent war the plaintiffs, who had been ordered by the military authorities to leave the town of Aliwal North, left a cart and harness in the custody of the defendant, with the request that he would keep the articles until they either took them away or ordered someone else to do so. The plaintiffs, before leaving, appear to have requested a Mr. Stroyan to sell their goods for them, and the belief of one of the plaintiffs is that the price was fixed at £20, but Stroyan did not carry out the mandate. After the defendant had been in possession of the cart and harness for about eight months, he was informed by one McTaggart that he had been instructed to sell the cart and harness, but the defendant refused to deliver them, claiming, as he did, a lien for his charge for the custody of the goods. He then published a notice in the local newspaper to the effect that, unless a certain cart and harness left under his charge by Messrs. McDally and Roberts, were claimed within three weeks, the same would be sold by auction to defray expenses. It should be here observed that the name of the plaintiffs' firm was "Medallie and Schiff," and not "McDally and Roberts," as advertised by the defendant. The expenses which he wished to defray consisted solely of his charge for the custody of the cart and harness. The goods not being claimed by anyone, were sold by public auction, and realised £4 18s. 6d., a price far below their present value, owing to the low price of such goods at Aliwal North during the war. During their absence from Aliwal North, which lasted for about two years, the plaintiffs never corresponded with the defendant, and on their return the defendant informed them of what he had done, and tendered the money he had received, less his charge for storing the cart and his expenses of advertising. The plaintiffs refused the tender, and brought an action in the Magistrate's Court for £20, which was really less than the true value of the cart and harness at the date of the plaintiffs' return. The defendant repeated his tender, and the Magistrate held the tender to be sufficient on the ground that the defendant was justified under all the circumstances in selling the cart and harness. In his reasons he lays stress on the fact that the defendant honestly believed that McTaggart had been instructed by the plaintiffs to sell the cart and harness, and on the fact that Stroyan, who had been actually so instructed, raised no objection to the sale, although he had every opportunity of seeing the notice. In regard to the first of these facts the defendant's belief that McTaggart had been instructed to sell the cart and harness cannot assist him if in fact McTaggart had no such authority. In regard to the fact that Stroyan raised no objection to the sale, it is sufficient to say that a notice to the effect that a cart and harness belonging to two other persons would be sold cannot be held to amount to a notice that the cart and harness of the plaintiffs would be dealt with.

I am not prepared to say that under no circumstances can a depositary with the consent of the depositor sell goods deposited with him for safe keeping, but I am clearly of opinion that if he does so sell them the burden lies on him of proving that he acted in the interest and for the benefit of the depositor. It is a primary duty of a depositary to return the thing deposited when it is required of him, and if he is unable to do so he cannot escape liability without proving that this inability does not arise out of his own negligence. If it is lost or injured through his negligence he is responsible to the extent of the loss or injury. It is no valid defence to the depositor's claim for a return of the goods that the depositary has sold them unless it is clear that the sale was under the circumstances necessary, and for the benefit of the depositor. If the goods had been sold to save them from perishing, or on account of the depositary having to leave the place, and being unable to find anyone else to take the custody, he would not be liable for more than the price of the goods received by him less his expenses. But if the goods had been sold without the clearest necessity, the depositary would be liable in damages for the breach of his primary duty to retain the custody of the goods entrusted to his case.

In the present case there is no evidence whatever that the sale was a necessary one, or in the interest of the plaintiffs. They had authorised Stroyan to sell their goods in Aliwal North, including, presumably, the cart and harness, but he would not have sold them unless he could obtain a fair price for them, and the price actually realised was certainly not a fair one. The defendant says that he sold in order to recover his charges for keeping the articles, but assuming that such charges were claimable, he should have obtained the judgment of a competent Court for the amount, in which case the articles might have been attached and sold in execution. But there was nothing in the contract between the parties, which justified the defendant in taking upon himself the responsibility of selling the articles entrusted to his custody, and as he was unable to restore the articles when they were demanded from him, the Court below ought to have given judgment for the amount of their value. The appeal must accordingly be allowed, and as the plaintiff's counsel does not object to the counterclaim of £1, judgment will be entered for the plaintiffs for £19, with costs in this court and in the court below.

TRIAL CAUSE.

ATKINS v. DELPONT. { 1903. Aug. 6th.

Lessor and lessee—Obligations of lessor—Defective premises—Damages.

A lessor is liable in damages to the lessee in respect of any injury caused to the property of the lessee by the defective condition of the premises leased: provided that the lessor had knowledge of such defect, or by reason of his trade or calling ought to have had such knowledge.

This was an action for the recovery of £45, rent said to be due by the defendant to the plaintiff in respect of certain premises in Long-street.

The declaration stated that on the 21st October, 1901, the parties entered into an agreement by which the defendant rented certain premises at the corner of Long and Bloem streets for £30 per month. The defendant was given notice to leave, on account of alterations, by the 15th February, 1902, and when she left on the 28th February, the sum of £45 was owing to the plaintiff. Plaintiff claimed £45, with interest a tempore morae, alternative relief, and costs of suit.

The plea set out that the premises were leased to the defendant for the purpose of sub-letting, and that they were not fit for that purpose. She had suffered damages to furniture, and by reason of the loss of tenants, to the extent of £100. The plaintiff agreed that the premises were not fit for habitation, and consented to rebate some rent during the renovations. The defendant claimed in reconvention £100 damages, with interest a tempore morae, alternative relief, and costs of suit.

Mr. Gardiner for plaintiff; Mr Benjamin (with him Mr. Russell) for defendant.

Henry Atkins, plaintiff, said that the negotiations for the lease were carried on for him through the Colonial Orphan Chamber. The defendant entered into possession of the premises in November, and at that time he knew of nothing being wrong with the plastering. In January the Town Council were proceeding against him for letting the premises for dwellings, instead of offices. Subsequently a satisfactory arrangement was arrived at. Notice to quit the premises was given for the 15th February. On the 14th January the defendant, Mrs. Delpont, pointed out two of the twenty-one rooms, in which all the plaster had fallen off. The rooms looked as if they were being occupied. Mrs. Delpont asked if she could remain in the premises, and suggested that the workmen might proceed with the work while the tenants shifted about. The defendant then said she had taken a place further up the street, but that it would not be ready at the time. Witness offered to store the furniture free of charge in three of the front rooms, until the other premises were ready. Witness did not agree to let the defendant remain, and there was no arrangement about rent. There was no mention of damages, beyond the fact that she stated that she had suffered some inconvenience, and the tenants had to leave. Witness saw a notice posted up to the effect that the tenants were not to disturb themselves, as the defendants did not intend to leave. The defendant did not leave on the 15th February, and witness caused an attorney's letter to be sent to the defendant. After defendant had left the premises, she suggested to plaintiff that she should be let off with half a month's rent, and witness referred her to the Colonial Orphan Chamber.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: Witness was in England when the lease was entered into, and he knew nothing of the defective walls. There were no complaints about the other rooms. Subsequently the majority of the rooms had to be stripped. He could not say whether his agents sent a demand for the rent for January and February. Beyond two of the rooms, he could not give any opinion as to whether the premises were fit for habitation. He was not aware that there was a great demand for furnished apartments at the time.

Re-examined by Mr. Gardiner: The defendant offered to shift from room to room when the workmen would come in.

Max Rosenberg, architect, said that he was in charge of the erection of the plaintiff's premises. He had been in England part of the time, and in January, when he heard of the defective plastering, he visited the premises with Mr. Atkins. He could not say how many rooms they saw at the time. He remembered the defendant asking the plaintiff to be allowed to remain, and witness said that it was quite impossible. The plaintiff promised to do everything in his power to assist the defendant, and on that occasion there was no mention of rent or damages. The defendant refused to let the workmen in on the 15th February.

Cross examined by Mr. Benjamin: He heard the greater part of the conversation, and he would not contradict the defendant if she said that he was a minute or two absent.

George Wm. Steytler, Secretary for the Colonial Orphan Chamber, said the negotiations were conducted through Messrs. Chiappini Bros., who acted for the defendant. He had no knowledge of the defective plastering at the time the premises were let.

Sarah Hind said she was manageress while the Delpont's had the rooms. There were twenty-one rooms in all. None of the tenants left in consequence of the plaster falling off. She was not aware that any tenants had been refused, but two gentlemen complained of the rooms. People were glad to get anything at that particular time.

By Mr. Justice Maasdorp: The plaster commenced to fall after the new year.

Continuing, witness stated that she remembered Mr. Atkins telling the defendant that she must leave the premises. There was no mention of rent at that time. The plaintiff said that the defendant would have to leave on account of the notice from the Town Council. Two notices were pasted up against the wall, one of which was to the effect that the tenants need not be alarmed, and that their luggage would be removed free of charge. The second one merely altered the date.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: She did not hear all of the conversation. Plaster fell off the other rooms, but not in sufficient quantities to prevent their being let. An old lady and gentleman left before their month was up, although they had paid in advance. She did not think the several witnesses in Court left on account of the rooms.

For the defence, Mr. Benjamin called the defendant, Martha Delpont. She stated that her husband transacted most of the business in connection with these premises. Two months' rent was paid in advance. When she first entered the premises the plaster was good, but about nine or ten days later the plaster commenced falling, and it was sufficient to touch the walls to fill the rooms with plaster. With the exception of six rooms, the other rooms were more or less stripped of the plaster. The plaintiff, when he visited the premises, said she must lock up all the rooms in order to see what the damage was, and he said he could not pay her any damages, because he did not know what damages he would get himself. She said that she wanted someone to look at the furniture to see the damage. The plaintiff promised to let her off with a month's rent. It was very difficult to get such a large place.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: She did not leave on the 15th February, because the plaintiff said that a week or two did not matter. She remained on till the 28th February, because six of the rooms were fairly good, and she had no place to go to. It was an arrangement with the landlord that she could store the furniture free of charge in the front rooms, and that she could remain, rent free, for a month. The tenants would never take their things out of their boxes, because they would be destroyed. She could have let the rooms to "Volunteers," but they were not nice people. It was only natural now that Mrs. Hind, having got the premises, would take the landlord's part. She understood English very well, and she made no mistake about the plaintiff's promise. She was not excited on the day Mr. Atkins called, in fact, she never got excited. She did not offer to pay one month's rent to the plaintiff. She could not tell who put up the notice. She wanted the house back again, but the plaintiff would not let her have it.

Re-examined by Mr. Benjamin: The plaintiff wrote the letter giving notice to quit in order that the defendant might show it to her tenants.

John Delpont, husband of the defendant, said that he carried on the negotiations with the Colonial Orphan Chamber on behalf of his wife. Ten or twelve days after they took possession there was a serious fall of plaster. There was another fall ten days later, and witness complained personally to Mr. Steytler, who said that he could not do much, as the owner of the premises was in England. Things went from bad to worse, and the mattresses and furniture became seriously damaged in all but four rooms. It cost about £400 to furnish the rooms, and he estimated the depreciation at about 25 per cent. The plaster kept on falling all day, and with the traffic, the linoleum became damaged. From the 15th till the 30th November, his receipts were £34 to £35, during December £67, January £63, and February £50. His expenses during a month ran to about £57, but it was only when the place was full that he made any profit, because he could then tell the lodgers that he was going to increase their rent, and if they did not like it they could go If the house was full, he would have turned over from £90 to £100. He had practically no profit from the premises in question. When the plaintiff came to the house in January, he expressed great surprise at a new house being in such a condition. In several spots the paper was holding the plaster on the wall. The plaintiff said the best thing to do was to lock up the rooms. The plaintiff agreed with Mrs. Delpont that she should remain for a month rent free, and after further agreeing to give a few days' grace, he sugested sending a letter, in order that the defendants could explain the state of affairs to the tenant. The plaintiff promised to give them back the house.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He was absolutely certain that he had seen Mr. Steytler in January. The plaintiff had made such nice promises that he did not call in an assessor to look at the damaged furniture. He did not reply to the attorney's letters demanding the rent, because he did not think it necessary. He was positive that the plaintiff promised the premises a month free of rent, when his attention was drawn to the damage.

Herbert Lawrence said that he occupied a room in the premises in the latter end of January. When the plaster came off the walls, the wind howling through was sufficient to blow out the candle. He complained several times to the manageress, and he had to leave on account of the draught.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner; He had not to leave Cape Town at the time. He took apartments in Hope-street.

Counsel were then heard in argument on the facts.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (August 17).

[Kotzé, J.: The defendant has not satisfied me that the plaintiff agreed to waive a month's rent from the 15th January to 15th February, 1903. The plaintiff has, however, established his claim in convention to the recovery of the sum of £45, for rent from the 15th of January to the 28th of February, 1903. Against this the defendant sets up a claim in reconvention for £100 damages. She complains that the premises leased to her were not reasonably fit for occupation, and has led evidence to show that the plaster work of several of the rooms was defective, and that owing to the fall of plaster from the walls she sustained damage to her furniture, and also suffered a loss of lodgers.

A lessor is obliged to deliver the buildings hired in a fit and proper state for the purpose intended. In the present instance the premises were hired to be used as a boarding-house or as furnished apartments. The lessor is further, as Grotius lays it down, liable to the lessee for any damage caused by a defect in the property leased, where he has knowledge of such defect, or by reason of his trade or calling ought to have known of the defect. Van der Linden states the rule in too general a way when he says that the lessor is bound to compensate the lessee for damage sustained through actual defects (wezenlyke gebreken) in the thing leased. He refers to Digest (19, 2, C. 19, section 1), in support of his statement.

This passage in the Digest puts two cases. The first is that of a person hiring out wine jars, and here the jurist says that if through a defect in the jars wine leaks out and is lost, the person who has so let them out will be liable to make good the loss. Zoezius and Voet understand this to refer to the letting out of wine jars by a person in the way of his trade, who is taken to have knowledge of the defect. In other words, he is presumed to have known what he ought to have known. The other case put is where a forest pasture is let, and, by reason of noxious grass or herbs, the lessee's cattle are injured or destroyed. Here the lessor will duly be liable in damages to the lessee, if he knew of the existence of the noxious grass or herbs, but not if he were ignorant of their existence, although in the latter instance the lessee would be entitled to an abatement or remission of rent. There must, therefore, be knowledge, either express or implied, of the defect, in order to render the lessor liable in damages. This I take to be the correct rule of our law. It is so stated by Grotius, and has been understood and followed in several cases in this Court.

Now, the defendant entered into occupation on the 15th November, 1902, and paid £60 by way of two months' rent in advance. When she entered into occupation the walls of the rooms were apparently in good condition, but a day or two after some plaster commenced to fall off. A fortnight later a more serious fall of plaster occurred, and notice was given of this to the plaintiff's agent during the first week in December. No steps were, however, taken, to repair the plastering. On the 14th of January, 1903, the plaintiff, who had meanwhile returned from Europe, visited the premises, and saw for himself what had occurred. On the same day the defendant had received a month's notice to quit from the plaintiff's agent. This was because the Town Council had objected to the premises being used as dwellings when they were originally built for the purpose of being occupied as offices. The defendant did not, however, actually vacate the premises until the 28th February. When notice was given to the plaintiff's agent in December of the falling in of the plaster, and the inconvenience caused thereby, the plastering should have been repaired. The defendant was willing to shift from room to room till this had been done. After notice had been given, the plaster continued to fall, but no repairs whatever were attempted. There is evidence to show that the defendant sustained some damage to her furniture through the constant falling in of the plaster, and for this damage I think the plaintiff, as lessor, is liable after notice had been given to his agent, and no attempt was made to remedy the defective plastering. Some lodgers also left the defendant. The only point is whether the defendant can claim compensation for this from the lessor, and, if so, whether she is entitled to damages for the whole period of occupation. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendant can not claim any damages after the 15th January, 1903, for as she knew of the defective state of the plastering, she remained there at her own risk. The case of Wheeler v. Van Reenen (2, Juta, 269), was relied on to show that if a lessee, knowing of the defective state of the premises, enters or continues in possession, he cannot sue the lessor for any damages caused by the defective state of the buildings. Now, so far as damage was done to the furniture, that happened before the 15th of January. Although the defendant may not be entitled to claim damages for loss of lodgers after that time, and the evidence tends to show that before that period no lodgers had actually left, she was nevertheless entitled to have the full use and benefit of occupation. This she did not have and enjoy by reason of the falling in of the plastering and the uninhabitable condition of some of the rooms. She is entitled to a remission of rent on that account. I think that the damage which she has sustained has been somewhat exaggerated by the defendant. The sum of £100, which she claims, is far too high, and an amount of £30 appears to me to be a reasonable and sufficient compensation for damage done to the furniture. As to a remission of rent, the sum of £15, or half a month's rent, is all that I am disposed to award. There should, therefore, be judgment for the defendant on her claim in reconvention for £45. The result is that both the plaintiff and defendant obtain a judgment for £45, and I think there should be no order with regard to costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.) and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.

CROWN OF DENMARK v. S. A. MILLING COMPANY. { 1903. Aug. 7th. " 10th. " 22nd " 24th.

Demurrage—Charter party—Reasonable diligence — Custom and facilities of port of discharge.

A charter party provided that the discharge of the ship at C. dock should be according to the custom and facilities of the port and that for each day's detention threepence per ton register should be paid. By the custom of the port the landing of goods was done exclusively by the Harbour Board. The Board provided no sheds at the docks for the storage of goods other than general cargoes, and did not employ a sufficient number of vehicles for removing goods as fast as the ships in port could discharge them, but the defendants, the charterers, owing to the large number of cargoes of wheat which were being landed for them, and to their failing to provide sufficient appliances for coping with their increased business, could not receive the cargo from the plaintiff's ship as fast as the vehicles could deliver it.

Held, in an action for demurrage that the defendants having contributed to the delay by their want of diligence were liable for the detention beyond the time when, with the exercise of reasonable diligence, they might have taken delivery of the whole cargo.

This was an action brought by Thomas Francis Milman, master of the British ship Crown of Denmark, on behalf of the owners, against the South African Milling Co., to recover £372 for demurrage or detention of the plaintiff's vessel.

The declaration set out that the plaintiff represented the owners of the vessel, and the defendants carried on business in Cape Town. The vessel arrived in Table Bay on March 24th, 1903, under a charter party, entered into at London on August 13, 1902, between the owners of the vessel, through their duly authorised agents, and Messrs. Dewar and Webb, as agents for Messrs. Kerr, Gifford and Co. (charterers). The vessel was loaded with a cargo of wheat, to be discharged at this port, the defendant company being the consignees of the cargo under bills of lading. It was provided by the said charter party that the discharge at Cape Town Dock should be according to the custom and facilities of the port. It was further provided by the charter party that 3d. per ton should be paid for every day's demurrage. The vessel entered the Docks on March 30, and commenced discharging the next day. It was provided by the Harbour Board regulations that a vessel of such tonnage should discharge not less than 200 tons per day. The defendant company failed to effect reasonable despatch, and the lay days ran on to the 12th May, instead of the 20th April. The plaintiff claimed up to the date of issue of summons for demurrage at the rate of 3d. per ton. The defendants' plea admitted the formal allegations, but stated that the custom of the port with regard to unloading and discharging was that these duties were solely and absolutely vested in the Harbour Board, and that the consignees could in no way control the work. The defendants were at all times ready and willing to receive such portion of the cargo as the Board from time to time might deliver. The defendants denied any liability, though they admitted that the delivery was not completed till the 12th May.

The replication denied that the whole matter was in the hands of the Board, and stated that the discharge was frequently in the hands of stevedores, as was the case with the Crown of Denmark. The plaintiff did not admit that the matter was entirely out of the power of the consignees. The delay was due to the failure of the defendants to receive the cargo. The rejoinder was general.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers), for the plaintiff; Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Close), for the defendants.

The evidence of the master, taken on commission, was put in, which set forth that he had information from the Quay Superintendent, of the Harbour Board, that the delay was caused through the merchants being unable to receive the cargo. From the start, the rate of discharge was not sufficient, and he never had more than one hatch working. The stevedores were prepared to work two hatchways and two gangs, and in that case, 300 tons per day could have been discharged. The Harbour Board would not allow him to discharge, because he would have blocked the quay. The defendant company, on being interviewed about the delay, said they hoped to make up for the delay before the allotted time. Captain Leigh said the whole delay was caused through the inability of the defendant company to receive the cargo. The 22nd of April was the only day they could not discharge through wet weather. In other places, he had discharged 400 tons per day from one hatch. He could not say from his own knowledge whether the defendant company could receive the cargo or not. On the 14th, 15th, and 17th April they were stopped for want of wagons. The Harbour Board allowed a remission of four and a half days' dock dues, but he could not say why the remission was made. He was never stopped for want of men.

Wm. Matthie, partner in the firm of Neill and Matthie, stevedores, said that his firm commenced to discharge the vessel on the 31st March, and finished on the 12th May. One hatch was worked, and he could easily have taken out 200 tons per day. With three hatches, he could have discharged about 400 tons per day. The Quay Superintendent ordered him to stop work on a number of days, and altogether, on twelve working days there was no work done at all, and on five days there was only half-work done. The ship should have been discharged in about nine days. Witness had the labour at hand to do that. The Harbour Board did not allow the quay to become blocked, and they had to stop work when the cargo was not taken away. The Glenbank, with 2,804 tons, was cleared in eleven working days. There was no necessity for delay when a ship was ballasting.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He knew that the ship was taking in ballast on three days that the work was stopped. The ballasting would not have affected the discharge of the wheat. The gear broke occasionally, but that only necessitated delay for an hour or so. The ship was shifted twice by the Harbour Board. The Board allowed three and a half days' dock dues for days on which there were no trucks available. It was a special occasion when wheat was discharged in rainy weather, and the consignee took that risk.

Captain Leigh, Dock Superintendent, said that he had control of the discharge of vessels in the Docks. The Harbour Board took the cargo from the ship's slings, and put it in trailers or trucks. He had to stop the stevedores on many occasions, because the Milling Co. could not receive the cargo. He had that information from Mr. Mellish, cartage superintendent. Mr. Mellish reported that on several occasions many trailers were still under load. In consequence of that, he gave the stevedores orders to stop the discharge. Witness wrote to the consignees drawing attention to the fact that he had to stop the unloading owing to the number of trailers the defendants had under load, but he received no answer. He wrote again on the 14th April, asking the defendants to expedite the unloading, and they replied stating that they failed to see the purport of the letter, and that the responsibility could not be placed on them. The delay of shifting of the ship would be amply allowed for by half a day on each occasion. The Crown of Denmark should have discharged 250 tons per day through one hatch. There was no block, so far as the dock area was concerned, and there was no reason why the stuff should not be taken away.

Some days they were short of trucks, but the Board had sufficient trailers to deliver 200 tons a day. The remission of dock dues was made in accordance with the regulations.

By De Villiers, C.J.: No remission would be made if the fault were that of the consignees.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Witness had not the original warrants. It would have been possible for the consignees to send wagons for the stuff. Witness would not have allowed them to do so in this case, because the Harbour Board plant was "boxed up" with their stuff. Witness did not have the reports of Mr. Mellish. Verbal reports were given every evening. Witness had no written reports. Witness had seen trailers in the vicinity of the mill. He had not received any written reports from Mr. Mellish, and he did not consider it necessary to have such reports. He did not know who would impose the penalty for the detention of trailers. He could not say whether the consignees were fined or not. He would not say that the trailers outside the consignees' stores were from the Crown of Denmark, although that ship was stopped. The Board had not a store in which they could deposit the cargo. When he said 250 tons per day, he was giving the amount that could be discharged. On the 21st, 22nd, 23rd, and half of the 25th April, the Harbour Board was short of trucks. The Railway Department said that they were blocked at Artois Siding, and could not receive any more stuff.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: The Harbour Board could always keep going as long as the merchants would receive their stuff. The object of the Harbour Board's sheds was for a general cargo that had to be sorted.

Arthur Wm. Mellish, cartage superintendent to the Harbour Board, said that at that time he had sufficient trailers to discharge the Crown of Denmark at the rate of 200 to 250 tons per day. The cause of the delay was a congestion of loaded trailers at the defendants' stores. The defendant company was receiving other cargoes, and there was delay at the stores. Fifty-nine trailers could not be left outside the stores, on account of the Municipal regulations, but they were distributed over different points. The defendants complained of insufficient labour, and witness procured them some assistance. He constantly reported this matter to Captain Leigh. Witness tried to get Mr. Steven to work overtime or on Sunday, but he was not inclined to do so.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Seven tons would be the average on a trailer. The trailers might have been on the piece of ground at the foot of Bree-street. It might happen that the trailer man might not be on the spot to take the delivery note, and the consignee's men would then have to wait. The Harbour Board regulations allowed a maximum time of discharge, and witness could penalise if 54 tons per day were not taken in one store door. The consignees could order three cargoes to different doors. The defendants should have opened up other points to receive the cargo.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: On one occasion Mr. Attwell complained to him of having to wait on the Harbour Board's men. The cause of delay was that the plaintiffs had too much grain at the same time.

John William Hairbottle, quay superintendent of the West Quay, said that the entries in the log book were made by his instructions. In the return put in he obtained the information, "Milling Company blocked," or "Artois Siding blocked," from Mr. McGregor or Mr. Metcalfe.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He put down the weather according to his own judgment. April 23 was a rainy day, and although there was not a single bag taken out on April 20, he had it marked "fine" in the log. He would not swear that April 18, 19, 20, and 21 were all fine days.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: The delay through broken gear was not worth speaking of.

Robert Thomson, the quay superintendent of the North Quay, stated that he was in charge of the quay when the Crown of Denmark was being discharged. Any instructions which would have been given as regards the South African Milling Company not being able to take in the cargo would have been issued by the outdoor superintendent, Mr. McGregor.

Thomas Metcalfe, goods superintendent at the Docks, stated that he was in charge of the despatch of cargo by rail, Four trucks were despatched on 21st, and seven on 28th, to Artois Siding. Mr. Patterson, the Assistant Traffic Manager of the C.G.R., told witness that twenty-four trucks had already been discharged at Artois Siding. Witness told the manager of the Milling Company, on Saturday, 25, to have facilities for unloading at the siding, because a train load was being sent down the following day. Subsequently Mr. Patterson went so far as to request witness not to send down more trucks, as the line at the siding was becoming blocked. Arrangements were then made that no further wheat should be despatched, as the S.A. Milling Company were unable to take in the wheat. Notwithstanding that, witness offered to send a special train down. He asked a Mr. Wood to make arrangements to have the train unloaded, but Mr. Wood afterwards admitted that he had not made such arrangements. Witness received a telephone message from the Milling Company not to send any more, as there was a large number of trucks waiting to be unloaded at Artois Siding. Witness could have sent a much larger quantity, but that the Railway Department would not supply the trucks, because several consignees had been ordering more goods than they could take in, with the result that the trucks were detained under load at the station.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Mr. Wood acknowledged in the presence of Mr. Steven that he had made no arrangements to off-load the special train on Sunday. Witness could not say if the train did reach Artois on Sunday; it was loaded at the Docks ready for despatch. Witness could not remember the exact words, but Mr. Steven told him that the siding at Artois was blocked, and that it would be useless to send forward any more wheat for a week.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: There was no delay on the part of the Harbour Board in the despatch of the wheat.

James Patterson, assistant traffic manager on the Western System, said that he saw Mr. Steven along with Mr. Metcalfe on the 27th April. Witness pointed out that the loop at Artois Siding was blocked with wheat, and the defendant company were not discharging as quickly as the wheat was being tendered. On the 21st April twenty-four trucks blocked the line.

Mr. Steven said that the Harbour Board were sending up more trucks than he could deal with. Witness pointed out that as the defendants were not keeping up with the discharge that the Harbour authorities would have to stop the ship. If the trucks had been off-loaded within twenty-four hours, there would have been no scarcity. Mr. Steven agreed when witness said that no more trucks would be sent up to Artois for a week. At Mr. Steven's suggestion witness sent a wire to the foreman to urge the manager there to facilitate the off-loading. The manager was instructed to employ more native labour. The block at Artois continued right into June.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He would not say that the Milling Co. off-loaded more expeditiously than any other country siding. The Railway Department sent down whatever trucks were available to the Harbour Board, and by the end of April there was no particular scarcity of trucks. Witness stopped the supply to Artois because the defendant company could not cope with the supply.

Joseph McGregor, outdoor superintendent at the Docks, said that he got instructions from Captain Leigh when to stop the discharge of cargoes. The only reason for stopping the Crown of Denmark was Captain Leigh's statement that the defendant company were unable to cope with the grain.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Witness had no knowledge of the circumstances himself. Two hundred and fifty tons per day would be reasonable for the Harbour Board to take out of the Crown of Denmark. It was possible to accomplish that. The customary rate of discharge was about 200 tons per day.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: A general cargo would be discharged much slower than a special cargo which had to be sorted out.

Auguste Fock, in the employment of the Harbour Board, stated that he was the person who prepared the return (produced) of the tonnage discharged from each grain ship in the port, during the first six months of the year.

Alexander McRae stated that he made out the return (produced) from the return put in by the previous witness. The return showed the discharge of grain vessels of over 200 tons, from January to June.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Witness allowed for Sundays and holidays in his calculations. Saturday was treated as a full working day, and calculated as such.

Robert William Clark stated that he was employed in the cartage superintendent's office, of the Harbour Board. He made out the return (produced) showing the number of trailers supplied to the Milling Company.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The return was prepared from the book which is kept, and at the Dock gates, and the book kept by the Milling Co. at their premises. From the times at which the 32 trucks, shown in the return as being supplied to the Milling Co., passed through the Dock gates, until the times taken from the Milling Co. book, the trailers must have been standing under load somewhere.

George West stated that he made the entries in the book referred to by the last witness as being kept at the Dock gates.

Mr. Searle closed his case.

For the defence, Mr. Schreiner called Richard Attwell, who stated that he was employed in the defendant company, and was in charge of the flour mill in Bree-street. There were several stores, but the wheat of the Crown of Denmark had been deposited in the open square. Three of the stores had a capacity of 21,000, 18,000, and 15,000 sacks, while 50,000 sacks could be put in the open square. Of the total of 1,874 bags received in the store on the 1st April, 538 were from the Crown of Denmark, and there was no scarcity of trailers then. It was not true that the defendant company were unable to take the wheat from the trailers, neither was it true that the mill was full up. The trailers off-loaded as fast as they came up, and on many occasions there was no man accompanying them to give delivery. The Harbour Board often left their trailers without any delivery notes, and on some occasions there was delay in taking the empty trailers away. When the Harbour Board's delivery was in order, there was no delay on the part of the defendant company. The men were good, hard workers, and in off-loading they could earn in piece work about fifteen shillings a day. In April last there was room in the stores. In putting the wheat of the Crown of Denmark outside it rather facilitated matters for the Harbour Board. On the day on which the letter of complaint was received, 1,245 bags had been taken into the stores from the Crown of Denmark.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: Between March 31 and April 11, 1,576 bags of wheat were received from the Osborne. It was not a usual thing for the firm to have three ships discharging at the same time. The Harbour Board were pressing to have more wheat taken in, and so the Board lent the assistance of a gang of men. A delay in taking away the empty trailers would impede the delivery. Witness admitted that he had been asked to take the wheat in faster.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He had received 22,000 bags from one of the three ships. Witness often complained about the trailers being allowed to stand in the street. About 800 bags per day were ground, so that the quantity in the stores was daily reduced by that amount.

Matthew Irving, Quay Superintendent, in the employ of the Harbour Board, said he took the details of the discharge of the steamer Inverie, which worked on Sundays. The tonnage returns appeared in fifties and hundreds, and that was caused through getting as near the number of bags as possible, although it was not strictly correct. The exact returns were given in the case of sailing vessels.

George Taylor Nicholson said that he had the observations of the rainfall at the Docks, which were taken in the draughting office. The record was taken at 9.30 a.m., and would show the rainfall for the preceding 24 hours.

Andrew McKenzie said he had been connected with shipping at the port from 1867 to 1901. Previous to 1901 he was contractor under the Act for the Board. During his time he had to take the cargo from the ship, irrespective of any action of the consignee. The ships were never stopped discharging. For a ship of 2,000 tons and upwards, the average would be quite up to 300 tons a day. He would rather not give an opinion as to the Harbour Board's working at the Docks since he left, but they had been changing and making regulations since 1901, and the officials at the Docks just did what they thought fit. He might say something now not up to the mark, and he would rather not.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: Rather than stop the ship, he thought it better to bring even grain back and stack it in the open, if the consignee could not receive it.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The Harbour Board had abundant ground to stack in the open if the stores were full.

Alex. James Robb, Assistant General Manager of Railways, said he remembered the block at Artois Siding in April, and it was reported to him that the ship was discharging more rapidly than they could cope with. Subsequently he found that the Chief Traffic Manager had been misinformed with regard to the congestion at Artois Siding. The consignee had no control as to the trucks.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: The ship was not stopped in consequence of the Railway Department's action.

James Steven, manager and resident director of the Cape Town branch of the S.A Milling Co., said that last year they paid close on £8,000 dock dues. This was the only case in Cape Town in which a claim had been made against the company. He did not remember the company ever paying a fine for the detention of trucks. Mr. Attwell gave a correct statement as to the facilities at the Bree-street mill. They recognised it was better to have a quick discharge, and the stevedores had a free hand with regard to engaging men. An extra gang had been put on at the time of the Crown of Denmark to cope with the discharge. They milled considerable quantities, and very often the cargo was immediately put into the hoppers. Eighty to ninety tons would not be an excessive amount to mill in one day. He had facilities to receive the 15.000 bags with reasonable despatch at Cape Town. They had abundant open space. Since Friday he had been to Artois Siding to make inquiries as to what took place in April last. At that time the stores had only six weeks' supply of wheat in hand, and that induced him to transfer the cargo to Artois. The gang of extra men had been employed before he got the letter from Captain Leigh. There was never any complaint of Artois being blocked. Trucks were used instead of trailers for the discharge of certain class of cargo within the Municipality. On the day of the complaint by Captain Leigh he had taken 1,200 bags into the Bree-street mill. Messrs. Metcalfe and Patterson interviewed witness and assumed that the defendant firm were not unloading with sufficient dispatch at Artois. Witness had no recollection of agreeing that nothing should be sent forward for a week until a special train had left. He assumed that Mr. Patterson was acquainted with the facts of the case, and witness then wired his people to impress on them the importance of clearing the reported congestion. Witness had no knowledge of his own as to anything out of the ordinary at the Artois Siding. Subsequently the railway officials found they had been inaccurately informed, and the ship recommenced unloading on May 1. The large iron trucks were not so speedy in discharge as manual labour could not move them, and he had Mr. Patterson's promise that no more of them would be sent up. Witness thought the Harbour Board should not have stopped the ship, but should have gone on and made a charge if necessary against the consignees. Apart from regulations, and as a matter of custom, he would say that the rate of discharge would not be as given. Wheat could not be discharged in wet weather. He would say that the discharge in this case was something in excess of the custom of the port. He tried to facilitate matters with Mr. Mellish as much as possible. He knew of no instance of trailers having been kept waiting at the stores.

By De Villiers, C.J.: Had witness only been dealing with the Crown of Denmark, the discharge would have been faster. It was not for any length of time that he was working more than one ship.

By Mr. Schreiner: The trailers were discharged by the defendants quicker than most people. Then, again, the Municipality regulations delayed them.

By Mr. Justice Kotzé: He did not think they would be justified in working overtime to cope with the pressure.

By Mr. Schreiner: It was not customary for the trailers to convey cargo during the night to consignees. Until the trailers were brought to the door he submitted that the consignees were not responsible. The Harbour Board should bring the cargo back and stack it.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: A good many grain ships had been consigned to witness recently; nearly half of the total number which had entered the Bay. The Ernest Reyer and the Crown of Denmark were being discharged to witness's store up to the 21st. Captain Leigh wrote stating he had been obliged to stop the discharge from these owing to so many trailers being under load with the cargo. There were always trailers under load. Witness did not think 20 or 30 trailers were an unusual number to be under load. Witness considered the Harbour Board should not put so many trailers under load; the goods should be stored. Witness did not know the Board did not have storage. The Board had always stored grain from other ships consigned to witness, and he did not know why in this instance they should have departed from the practice. At this time the Harbour Board had unfortunately pulled down their old stores preparatory to building larger ones. There was a great difficulty about getting men to work overtime. The Harbour Board had supplied witness with men; this was for the convenience of the Harbour Board. At the time the discharge of the Crown of Denmark commenced, Mr. Mellish suggested to witness that there should be another point of delivery. He urged witness to take Harbour Board ground for stacking, but witness chose his own stacking ground, as the Harbour Board charges were so enormous. Elevators could not be used at the present stores of the company, as at Port Elizabeth, but the matter of installing elevators in the new premises was under consideration. The quantity of grain taken in during the last six months had been exceptionally large, this being due to circumstances over which the company had no control.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Short of having elevators, for which a railway siding was required, the company had the best appliances. The Harbour Board had plenty of ground on which to stack.

Frederick William Dunn, inside manager of the defendant company's stores, stated that for the sole storage of grain there were seven or eight stores in Cape Town. The stores had a respective capacity of eighteen, fifteen, twelve, twelve, ten, twenty-one, nine, and two thousand bags, and the yard would hold fifty thousand. On the first day of discharge the bags were brought direct to the mill, and broadly the same capacity would be going out. In isolated cases there might be a delay of five minutes with the defendant company. There was no intimation of when trailers might arrive, and it was a serious delay when the Harbour Board's man did not produce the wagon notes. Should the mule wagon not be convenient, the empties might be delayed all day. There was no delay on account of the stores being full. There was capacity in the yard for thirty thousand bags. Stacking in the open was quite a usual thing in this country. It was usual for a consignee to have two or three cargoes being discharged at the same time. He was satisfied that the return made up by Mr. Attwell was correct. The return showed that there was abundant storage.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: Previous to the Crown of Denmark they had had two cargoes running at the same time. Mr. Mellish and other Harbour Board officials spoke to him about hurrying things along. They could comfortably take in 300 tons a day, but, with the limited hours, they could not keep up with the regulations in discharging both ships. It was a usual thing for trailers to lie at the bottom of Adderley-street.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: There was time wasted every day when the trailers had to wait for an engine.

Wm. Costert, in the employ of the Corporation, produced a return of rain gauges. On the 20th April rain started from two o'clock in the morning and lasted till the evening of the same day.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: The rainfall at the reservoir varied very much from that of Cape Town.

J. W. Herbert said that the reason the discharge was not quite so good now as it was in McKenzie's time was that the Harbour Board exercised the right of stopping discharge. It was his opinion that the Board should store the cargo, but there was no reason why it should not be stacked at present in the open.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (for plaintiff): Clauses 13 and 14 of the Charter party are the most important; they are as follows. No. 13: "Vessel to be cleared at the Custom House at Portland and Astoria, in the name of the charterers. The Master to report to charterers, or their agents immediately on arrival of the vessel at port of discharge, and enter the vessel at the Custom House in their name. Vessel to discharge afloat with dispatch according to the Custom of the port of discharge; cargo to be delivered at ship's tackles. All literage to be at the expense and risk of receivers of cargo, except in case of average when lighterage shall be borne by whom it may concern. Discharge to be all at one port, unless otherwise provided. The holders of bills of lading, representing the greater portion of the cargo are to be entitled to name the discharging dock, provided they avail themselves of this privilege within 24 hours after the arrival of the vessel is notified to charterers' agents by the Master or his agents, and the dock to be one into which the vessel can safely enter at next high water, and commence to discharge without unreasonable delay, and where she can safely lie at all times, and provided vessel is not thereby compelled to lie in an unsafe anchorage waiting for docking orders. Captain to be entitled to employ his own broker at port of discharge."

No. 14: ". . . . . It is also agreed that for each and every day's demurrage or detention at port of call, the shipowners shall have a lien on cargo for all freight, detention, demurrage, and dead freight, if any, but upon shipment ment of the cargo and acceptance by the master, and on settlement of dead freight, if any, or of any freight not represented by bills of lading, and of demurrage, if any, at port of loading, charterers shall be deemed to have fulfilled this charter party, and shall be under no liability thereafter, under any provisions hereof, for any matters, past or future, or for any loss, damage, or other claim for breach of charter party." These are the clauses which touch the method of discharge. The bill of lading incorporates the charter party. In this case there is no fixed number of days for discharge; the discharge was to be within reasonable time. See Carver (Sec. 616 (a), p. 702, 3rd edit.). The consignee is not liable if the dock authorities do the work of discharge, unless he is guilty of negligence.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But see Postlewaite v. Freeland (49 L.J., Ex., 630, and 5 Ap., Cas., 599).]

I was going to refer to that, but I do not wish to introduce cases in which a time limit was fixed. Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co. (4 Exch., D., 165) is a case in point. See also Ashcroft v. Crow Orchard Co. (9 L.R., Q.B., 540). That was a loading case, but the same principles apply to discharge. There there was a question of self-imposed liability. See also Tillet and Others v. Coombe Avon Works (2 Times L. Rep., 675), where the cases I have previously mentioned are commented on. There the principle is laid down that if no time is fixed, the ship must discharge within a reasonable time, and the term "reasonable time" must be interpreted by the circumstances of the port. The same principle is laid down in Carlton Steamshipping Co. v. Castle Mail Packets Co. (66 L.J., Q.B., 819), Hick v. Raymond (H.L. Appeals, 1893, p. 22). The same principle is laid down in Good v. Isaacs (Q.B., 1892, Vol. 2, 555). The only question is whether the time has been extended by the Act, or default of the consignee. Now then to apply these principles of law. This vessel took 43 days to discharge, and of these, 43 days, 35 were working days. It appears from the stevedore's evidence that the vessel was stopped during 12 days from discharging. The vessel was well found, and the stevedore was not in fault; but the consignees had another vessel consigned to them, and nearly 3,000 tons out of a third vessel. This was a very exceptional circumstance. Mr. Stevens admits that he did not expect these three cargoes to be thrust upon him at the same time. On May 15, the captain complained of the slow discharge, and stated that between May 1 and May 15 only three days' work had been done. It must be remembered that the weather was fine during the whole of this time. Less than 100 tons a day were discharged, whereas McKenzie says that 200 tons would be a reasonable amount.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Ought you not to allow Saturday as a half day?]

That is quite a new point. By 200 tons a day we mean 200 tons a day on an average for all the working days. On one day—and that a Saturday—176 tons were discharged. My contention is that the lay days expired on April 22.

[De Villiers, C.J.: How many wet days do you allow for?]

I am not allowing for any wet days. There is no evidence of any wet weather during that time save on April 12. I am willing to allow for two days, and to take the demurrage as running from April 24 to May 12. We have nothing to do with the Harbour Board, and take our stand on the Charter Party. Steven practically admitted that the delay was owing to the fact that the company had three vessels discharging at the same time, and Atwell admits that Mellish frequently complained of the slow discharge. It was a common thing for from twenty to thirty trailers to be kept waiting at defendant's place for discharge. The cause of delay was that defendants had only two doors by which they could take the wheat into their stores. Then, the fact that the Harbour Board lent labourers to plaintiffs proves that the plaintiffs had not sufficient labour. It is true that the Harbour Board has not fined defendant, but that proves nothing.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for the defendant): Before replying to the argument, I should wish to discuss what are the customs of the port of Cape Town. In discussing this point, we must look closely into the position of the Harbour Board and their regulations. The Harbour Board is a statutory body under Act 26 of 1896. The Harbour Board has confined to itself the landing of cargo. See Harbour Board Regulations (No. 6 p., section 7). See also p. 36, which shows that this work is done for reward. The Harbour Board does not await directions from the consignee before discharging cargo. See regulation 15 (p. 12) of Harbour Board. It is the duty of the Harbour Board to duly discharge a ship which it has once berthed. See regulation 35 (p 14). If the consignee does not duly take delivery a fine of sixpence per ton is imposed; he is also charged for storage, and the goods lie at his risk. All these provisions are portions of the custom of the port. In this case the captain has mistaken his remedy. If the Harbour Board has failed in its duty to duly discharge he should have sued the Harbour Board. If the Board had done its duty there would have been no demurrage. The Harbour Board should have put down the wheat where they could.

[Kotzé, J.: The captain addressed himself direct to the consignee.]

Yes, but he mistook his position. We had no control over the discharge of the vessel, and we say that the Harbour Board had no right to stop the discharge.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Of course, the Harbour Board must do its duty; but the point is, could the charterer have overcome these difficulties by reasonable diligence. We cannot condemn the Harbour Board: it is not before us.]

I do not ask that. Captain Lee's conduct caused the demurrage. He stopped the discharge because he was not satisfied with the rate at which the consignee was taking delivery.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Did not your negligence cause him to act as he did?]

No, we did not cause him to act in that way, though our not taking delivery as quickly as he wanted may have been his motive. It is for the plaintiff to show that we directly caused the demurrage, not that our negligence (if any) induced somebody else to cause it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The point is, could the defendants by the exercise of due diligence have unloaded the trailers as they arrived?]

I submit not; they had three ships discharging at the same time, but surely that was no offence, and no proof of negligence.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Was it not the duty of the defendants to provide means and a sufficient number of men to enable them to take delivery?]

I submit not. They dealt with every trailer as it arrived, and they could do no more. The defendants have shown they have not omitted anything they could possibly do to take speedy delivery, and therefore they cannot be held responsible for demurrage.

Mr. Searle: Plaintiff's counsel takes into account twenty days, and assumes that there was no demurrage. The utmost that could be allowed for were four Sundays and four Saturdays. Plaintiff's counsel says that Saturday should count as half a day. One hundred and fifty tons landed per day is an average for the whole week, and on one particular Saturday they even discharged 176 tons; it would, therefore, be absurd to say that 150 tons is a reasonable average per diem. They are not entitled to a deduction of more than fourteen days in any case. There were only two wet days; it has been said there were four, but the rain gauge at the Docks only showed two. As to the shortage of trucks, I cannot admit that we are responsible for that.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why need you go into that?]

It has been argued that some days should be taken off on that account.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I am not taking off any.]

Then I will leave that point. In questions of demurrage you cannot divide days. See Carver (section 631) and Scrutton (p. 240). The average of 150 tons includes wet days and Saturdays. Hence wet days should not be taken off. If the Court is of opinion that 150, and not 200 tons should be taken as a reasonable rate of discharge, the demurrage will work out at eleven days.

Mr. Schreiner: We are surely entitled to some consideration on account of the shortage of trucks.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (August 24).

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an action brought by the master of the ship Crown of Denmark to recover from the defendants the amount of demurrage alleged to be due by them for their delay in taking delivery of a cargo of wheat consigned to them. The charter party provided that the discharge at Cape Town Dock should be according to the custom and facilities of the port of discharge, and that for each day's detention 3d. per register ton, or its equivalent, should be paid by the holders of the bills of lading or their agents. The registered tonnage of the ship was 1,987 tons, and the total quantity of wheat consigned was 3,407 Cape tons. She arrived in Table Bay on the 24th of March last, and commenced to discharge her cargo at 1.30 p.m. on the 31st of March. The landing of goods in the port is done exclusively by the Harbour Board, in the exercise of powers conferred on it by Statute. On the 1st of April the Dock Superintendent wrote to the defendant as follows: "I have the honour to point out that owing to the large number of trailers we have at present under load with wheat for your store, I have been compelled to stop the landing from the ships Ernest Reyer and Crown of Denmark. I trust you will see your way to do all you possibly can to expedite the off-loading of these trailers." No answer was sent to this letter, and on April 14 the Dock Superintendent again wrote calling attention to the fact that the discharge of the Crown of Denmark had been stopped on that day, and would be stopped on the following day, owing to the number of trailers still under load for the defendants' stores. On April 15 the plaintiff himself wrote to the defendants, bringing to their notice that his ship was being detained through their failing to take delivery of the cargo, and giving them notice that, unless delivery was taken at the customary rate, viz., 200 tons per working day, demurrage would be claimed. In their reply to the Dock Superintendent's letter, the defendants say: "We are receivng wheat from the Docks, and unloading the wagons with all reasonable despatch and considerably within the time limit you give us," and in their reply to the plaintiff's letter, they say, "Orders for the delivery of the whole of your cargo have been placed with the Harbour Board authorities, as you would have ascertained had you made any inquiries at our office." This last statement does not appear to be quite correct, for several of the landing and delivery warrants produced at the trial bear a later date than the letter, but the point is of no importance, for the question to be decided is not whether the orders for the delivery of the cargo had been given in due time, but whether the delay in the actual landing and delivery of the cargo was attributable in whole or in part to want of diligence on the part of the defendants. Until April 20 the defendants received delivery of the cargo from the Harbour Board trailers at their stores in Cape Town. Mr. Mellish, the Cartage Superintendent of the Board, stated in his evidence that when the discharge of the Crown of Denmark was commenced, there were two other cargoes being delivered to the defendants' stores, and that, in consequence, there was a congestion of loaded trailers there. He added that only a limited number of trailers could be placed opposite the doors of the stores at one time, and that the rest were standing at the nearest available place. Mr. Attwell, who was the first witness called for the defendants, admitted that Mr. Mellish had often complained about the slow rate at which they were taking delivery, "but," he added, "I know the man; he complains without cause." Mr. Stephen, however, the manager of the defendants, who gave his evidence with great fairness and perfect candour, said that it was part of Mr. Mellish's duty to be constantly complaining, and that he should be admired for it. Both of these witnesses throw the blame of the slow delivery on the Harbour Board, whose trailers, they say, were not promptly removed after they had been emptied, and which sometimes had no one in charge to give delivery of the wheat. The Court is satisfied from the evidence that, whatever impediments may have been placed by the Harbour Board in the way of the prompt discharge of the cargo, the defendants might by the use of reasonable diligence have overcome. It may be quite true, as Mr. Attwell said, that the defendants off-loaded the trailers as fast as they came up, but it is clear from the evidence that the trailers would on many days have come up much faster than they did if the defendants had more doors through which to receive the wheat and more labourers to unload, or if they had supplied their stores in Cape Town with mechanical appliances, such as they had at Port Elizabeth, for expediting the unloading of trailers. On April 20 the defendants directed the remainder of the cargo to be sent to Artois Siding. There was some delay in the discharge of the trucks, in consequence of which the Docks Superintendent gave instructions to stop the discharge of the ship temporarily, but the defendants deny that they were responsible for the delay at Artois Siding, and the evidence of the Assistant Traffic Manager appears to support their denial. The question whether the Railway Department or the defendants are to blame for the delay at Artois Siding is a question between those parties, and cannot affect the rights of the plaintiff as representing the owners of the ship. For the purpose of the present case it is sufficient to say that when a hitch occurred in the prompt despatch of trucks from Cape Town to Artois Siding, the defendants gave no instructions to send the wheat to their stores in Cape Town instead of sending it to Artois Siding. The result was that the discharge of the cargo was not completed until the 12th of May. There is a dispute between the parties as to the number of working days between March 31 and May 1, but the Court is satisfied that, allowing for Sundays, whole holidays, half holidays, rainy days, and days on which the plaintiff was prevented from discharging cargo without any fault on the defendant's part, or eleven in all, the number of working days between those dates was twenty. The summons asks for demurrage until May 5, but the parties have agreed, through their counsel, that the pleadings should be so amended as to embrace a claim for demurrage up to May 12.

The defence raised by the plea is that the defendants were at all times ready and willing to receive, and did receive, without delay, all such portions of the cargo as the Harbour Board, in the exercise of its absolute powers and discretion, did from time to time deliver to them. Their counsel has, however, gone somewhat further in his argument. He contends that the Board was guilty of illegality in delaying, and at times stopping the discharge of the cargo, and that the plaintiff's remedy for any damages he may have suffered is against the Board and not against the defendants. The Board is not before the Court, and, in the view which I take of this case, it is unnecessary to say anything as to its liability. The question to be decided is whether the defendants are liable in this action for demurrage whatever degree of blame or liability might attach to the Harbour Board. I quite assent to the view that the defendants' obligation to unload can only be ascertained by reference to the customs and facilities of the port of Table Bay, and that they should not suffer for any delay occasioned wholly by the Harbour Board. The law on the point was definitely stated by the Lord Chancellor (Lord Selborne) in the House of Lords in 1880, in the case of Postlethwaite v. Freeland (5 A.C., 608), in the following terms: "If an obligation, indefinite as to time, is qualified or partially defined by express or implied reference to the custom or practice of a particular port, every impediment arising from or out of that custom or practice, which the charterer could not have overcome by the use of reasonable diligence, ought to be taken into consideration." There have been several variations in subsequent cases upon this statement of the law, but they all agree in this, that the charterer cannot avail himself of any self-imposed liability or of any difficulty placed by others in the way of prompt discharge, which he might have overcome by the exercise of reasonable diligence. In the analogous case, where the obligation is imposed on the consignee to unload in a reasonable time, a similar principle has been adopted. In the case of Hick v. Raymond and Reid (A.C., 1892, p. 29) in the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor (Lord Herschell) said: "It appears to me that the only sound principle is that the 'reasonable time' should depend on the circumstances which actually exist. If the cargo has been taken with all reasonable despatch under these circumstances I think the obligation of the consignee has been fulfilled. When I say the circumstances which actually exist, I, of course, imply that those circumstances, in so far as they involve delay, have not been caused or contributed to by the consignee." In the present case the Harbour Board, which has the sole and exclusive control over the landing of goods from ships, had only a limited number of trailers at their disposal, and although it may have been the duty of the Board to provide sheds for goods which consignees could not take with sufficient despatch, it cannot be held to have been guilty of illegality in regulating the discharge of goods by the number of vehicles at its disposal. The means and appliances employed by the defendants for receiving delivery of the cargo of the Crown of Denmark would have been amply sufficient if that had been the only cargo which was being unloaded for them. Unfortunately for them, and possibly without their fault, several cargoes were being unloaded for them at the same time, and the appliances which they actually possessed were wholly inadequate to the emergency. The shipowner might reasonably have expected from the defendants that they would make provision for an emergency which they ought to have foreseen. By not using reasonable diligence to counteract the effects of the Board's remissness, if any, they must be held to have contributed to the delay, and this want of diligence existed after as well as before April 18. When they found that the Harbour Board failed or refused to send a sufficient number of truck loads to Artois Siding, they ought to have directed delivery in Cape Town and provided the means and appliances for dealing with the large quantities of wheat that were being unloaded for them by different ships.. It may be quite true that the Board ought to have provided sheds at the Docks for the storage of goods which the consignees could not receive with sufficient promptitude, and ought to have employed a sufficient number of vehicles for removing the goods as fast as the ships in the port could discharge them. On the other hand, the defendants, having several cargoes of wheat consigned o them, ought to have provided the means and appliances for receiving delivery as fast as the Board could deliver the wheat. Having contributed to the delay by their want of diligence, they are liable for the detention of the ship beyond the time when, with the exercise of reasonable diligence under the circumstances which actually existed, they might have taken delivery of the whole of the cargo, notwithstanding any remissness in the performance of its duties by the Harbour Board. With reasonable diligence they could have obtained delivery at the rate of at least 150 tons a day. At that rate the whole of the cargo would have been landed in twenty working days, and the discharge would have been completed on May 1. The discharge was not completed until May 12, and taking the rate agreed upon by the parties, viz., threepence per register ton, as the measure of damages for each day's detention, the judgment of the Court must be for £273 4s. 3d., with costs.

Kotzé, J.: The ship Crown of Denmark, with a cargo consisting of 29,800 sacks of wheat, entered the Cape Town Docks on the 30th March last, and commenced to discharge on the following day. The plaintiff's case is that the discharge of the whole cargo consigned to the S.A. Milling Company could have been completed in seventeen days, but that owing to the neglect and delay of the company to receive due and prompt delivery of cargo the ship did not complete the discharge until the 12th May. Demurrage is, therefore, claimed at the rate of 3d. per ton or £24 6s. 9d. per day for each day from the 21st April to the 12th May inclusive, amounting to the sum of £496 15s. In answer to this claim the Milling Company contends that the discharge and delivery of all cargo is under the sole and absolute control of the Table Bay Harbour Board, an independent statutory body, and that the Milling Company did at all times receive without any delay on its part all such portions of cargo as the Harbour Board in the exercise of its powers and discretion from time to time thought fit to deliver. It will be necessary to refer to the charter party, which embodies the contract between the parties. The charter party provides that the discharge of the vessel at Cape Town is to be according to the custom and facilities of the port of discharge, but beyond that it is silent as to the time or number of days within which the unloading or discharge of the cargo is to take place. This being so, the law implies an agreement to discharge the cargo within a reasonable time, and what is a reasonable time must be judged of, not according to ordinary circumstances, but to actual and existing circumstances, including the custom and facilities of the port. For reasonable time is not an abstract, but a relative expression, and must be interpreted according to the actual circumstances, in considering which the custom and facilities of the port of discharge must also be taken into account, especially where, as in the present instance, the charter party contains a clause to that effect. In speaking of the duty of the shipowner and charterer in this respect, Lord Selborne, L.C., observes: "If an obligation to load or unload, indefinite as to time, is qualified or partly defined by express or implied reference to the custom or practice of a particular port, every impediment arising from or out of that custom or practice, which the charterer or shipowner could not have overcome by the use of reasonable diligence, ought to be taken into consideration." Postlethwaite v. Freeland (1880) (5 App. Ca., 608). And more recently Lord Herschell, L.C., says: "The only sound principle is that reasonable time should depend on the circumstances which actually exist. If the cargo has been taken with all reasonable despatch, under those circumstances I think the obligation of the consignee has been fulfilled. When I say the circumstances which actually exist, I, of course, imply that those circumstances, in so far as they involve delay, have not been caused or contributed to by the consignee." Hick v. Raymond (1893), (App. Ca., 29). In that case it was held by the House of Lords, affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal, that the consignees were not liable for delay to the shipowner caused by a strike of dock labourers. No actual decision of the English Courts was cited holding a consignee liable for demurrage by reason of his neglect to take due and prompt delivery of the cargo. But it is plain that the ordinary rule as to liability for negligence must apply to such a case, and this also clearly follows from the cases in the House of Lords to which I have referred.

It seems to me that in the present instance two material questions arise for consideration: (1) What are the custom and facilities of the port so far as the discharge of cargo is concerned; and (2) did the consignee do everything proper and necessary to take discharge in the customary manner; or, in other words, has he done everything that could reasonably be expected of him under the circumstances? The evidence shows that, as soon as a ship is berthed in the Cape Town Docks, the Harbour Board, which is an independent statutory body, takes the sole control of the discharge and delivery of the cargo. The Board acts in a double capacity. It does the work of unloading for the shipowner, and when the cargo leaves the ship's side it acts in the delivery of the cargo for the consignee. The consignee furnishes the Harbour Board with delivery warrants, stating where the cargo is to be delivered, and the delivery is then effected either by means of trailers or by means of railway trucks. The storing accommodation in sheds, except for a general cargo, appears to be very limited at the Docks, and no stacking of cargo is allowed on the quay. In so far as the cargo of grain in the Crown of Denmark was concerned, the consignees gave directions for the bulk of the cargo to be delivered at their stores in Bree-street, and for a portion to be sent by rail to Artois Siding. The discharge of the cargo began on the 31st March, and from the commencement the receipt of delivery was unsatisfactory. On the 1st April the Dock Superintendent wrote to the defendant company, drawing its attention to the large number of Harbour Board trailers under load with wheat for the company's stores, and pointed out that in consequence of this he had been compelled to stop the landing from the ships Ernest Reyer and Crown of Denmark, and trusted the company would do all it possible could to expedite the off-loading of the trailers. To this letter no reply was sent, nor does it appear that any steps were taken by the defendant company to remove the cause of the complaint. On the 14th April a letter of similar import had again to be addressed to the company, so far as the Crown of Denmark was concerned. The company was receiving delivery of cargo in the early days of April from three vessels, including the Crown of Denmark, and the evidence has satisfied me that the company did not do all that it might, and ought to have done to cope with this temporary pressure. It apparently had sufficient storage, and nothing was easier than to have employed extra gangs of men, and to have worked overtime, instead of keeping the trailers loaded with sacks of wheat waiting to be off-loaded. In this way the pressure would have been relieved and the delivery expedited. It was the duty of the consignee to have done this. I am likewise satisfied that there was a block of railway trucks loaded with wheat at Artois Siding, and that this was due to the failure of the consignee to engage extra labour to off-load these trucks. It is also proved that when the Goods Superintendent at the Docks arranged with a representative of the defendant company to send on a special train-load of wheat to Artois, the latter omitted to carry out the necessary arrangements for the purpose. The defence set up by the company, that it can not control the Harbour Board, and that it did all it possibly could to receive delivery, as the Harbour Board was ready to make it from time to time, has, in my opinion, not been made out. This is not an instance where the delay has been caused by some circumstance beyond the control of the consignee; such as a strike of dock labourers, or the independent action of the local authority, as was the case in Good v. Isaacs (1892, Q.B.D., 555). The Harbour Board may have been wrong in stopping the discharge of the cargo, that is a point upon which I do not at present desire to express any opinion. The conduct of the company, as consignee, in not taking prompt delivery when the Harbour Board exercised despatch and sent forward the trailers loaded with grain, was the reason why the discharge of the cargo was stopped, and the causa causans of the delay, and the consequent detention of the ship. By the use of reasonable diligence on the part of the consignee all this could have been easily prevented and overcome. The delay, therefore, to use the language of Lord Herschel, has been caused and contributed to by the consignee, and he cannot over against the shipowner avail himself of any alleged wrongful circumstance on the part of the Harbour Board, which has been brought about by his conduct, and could have been provided against and remedied by him.

It is said on behalf of the plaintiff that 200 tons or 1,600 sacks of wheat per day could easily, according to the custom and facilities of the port, have been discharged from a ship like the Crown of Denmark, that is, working only one hatch. The captain states that although he did not use more than one hatch, he had two out of three hatches ready rigged for the purpose of unloading, and by working two gangs, for which he had arranged, he could readily have put out 300 tons daily. I must say there is certainly a good deal of evidence to show that, regard being had to the facilities and custom of the port, a discharge of 200 tons a day would be a reasonable quantity to unload from a ship like the Crown of Denmark. As a matter of fact, on five or six days the ship did discharge over 200 tons, that is, over 1,600 bags per day. But, upon the whole, I think it best to be guided by the list which has been put in, giving the number of ships which have discharged a cargo of over two thousand tons of grain at the Cape Town Docks between the 1st January and 30th June, 1903. This list shows the average to be from 150 to 160 tons per day, and gives the average discharge of the Crown of Denmark at only 104 tons per day. The ship had a total tonnage of 3,642, and took thirty-five working days to discharge. Now, taking a daily average of 150 tons, the discharge ought to have been completed in twenty-four working days. This leaves eleven days, for which the shipowner is entitled to demurrage at £24 16s. 9d. per day, or £273 4s. 3d. in all. There should, therefore, be judgment in favour of the plaintiff for that amount, with costs.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

HEYNES, MATHEW AND CO. V. ZWEIGENHAGT. { 1903. Aug. 7th.

Sale—To whom was credit given.

Goods were supplied to a business carried on under the style of Godfrey & Co., upon condition that the defendant should be regarded as principal in the purchase of the goods.

Held, that credit was given to the defendant as principal debtor, and that he was liable to the plaintiffs for the price of the goods.

This was an action brought by Heynes, Mathew and Co., wholesale chemists and druggists, Cape Town, to recover £336 0s. 4d. from Louis Zweigenhagt, chemist and druggist, Cape Town, for goods sold and delivered.

The declaration set out that the plaintiffs had supplied to the defendant, trading under the style or firm of Godfrey and Co., goods to the amount of £336 0s. 4d., and the defendant neglected or refused to pay such sum. The plaintiffs prayed for judgment for this amount, with interest a tempore morae, and costs of suit.

The defendant in his plea, admitted who the parties were, but denied the other allegations in the declaration, specially denying that he carried on business as a chemist and druggist under the style or firm of Godfrey and Co. He denied that he was indebted to the plaintiffs in any sum whatever. The defendants had not sold or delivered any goods to him, and he had not received any goods from them. He prayed that the claim should be dismissed with costs.

The replication was general.

Mr. Gardiner for plaintiffs; Mr. Wilkinson for defendant.

Alfred H. Mathew, partner in the firm, said he knew the defendant. He remembered the defendant coming to their office in December, 1902, with reference to opening a business in Hanover-street. He said he had certain premises there, and he asked about Mr. Godfrey, who was a chemist, and whom the defendant wanted to put in as a manager. He proposed to trade as Godfrey and Co. Witness told the defendant that they would only supply him with goods on one condition, and that was that he alone should be responsible financially. Mr. Godfrey had previously been in the firm's employ, and they had had transactions with him, through which they had lost money. Hence they were only prepared to look to Zweigenhagt for the money. They arranged to supply him with an opening order, equal to goods to the value of about £300, and to allow him 90 days' credit. They afterwards sent a letter to Zweigenhagt, confirming the arrangement. The reply was signed, "Godfrey and Co.," and was dated from Observatory-road. When they sent their bills they sent a copy to the firm of Godfrey and Co., and a duplicate copy to Zweigenhagt, at his private residence, first at Observatory-road and afterwards in Kloof-street. He had seen the defendant three or four times, and the latter had promised to come and see them. It was not until they made a legal demand that the defendant did anything in the matter. Defendant said he was carrying on building operations at Rondebosch, and that he could not settle the account then. He afterwards wanted the plaintiff firm to take over the business, and said he would waive any claim with regard to fixtures if they would release him from the debt. He said he had spent about £130 on the fixtures. They would not entertain this proposal. Defendant then offered them a bill for 90 days for the whole amount, and they said they would only accept it on condition that his wife's name was attached, as he had told them that he had no property, and that it was his wife's. Subsequently a letter was received from Godfrey and Co., tendering the stock, fittings, etc., estimated to be of the value of £380, to the plaintiffs in settlement of the bill.

Cross-examined by Mr. Wilkinson: They told the defendant that they would not accept him as security for Godfrey. There was a question raised as to some fittings, for which they asked £50. The defendant offered £20, and said that, unless it were accepted, he should cancel the opening order. They declined to accept that notice because the opening order had been previously given unconditionally before any dispute with regard to fittings arose. Their position was that the defendant had no right to cancel the order. Godfrey did not until afterwards represent the defendant to the firm as his financier. They would not accept such a proposal because Godfrey had not got a penny.

Frank Carlton Mathew, another partner in the plaintiff firm, corroborated the evidence of the last witness as to the interview with Zweigenhagt. He took the opening order on the condition that the business was Zweigenhagt's.

John Alfred Mathew, senior partner, also gave corroborative evidence.

Thomas Farquhar Tenant, town traveller for Heynes, Mathew and Co., said that in April last he met defendant in the street and spoke to him with reference to the account of Godfrey and Co. Witness asked him to settle the account, and defendant said he would call at the office within two days.

Mr. Gardiner closed his case.

Louis Zweigenhagt, the defendant, said the shop where Godfrey and Co. carried on business was the property of his wife. Witness acted as agent for his wife. Witness called on Mr. Alf Mathew in November, and suggested he should take the shop. Mr. Mathew said that if witness could find a trustworthy man the firm were willing to support him and to be security for the rent. Witness afterwards suggested Godfrey, and Mr. Mathew said he was a very good man. Witness said that Godfrey had told him that he had very little capital to start, and that he thought Dr. Sellar would go in partnership with him. Mr. Mathew told witness to send Godfrey in. Mr. Mathew advised witness to help Godfrey to put in the fittings, and he (Mr. Mathew) would support him with the stock, on condition that Godfrey only bought from Heynes, Mathew and Co. Witness saw Godfrey again early in December, and later on Mr. Mathew told witness the firm would support Godfrey if witness would stand security; he said he was willing to start Godfrey with the fittings. Witness never gave Heynes, Mathew and Co. any order. On the 23rd December the firm wrote to witness, saying: "We beg to thank you for your order handed to us to-day by Mr. Henry Godfrey." That letter was supposed to come to witness, but it went to Mr. Godfrey. It was addressed to Mr. Godfrey's place, and witness was shown it by Godfrey. After receiving the letter the witness saw Godfrey and told him to cancel the order. Witness afterwards went to see Mr. Mathew, and told him he was not open to stand as security or to take any responsibility for any stock delivered. Witness's only interest in the matter was to get a good tenant. The business was Mr. Godfrey's. Witness had no interest in the profits of the business. Witness told Mr. Mathew that he was willing to lend Godfrey £100 for fittings for a year, bearing interest at 6 per cent., and that Heynes, Mathews and Co.'s bills would first be paid. Mr. Mathew said that would be all right. Witness never undertook any responsibility on behalf of Godfrey.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: The letter of the 23rd December was addressed to "Mr. L. Zweigenhagt, corner of Station and Main roads, Observatory." In his reply, Godfrey referred to "our Mr. Zweigenhagt." Witness asked Godfrey for an explanation of the term "our Mr. Zweigenhagt," and Godfrey said witness was supposed to be a supporter. Witness did not agree to pay Godfrey a salary of £20 per month. In April, witness was advised by Mr. Mathew to take over the business, and employ Godfrey at a salary of £16 a month. Witness afterwards saw Godfrey, who told him he had been allowing himself £20 out of the business, but that he would in future only take £16 a month. Mr. Mathew advised witness to try and sell the place for Godfrey. Witness did not offer Mr. Mathew to give over the business, and to give a promissory note for 90 days.

Henry Godfrey said he made no arrangements with Heynes, Mathew and Co. personally. Witness arranged with defendant that he should supply fittings, and defendant said he had arranged satisfactorily with Heynes, Mathew and Co., on witness's behalf, as to the stock. The only concern Zweigenhagt had with the business was in regard to the money spent on the fittings, in respect to which witness agreed to pay Zweigenhagt 6 per cent. interest. The business was witness's; defendant had no share in it.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: Witness did not undertake to be responsible to Heynes, Mathew and Co. Witness knew the firm would not accept his undertaking to be responsible. The arrangement was made with Heynes, Mathew and Co. by Zweigenhagt. Witness did not know the terms of the arrangement. Zweigenhagt originally agreed to guarantee witness £20 a month salary; but he afterwards said witness should draw it from the business.

Re-examined by Mr. Wilkinson: Witness owed the money to Heynes, Mathew and Co. He did not go to Heynes, Mathew and Co. for credit, because he knew the firm would not give him credit.

Mr. Wilkinson closed his case.

Mr. Wilkinson (for the defendant): The plaintiff asserts that credit was given to defendant, but defendant did not give any order personally; the order is in Godfrey's handwriting They told defendant that Godfrey was not a good business man and that they had lost money by him, and yet the plaintiffs say, that knowing this, the defendant selected Godfrey as his manager. I submit that this is a most improbable story. There was some correspondence about fittings, and the defendant told plaintiffs he would not be able to carry on business if they charged more than £20 for his fittings; in such case he said he must cancel the order. Godfrey's contention is that the business belonged to him, though he owed money on it. There is a direct conflict of evidence as to whether defendant or Godfrey was owner of the business. If the defendant was merely a guarantor, the form of this action is misconceived. There is no proof that Godfrey was personally liable.

Mr. Gardiner was not called upon.

Maasdorp, J.: In this case the plaintiffs claim from the defendant the sum of £336 0s. 4d., said to be the price of certain goods supplied by them to the defendant, who is alleged in the declaration to carry on business as a chemist and druggist at Cape Town, under the style or firm of Godfrey and Co. The defendant denies that the goods were sold and supplied to him, and says that he did not carry on business under the style or firm of Godfrey and Co. The real issue as raised between the parties in this case, as it now stands upon the evidence, is whether the goods were supplied to Godfrey, carrying on business as Godfrey and Co., or to Louis Zweigenhagt, carying on that business. We have the evidence of Mr. Godfrey himself, who was called as a witness for the defence, and who says he at no time entered into any contract with the plaintiffs in respect to this business, and that he undertook no responsibility to them, because he was well aware that they would not have given him credit in the matter. Mr. Godfrey says that any agreement that was entered into with the plaintiffs was entered into by the defendant, and that he doesn't know what the terms of such agreement were. We are, therefore, thrown upon the evidence of the plaintiffs and of the defendant as to what the contract was that was entered into between the parties, and it seems to me it has been quite clearly proved, both by the oral evidence that has been given ,and by the documents, which support that evidence, that there was an agreement entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendant, the express terms of which were that the goods were to be supplied to the business of Godfrey and Co., on the express condition that the business should be long to the defendant, and not to Godfrey; and the reasons for not giving credit to Godfrey at the time were given by the plaintiffs to the defendant at the interview they had. The goods were subsequently supplied, and a letter was written, from which it is quite clear that the plaintiffs looked to Mr. Zweigenhagt as the party with whom they were contracting. Subsequently to the goods being supplied, it appears that there was some difficulty as to the payment, and on different occasions the defendant was addressed either by the partners in the plaintiff firm or by their clerk, who requested him to come and settle this account, and on several occasions he promised them that he would come and see them at their place of business, and settle the matter. These promises were made before the letter of demand was written, and upon his failing to keep these promises, a letter of demand was written, and he again had an interview with Mr. Alfred Mathew, one of the partners of the firm. At that interview he offered to settle the matter with them by giving them a bill. This offer was made after he had requested Mr. Mathew to take over the whole business and carry it on for his own benefit. Mr.

Mathew refused this, and also refused to take the bill, unless it were endorsed by the defendant's wife. The defendant, however, did not supply that endorsement, and there the matter ended. Now up to that period there was no denial at any time by the defendant that he was the principal in the purchase of these goods, and that he was personally liable; and I come to the conclusion that his own evidence, as given in this case, is wholly unreliable, and that the contract is proved by the plaintiffs, who are supported entirely by the correspondence which has been put in. I find, therefore, that the goods were supplied to Louis Zweigenhagt, carrying on business under the style or firm of Godfrey and Co., and judgment must be given against him for the sum of £336 0s. 4d., with costs.

TRIAL CAUSE.

COOMBER v. COOMBER. { 1903. Aug. 10th.

This was an action brought by Maria Coomber against her husband for a decree of judicial separation, and for the possession of her private inheritance. Mr. Alexander was for the plaintiff, and the defendant was in default.

Mr. Alexander said that the matter came before the Court on 25th June last, and the plaintiff now asked the Court to allow her to receive from the Master and executors of a certain estate, without the assistance of her husband, to whom she was married in community of property, her private inheritance. The parties were married in Johannesburg in August, 1896, and there were two boys, of the respective ages of four and six, of the marriage. In 1898 the defendant maliciously deserted plaintiff in Johannesburg, and had not since been heard of. The plaintiff claimed a decree of judicial separation, £5 per month for the maintenance of herself, and £4 for that of her children, until they attained the ages of sixteen years, forfeiture of all rights arising out of the community of marriage, alternative relief, and costs of suit.

Decree granted, one-half of the estate to be paid to the plaintiff, and the other half to be paid to the Master and the interest to her, maintenance to date from the present.

REVIEW.

REX v. SWART. { 1903. Aug. 11th.

Lashes — Previous conviction — Act 20 of 1856.

Under Sec. 42 of Act 20 of 1856, a magistrate may not punish a prisoner who has been previously convicted with lashes unless the previous conviction took place within two years of the subsequent one.

Maasdorp, J.: In this case, which came before me for review, the prisoner, Lucas Swart, was charged with theft before the Resident Magistrate at the Paarl. A previous conviction was proved against him, and the magistrate sentenced him to three months' imprisonment with hard labour, and eight lashes with the cat-o'-nine-tails. When the sentence was passed, it occurred to the Resident Magistrate that he could only inflict lashes where the previous conviction had taken place within two years, and it appeared that in this case the last previous conviction took place on the 20th June, 1900. When the sentence was sent up for review, the attention of the judge was drawn in the record to that fact. Under the circumstances, the magistrate has exceeded his jurisdiction, and the sentence must be amended by striking out the lashes; the proceedings are otherwise confirmed.

TRIAL CAUSES.

NYILA V. NYILA.

This was an action brought by the husband, who is living at the Native Location, Maitland, against his wife, for divorce on the ground of her adultery. Mr. Rainsford appeared for the plaintiff, and the defendant was unrepresented.

George Smith, clerk in charge of the Marriage Registers, Colonial Office, produced the record of the marriage.

The plaintiff said he was married to the defendant in the district of Glen Grey about nine years ago. About two years ago, when they were living at the Maitland Location, the defendant left him, and went to live with another man at D'Urban-road.

Walter Yeba stated that the plaintiff's wife was living at D'Urban-road with Memani. They were living as man and wife.

A decree of divorce was granted.

REVELAS V. POWER.

Injury to property — Assault — Damages.

This was an action brought by Constantine Revelas, a Greek shopkeeper, of Muizenberg, against Michael Power, Observatory-road, to recover £180 for malicious damage to goods, and personal injuries inflicted by the defendant. The defendant counter-claimed for £500 damages for assault.

The declaration set out that on or about the 28th March, 1903, the defendant entered plaintiff's shop at Muizenberg, and wrongfully, unlawfully, and maliciously broke, damaged and injured the plaintiff entered his shop at Muizenberg, and wrongfully, unlawfully, and maliciously broke, damaged, and injured the plaintiff's goods in the said shop, causing loss and damage to the amount of £50. At the same time and place, the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully assaulted plaintiff, injuring him so as to incapacitate him from business for some time, and in consequence the plaintiff had sustained damage in the sum of £130. The plaintiff claimed damages in the total sum of £180 on the said two counts.

The defendant, in his plea, admitted the formal allegations of the declaration. He admitted that he went to the plaintiff's shop, but said he entered the shop lawfully, and the plaintiff wrongfully and unlawfully assaulted him with great violence, and struck him on the head and body with a bottle and hatchet, and cut, bruised, and seriously injured him. The defendant was compelled to use force to repel the assault. Save as above, defendant denied the allegations, especially that he unlawfully broke and injured the goods of the plaintiff, and unlawfully assaulted the plaintiff, or that the plaintiff had sustained damages for which he was liable. He prayed that the claim be dismissed with costs. In reconvention, he claimed leave to refer to the allegations above pleaded, and stated that in consequence of an assault by the plaintiff, now the defendant, he had suffered great pain, and was wholly incapacitated from attending to business, and had been put to expenses for medicine, and had otherwise sustained damages in the sum of £500, which he claimed.

The plaintiff, in replication, said that the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully assaulted him, and that he was compelled to use force to resist the said assault, and that any injuries inflicted on the defendant were inflicted in lawful defence of his person and property.

Upon these pladings issue was joined.

Mr. Buchanan for plaintiff; Mr. Upington for defendant.

Constantine Revelas, plaintiff, stated that he did not know the defendant. Witness carried on business at the Masonic Buildings as a general dealer. On Saturday night, 28th March, the defendant came in to the shop half drunk, with one of his friends, and started swearing at once. Witness thought the defendant was going to fight with the witness Palmer, but the latter went out, and the defendant immediately took up a position on a table, although he was only invited to sit on a chair. Witness was about to weigh some monkey nuts when the defendant bundled bunches of grapes into the scales. He then took the fruit on to the counter, and commenced pressing it. Witness asked him to desist, and the defendant lifted a couple of pound weights and struck witness with one on the head. The defendant was forcibly ejected, and on the way out he succeeded in kicking over baskets and mineral water cases. The defendant returned to the shop, and proceeded to throw the seventeen bottles of mineral water at the witness. The glass cases behind the counter were smashed, and the defendant thereupon attempted to smash the window with a large stone, and when witness was struck on the back he commenced spitting blood. The defendant made another attack, and witness rolled with him on to the street in the course of the fight. "Thousands" of people came along, and half an hour later a policeman separated them. He had to pay £1 between the doctor and the chemist. He still had the mark on the forehead, and continued to suffer pain from the injury to his back. He was only a couple of days from business, as he could not lie down with the pain. He had stock to the value of about £600 at that time, and he suffered about £80 damage. On Saturdays in the summer months he would make from £30 to £35.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He left Greece to make some money out here. There was no other reason. He had previously been convicted for assaulting a person in his shop at Muizenberg. He threw a two pound weight at a man as he was leaving the shop. He did so to protect a lady in the shop. Fortunately, he missed the man with the weight. The defendant did not attempt to weigh grapes for his friend; he squeezed them into the scale. Witness did not take up one of the weights and strike the defendant on the hand. Witness spoke to him quietly, and did not strike him. The whole row occupied about three-quarters of an hour. The defendant's friend was outside when the seventeen bottles were being flung inside. Witness did not proceed to throw bottles at the defendant. Witness had a small sweet hammer in his hand, but he did not use it, and he could not see if the defendant was all cut over the head, as he himself was blinded with blood. Witness did not lose his temper and strike the defendant with a bottle. He simply took a look round his property, and put the loss down at £80. Cigars, cigarettes, and confectionery were damaged to the extent of £55. The damage to glasses and show cases he put down at £5, and the loss of trade at £12. About thirty boxes of cigars were damaged.

Maasdorp, J.: The cigars fell off the shelves, and got damaged by the mineral water.

Mr. Upington: Thirty boxes of cigars were open, and they all got damaged. He returned to the shop the next day. He did not put the defendant out very hard.

Maasdorp, J.: The defendant kicked the boxes of mineral waters outside, and then started throwing the bottles inside.

Re-examined by Mr. Buchanan: The bottles were all full of lemonade, and the floor became wet and the cigars saturated. He paid £5 for mending portion of the show-cases.

Johannes Palmer, a coloured fisherman from Muizenberg, said that he was in the plaintiff's shop when the defendant came in "barking like a dog." Witness said: "Why, you bark like a dog," and the defendant replied, "Clear out, you black fellow." Witness left the shop, and when he was some distance away, he saw the defendant throw mineral water bottles into the shop. The plaintiff did a good business, and on some Saturday nights it was difficult to get into the shop.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: Witness could not say if the plaintiff was a violent man, and if he was always having rows.

Cecil van der Poel, fisherman, said he saw plaintiff in defendant's shop on the Saturday night. Witness took a seat in the shop. Power took some grapes, and squeezed them into the scale. Revelas tried to get Power to go, and Power threw a lemonade bottle into the case. Witness ran out, and on coming back, he saw the two struggling in the street. At the start, a man came into the shop and asked for nuts. Power asked the man if he wanted grapes, and took up a bunch of grapes, and squashed them into the scales.

Cross-examined: The two Revelas tried to put Power out. Power did not, in witness's hearing, offer to pay for the grapes. When witness came back, only one of the Revelas had hold of Power, whose face was covered with blood. Power handled the grapes roughly. Witness only saw one bottle thrown.

Re-examined: Power was half-drunk. Revelas's face was also covered with blood. The shop was in confusion after the affair. The glasses were shattered, and some cigar boxes were lying about. There were about four cigar boxes on the floor.

By Maasdorp, J.: Before Power was put out of the shop witness did not notice whether plaintiff was hurt on the forehead. He did not see Power strike Revelas with a weight. When witness ran out, the shop was in good order.

Dr. Bulger said he attended plaintiff on the Saturday night. There was a large swelling on the left side of the chest, this being the result of a severe blow. Plaintiff's head had been previously dressed.

Cross-examined: Witness also saw Power, who had severe injuries. He was under witness's care for ten days. He had received at least three severe blows with a blunt instrument. They could have been caused by a bottle.

Re-examined: Power was about half-drunk when witness saw him. Power's injuries could not have been caused by a toy hammer, nor by rolling against the curbstone.

By the Court: The chemist had dressed the wound on plaintiff's head. It was not a severe wound, and little force had been used.

Mr. Buchanan closed his case.

For the defence, Mr. Upington called

Michael James Power (defendant), who stated that he was a carpenter by trade. He usually visited Muizenberg every Saturday, and on the evening of the 28th March he went into the plaintiff's shop, with the intention of buying fruit. He did not bark like a dog at the door. Immediately afterwards Revington followed into the shop, and the only other person there was Van der Poel. Witness asked Revington if he would have same grapes, and when he proceeded to pick the grapes, the plaintiff struck him with a weight. The plaintiff then came from behind the counter, and struck witness on the shoulder. Witness retaliated, and struck the plaintiff back. The plaintiff and another man threw him outside, and then he was struck on the head with a bottle. The plaintiff rushed out, and knocked witness down with a hammer. The police then came up, and took him to a doctor. He remained at St. James, and paid the doctor £6 for attendance. He was laid up till the middle of April, and had to pay another man £16 to do his work. He was wounded on the nose, forehead, and top of the head. It was customary to select fruit that was exposed for sale. It was untrue that the plaintiff's face was covered with blood. It was only after bottles were thrown at him that he retaliated in the same manner.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He did not care for publicity, otherwise he would have taken action. He could not bark like a dog; he would make a poor attempt at it, and would leave that to other people. It was quite natural that his blood would get up when he was struck. He was simply "hurled" out of the shop. The plaintiff was a pretty good wrestler. Witness bombarded the shop after he himself had been bombarded.

Re-examined by Mr. Upington: He had done nothing in the shop before the plaintiff struck him.

George Revington, foreman tailor, in the employment of Mr. John Garlick, stated that on the evening of March 28 he was at Muizenberg with his wife. After tea he saw Power in the plaintiff's shop. Witness called for some monkey nuts, and the defendant asked him to have some grapes, and proceeded to weigh them. The plaintiff got excited, and struck the defendant on the hand with a weight. He then came from behind the counter, and struck the defendant and got struck back. The defendant was thrown out just as witness was called out by his wife. Witness saw a bottle flying out into the street when the defendant was lying in the gutter.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: The defendant was in a happy mood, but was not half drunk. The plaintiff got angry because the defendant did not desist weighing the grapes.

Samuel Short, engineer, stated that on the evening of the 28th March he saw the defendant thrown into the gutter from the plaintiff's shop. When witness lifted the defendant up, he saw one of the men in the shop about to throw a bottle. He did not see the defendant throw bottles.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He would say that the defendant was thrown out. He heard other bottles breaking outside.

John Doyle, clerk, residing at Muizenberg, said that he saw the defendant fling something into the shop after he had been thrown outside, and immediately afterwards he saw the plaintiff rush out with something like a hammer in his hand. The defendant guarded a blow, and clinched with the plaintiff. Witness thought that the defendant was being murdered, and went for the police.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He did not see any bottles flying about. The plaintiff was on top of the defendant when witness went for the police.

Re-examined by Mr. Upington: When the defendant threw the bottle he was on the ground.

This closed the evidence, and after counsel had been heard in argument on the facts,

Maasdorp, J.: There is not much difficulty, in my opinion, in this case to gather from the evidence of the disinterested witnesses what it was that really took place at the time when this unpleasantness arose between the plaintiff and the defendant. The defendant was out holiday-making, and arrived on the evening in question at the plaintiff's shop in a boisterous and a merry mood. I don't think he could be described as being very seriously under the influence of liquor or drunk, but he arrived there in rather a lively temper, and upon his friend following into the shop he began in a playful manner to take liberties with the fruit that there was in the shop, and by so doing annoyed the plaintiff. Now, it seems to me, had the plaintiff not so readily lost his temper no harm would have followed after that, but the plaintiff seems to be a rather quick-tempered man, and was very soon infuriated. He requested the defendant to desist from meddling with the goods, and the defendant refused to do so. Thereupon. the plaintiff and his brother proceeded to put the defendant out of the place. In my opinion, up to that time no assault had been committed by the defendant. It has not been proved that the defendant struck a blow with the weight that was lying on the counter, and inflicted a wound on the plaintiff's forehead. Van der Poel, who seems to have seen everything that took place, said that he saw no blows struck by the defendant at the plaintiff. Consequently, the first violence that was used, whether it was justifiable or not, proceeded from the plaintiff and his brother. They may have been justified in putting the defendant out of the place when he refused to leave the goods alone, but they seemed to me to have done it in a violent manner. He was provoked, and it appears that blows were struck before the defendant was finally ejected out of the door. At that time the defendant was in a great rage, and I am satisfied that he vented his rage by picking up a number of bottles that were lying at the door, which had fallen out of a box during the scuffle, and proceeded to fling them into the shop. He may have been retaliating for the assault he had received, but I am quite sure that he saw he was doing damage to the goods, and that he insisted on flinging these bottles into the shop, regardless of what damage he might cause. Van der Poel says the first bottle that was thrown into the place caused a crash in the glass case, which was fixed up against the wall, and he was so frightened that he rushed out of the shop. The plaintiffs, seeing that their property was damaged, made an attack upon the defendant, and I think it was then that the most serious wounds were inflicted on both sides. It was then that the defendant's face was injured by some weapon, which was used by the plaintiff, and it is not at all improbable it was only then that the plaintiff received the injury to his side. There is no doubt that both of them got very roughly handled, and if the question of assault was now only before the Court I would have been inclined to decide that each party brought what he received upon himself by his own fault, and was not entitled to redress, and I would have given judgment against each party on his own claim. But the further question arises whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the defendant should not be held liable for the damage he caused to the property of the plaintiff. Now, I feel satisfied that when the defendant flung these bottles into the shop in the mood in which he then was he intended to do some damage, and that damage resulted. The question arises, "What amount of damage should be allowed to the plaintiff for the injuries he received in consequence?" One would have expected that if any serious loss had been suffered by the plaintiff that he would have obtained the testimony of some independent witness to place proof of it before the Court. The evidence upon the damage is extremely unsatisfactory, and it seems to me when we go into details of the loss that was suffered it amounted to a few panes of glass in this glass case, and three or four boxes of cigars and some cigarettes, and this is valued by the plaintiff at £50. Now, I am quite satisfied if we allow five pounds for the damage suffered it would meet the loss which the plaintiff sustained, and, under all the circumstances of the case, I think the plaintiff should have judgment for £5 for the injuries to his goods, and that we should allow him Magistrate's Court costs.

Kotzé, J., concurred.

GENERAL MOTION.

SPILHAUS AND CO. v. "BELGIAN KING.

Mr. Benjamin moved as a matter of urgency for the appointment of a commissioner to take the evidence of the captain and crew of the ship Belgian King, which would be at East London for a few days. The plaintiffs in the case, Wm. Spilhaus and Co., consented to the application. The affidavit of an attorney at Port Elizabeth set out that the Belgian King was under attachment at Algoa Bay for alleged short delivery of cargo, and the charter was about to expire. Security would be given by the owners. The ship would be in East London for a few days, and might never visit South African ports again, and it was necessary to take the evidence of the captain and crew at once.

Order granted, the Resident Magistrate at East London being appointed as commissioner.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), the Honourable Mr. Justice MAASDORP, and the Hon. ourable Mr. Justice KOTZÉ].

GENERAL MOTIONS.

JEFFREY v. WAKE { 1903. Aug. 12th.

Mr. Gardiner applied as a matter of urgency for the arrest of a witness, who had been subpœnaed in the case of Jeffrey v. Kotze, set down for hearing on Wednesday next. The petition of the plaintiff set out that the witness, Thomas Henry Wake, was in a position to prove certain allegations, and that the said witness intended leaving for the Transvaal that night. The witness had been duly served with the subpœna, and his evidence was material to the plaintiff's case. Counsel applied for an order for arrest until the respondent would give satisfactory security, and for the appointment of a commission to take evidence, Mr. Advocate Pyemont to act as commissioner.

The witness, having given an assurance that he would remain over for 24 hours, the order was granted for a commission, Mr. Advocate Pyemont to act as commissioner.

BRAUN v. POWRIE.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for the plaintiff, moved as a matter or urgency for the appointment of a commissioner to take the evidence of a witness named Myburg, who was about to leave for Oudtshoorn.

Mr. Close opposed the application on behalf of the defendant on the ground that there was not sufficient time to instruct counsel.

Application granted, Mr. Upington to act as commissioner.

TRIAL CAUSES.

THOMSON v. THOMSON.

This was an action brought by Martha Maria Magdalena Thomson, of Constantia-road, Wynberg, against her husband, for restitution of conjugal rights, or, failing compliance, a decree of divorce. Mr. Upington appeared for the petitioner, and the defendant was unrepresented.

Mr. Smith, clerk in charge of the Marriage Register, Colonial Office, proved the registration of the marriage.

Martha Maria Magdalena Thomson, the plaintiff, said she was married to defendant on the 28th September, 1893, at Cape Town. They first lived at Sea Point. Her husband was a journalist, and was at that time editor of the "South African Review." In 1896 they went to Bulawayo, where her husband was editor of a paper at £60 per month. While they were at Bulawayo, her husband became addicted to drink, and in 1897 he lost his position through drink, and they were reduced to poverty in consequence. She came down to Cape Town in 1897 at his request, and she went to live with her mother. At first her husband sent her money, and then he stopped. At the end of 1898 she pawned her jewellery, and returned to Bulawayo, where they started a home again. They remained together till the outbreak of the war, when she came down to Cape Town again at his request. Defendant had not sent her any money since that time. He was now living in Cape Town, but she did not know what employment he was following. She received letters from him, and in October last year she went to Bulawayo again in search of the defendant, whom, she found, had been in Cape Town all the time. She subsequently met the defendant in Cape Town, and asked him to take her back. He said that he had no money to enable him to support her. She had since maintained herself by dressmaking. Her attorneys had received a letter from the defendant, in which he said that his wife told him in April last that she would on no account live with him again. It was she, not he, who had refused to live in matrimony. Witness admitted that she told him that she would not live with him unless he provided a house and took a decent position. She was prepared to go back to the defendant if he provided a home for her.

By the Court: It was entirely owing to the defendant's own fault that he had not a decent position. She was now living with her sister and brother-in-law. Defendant was at present doing literary work.

De Villiers, C.J.: There has been personal service, and if the defendant had been present and stated that he would be prepared to receive the plaintiff, there might have been some difficulty in granting a decree of restitution of conjugal rights. But, as there is no appearance for the defendant, the Court will grant a decree, but it must be clearly understood that if the defendant appears on the return day, and shows that he is willing to receive the plaintiff, to do the best for her, even though that best is not what she expects, if it is the best that under the circumstances can be expected from him, she will not be entitled to a final decree. Upon that understanding, the Court will grant a decree of restitution calling upon the defendant to return to or receive the plaintiff on or before the 31st August, failing which you will take a rule calling on the defendant to show cause on the 12th September why a decree of divorce should not be granted.

THOMSON v. THOMSON.

This was an action for the declaration of nullity of marriage on the ground of an existing marriage at the time the marriage was celebrated between the parties. Mr. Benjamin appeared for the plaintiff, and the defendant was in default.

Mr. Benjamin said that it was found necessary to take evidence in England in regard to the prior marriage, and in regard to the spouse of the first marriage being alive. He was therefore instructed to ask that the matter be allowed to stand over until the 16th November to enable the evidence to be taken.

Application was granted.

THE "MARGA" v. SEARLE AND OTHERS. 1903. Aug. 12th. " 22nd. Sept. 3rd

Charter party—Bill of lading—Demurrage.

A charter party was entered into between the plaintiff and B., who consigned part of the cargo to the defendants under bills of lading, which made no reference to the charter party. There was no evidence that B. acted as the agent of the defendant.

Held, that in so far as the bills of lading differed from the charter party the defendants were liable under the bills of lading and not under the charter party.

The bills of lading provided that the consignees should take delivery as quickly as the goods could be delivered in the ship's slings from the ship. Owing to the crowded state of the port, there was considerable delay in the discharge, and the evidence showed that it was impossible for the defendants, owing to lighters being unobtainable, to hasten the discharge.

Held, that the defendants were not liable for demurrage.

This was an action brought by the master of the German barque Marga, representing the owners, who belong to Hamburg, against Edward Searle and Co., of Port Elizabeth, and twelve other persons or firms, to recover £1,049 17s. 4d. for demurrage of the said vessel in the port of Algoa Bay.

The plaintiff's declaration set out that on the 6th February, 1901, at Hamburg, one Blumenthal entered into an agreement with the owners or agents of the said vessel upon terms and conditions set forth in the charter party which formed part of the agreement. That Blumenthal acted on behalf of Searle and Co., who had full knowledge of the charter party, and who acted as agents of the vessel. All the bills of lading provided that all goods were subject to an absolute lien for freight until paid, and for all charges, including dead freight, demurrage and other charges. She arrived at Port Elizabeth on the 3rd October, 1901, and was duly placed in a berth. On and after 4th October the vessel was ready to deliver the goods, and it was the duty of the defendants to receive the goods as quickly as they could be delivered from the ship's slings. The defendants as consignees, and the first defendants as consignees, charterers and agents, failed and neglected to make provision to receive the goods, and delivery did not commence until the 14th December, 1901. In terms of the charter party the plaintiff was entitled to claim demurrage at the rate of 4d. per ton net register per day, and according to the charter party lays days expired on the 28th November, 1901. The defendants refused to recognise the plaintiff's claim for demurrage. The plaintiff, in order to preserve his lien upon the cargo for demurrage, on or about the 8th of January, 1902, ceased discharging and delivering cargo, and applied to this Honourable Court for an order of attachment of the cargo consigned to the defendants, and also to other consignees not now joined as parties to this suit, and on the 6th day of February, 1902, the plaintiff recommenced discharge and delivery of cargo upon satisfactory security being given pursuant to the order of this Honourable Court in respect of his claim for demurrage and without prejudice to his rights as entitled to a lien on the said cargo, which lien still continues. Should the Court hold that the defendants were not bound by the agreement in the charter party, the plaintiff contended that the period between 3rd October, 1901, and 28th November, 1901, was a reasonable and sufficient time for defendants to accept the goods in terms of the bills of lading. In order to prevent multiplicity of suits, the twelve other defendants agreed to abide by the decision in the present case. The registered net tonnage of the vessel is 1,016 tons, and the amount of demurrage due to the plaintiff is £1,049 17s. 4d.

The defendants' plea set out that they had no knowledge of the circumstances whereunder the charter party was entered into, that they were not parties to it, and were not bound by its terms. They denied that Blumenthal entered into the charter party under any instructions from the first defendants, or that any of them had any knowledge of its terms. They stated that the bills of lading constituted the contract between the parties, and that they carried it out according to the terms thereof. The discharge of the vessel had not been delayed by any neglect or default of the defendants, but had been regulated and conducted in accordance with the rules and regulations of the Harbour Board, and in accordance with law and the practice and custom of the port. If any delay in the said discharge had arisen it was through hindrances beyond the control of the defendants, and for which they were not liable. The defendants claimed in reconvention £95, £73 7s. 11d., £35. £14 3s., £19 18s. 3d., £94 5s. 6d., and £1 0s. 3d., by reason of the delay occasioned by the refusal of the plaintiff to deliver the said cargo.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Sir H. Juta K.C.), for plaintiff. Mr. Searle, K.C.), (with him Mr. Benjamin), for defendants.

Mr. Schreiner put in certain correspondence, including an agreement of the other defendants to abide by the decision of the case, and said the first point in the case was the matter of construction of the documents. The bills of lading did not state the number of lay days, but under the charter party, the number was implied in the bills, and counsel would contend that both documents should be read together. The bills of lading could not be understood unless the charter party was read. There would be very little evidence in the case, as the captain was dead, and the charterer was hostile. His contention would be that Blumenthal was acting for the consignees when he determined these days on their behalf. Blumenthal knew what the actual lay days were when he signed the bills of lading for the consignees. The cessor clause substituted an absolute lien upon the cargo for the plaintiff's demurrage, and when it was shown that Blumenthal acted as agent for Searle, then the defendants would be bound by the stipulations under the charter party. His clients held that it was a German contract, and they had very strong advice that the terms of the bills of lading could not fail. He would urge that Act 5 of 1879 was never intended to debar the Supreme Court from doing that which the Courts at Westminster would do under similar circumstances, and further, that in England the contract would be determined on a German construction. The broad rule was that the law of the country where the contract was made should apply.

Mr. Schreiner called

Charles R. Hodgson, broker and general agent, of Port Elizabeth, who said he was agent for Messrs. Smith and Co., Durban, the owners of the Penguin, a small coasting steamer, which had for two or three months, before October, 1901, done lighterage work in Algoa Bay. She was chartered by the Union-Castle Co. There were several lightering vessels at Port Elizabeth; as far as he remembered, there were about seven or eight. In October, 1901, witness endeavoured to hire the Penguin, but the negotiations came to nothing. On or about October 17 the vessel went to Mossel Bay with a small cargo. To witness's knowledge, witness did not know of any application to hire the lighter for the Marga. The Penguin returned on the 9th November. She was available on the 14th, and was engaged in lightering on the 15th for Mackie, Dunn and Co. This was for a sailing ship. Witness's practice was to charge for time. On November 19 witness chartered the Penguin to Mosenthal and Co. She was discharging Bucknall steamers from the 18th to the 28th November. Witness believed these steamers carried general cargo. She sailed for East London on November 29, and returned about the 28th December. On the 8th, 11th, 18th, and 20th January the vessel was again hired for lightering work, and subsequently she went on a coast voyage. If the charterer took the boat at £30 a day, witness did not care whether the cargo was general or not. Witness did not agree with the evidence given on commission that owners of private lighters would not hire their vessels for lightering general cargoes, owing to the difficulties and want of facilities. Witness gave evidence in the case of the Silvia on Circuit in 1902.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: There were firms who had lighters of their own. Witness could not say whether these firms would have hired out their lighters at the time in question. In addition to these there were the Penguin and another coaster —the Rouselong—which did lightering work. Witness could not say whether the Rouselong could go alongside the Marga to lighter. Mr. Searle may have spoken to Mr. Griffiths, witness's partner, about hiring the Penguin. If Mr. Searle said he spoke to witness concerning the Penguin, witness would not deny it. All general cargoes had to go into the Harbour Board stores. Until a vessel got a store into which the cargo could be placed, the practice was not to allow her to land the cargo. The whole of the stores and the appliances were under the control of the Harbour Board. Searles were generally able to give as quick discharge as anyone in the port, and witness sometimes employed them.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Mr. Searle called

James Searle, jun., partner in the firm of Searle and Co., who said his firm were agents for the Marga, which arrived in Algoa Bay on the 3rd October. The cargo consisted of cement, salt, and matches. There were 500 barrels of cement, 300 bags of salt, and 10 cases of matches. The firm received the documents in the ordinary course through the bank. When they took up the drafts, they had no knowledge of the terms of the charter party. It was on the 16th October that they were first aware of the terms of the charter party. When the vessel came, witness made all efforts to get her discharge accomplished as quickly as possible. The discharge was in the hands of the Harbour Board. If the cargo were all for one consignee, it could be taken to the consignee; otherwise it would have to be taken to the Harbour Board store. Several firms were interested in this cargo. The Harbour Board refused a written application by the firm to allow the vessel to come into the jetty. The Harbour Board took a vessel's turn from the time the vessel was entered in the Customs books. The Marga had a preferential turn on the 14th December. The Harbour Board decided to land timber on the beach ,and witness protested that the Carl Peel should be allowed to discharge, if the Marga was not allowed to unload her mouldings, which was agreed to. There was delay in accordance with the custom of the port, and witness tried everywhere to get private lighters. He had to supply more valuable cement, in order to keep a contract with the Municipality. He had also to supply a better quality of salt in another contract. The Harbour Board store was first available about the middle of December. Witness tried to get the vessel worked at night, but the Harbour Board could not fall in with the suggestion. On the 8th January the captain refused to discharge any more cargo, and in consequence of that, the Harbour Board took away the lighter and the vessel lost her turn. On the 8th January the captain claimed a lien on the cargo. Witness received notice on the 10th January, and, in consequence of that, the discharge was delayed until the 6th February. Witness claimed damages from the 8th January to the 6th February. Had the captain continued he would have finished his discharge in three or four days. Witness suffered loss through the scarcity of cement at the time, and he could have sold it during January at 1s. 6d. a cask more than in February. He claimed 1s. a bag on 300 bags of salt. On each case of matches he claimed 5s. Blumenthal, acting for someone else, gave witness a quotation for cement, but he was not witness's agent. The ship carried a certain amount of optional cargo, including cement and salt. Part of that cargo was sold to witness, the transaction taking place after the vessel left for South Africa. Before the application, witness offered security to the master.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The letter from Blumenthal appointing witness as agent was a mistake, inasmuch as witness had merely suggested that he would merely store the cement of the optional cargo. Blumenthal was not his Continental representative in relation to the consignment of goods that were shipped per the Marga. He would not charge Blumenthal with the difference if he could get the cement cheaper than witness's prices. They were simply agents for the ship, and he did not think it was their duty to protect the captain's demurrage claims. He could not give any rule or regulation of the Harbour Board bearing on the case. He could not say that the store allotted by the Harbour Board on the 14th December received anything except timber up to the 2nd January. The ship was stopped on the 30th and 31st December, because she was last in turn in order to give preference to the transports. The reason why they could not discharge from more than one hatch from the 14th was because of the scarcity of lighters.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: Blumenthal was a well-known charterer in Port Elizabeth, when he took over De Jong's business. As agent he did not take a log of what was discharged each day. He made every effort possible to get the ship discharged, and it was beyond his control to urge the Harbour Board when they were dealing with transports.

Carl Heidveder, bookkeeper to Messrs. Dreyfus, Port Elizabeth, said he received the bills of lading in the ordinary course. Their name figured as the shipper, and not Blumenthal. He had never seen the charter party at all. His goods were not discharged until February. He claimed sixpence a gross on the matches, because there was a scarcity all round at the time, and five shillings on the sewing machines. He could not in any way have hastened the discharge of the Marga.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He would not have sold all the sewing machines in the short space of time, but, as he had no idea of when he would get those in the Marga, he did not order any more, and, consequently, lost the sale.

Wm. John Thomas Coates, shipping clerk in Messrs. Phillip Bros., Port Elizabeth, said that he represented his firm in the claim of £95 on the goods consigned per the Marga. According to the bill of lading, they should have received 1,663 packages, but they only received 1,625, leaving a shortage of 38. By taking an average number of feet £95 would be a fair value.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: The invoice gave him the quantity, and he did not measure the mouldings. He could not say how many feet he was short, and he merely went by the packages. He put in a claim against the ship after she had left.

Wm. Edward Clift, marine superintendent to the Port Elizabeth Harbour Board, stated that he adhered to his evidence on commission. He made a correct statement from the log showing the discharge of the vessel. The Marga was stopped on the 30th December on account of the mail boat, which landed 1,015 tons.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He could show by a statement the number of vessels being discharged by private lighters from the 18th September to the end of December.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: With one exception the private lighters were being used during that time for their own lines. There was no room in the Harbour Board stores until the 14th December.

Mr. Searle closed his case.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for the plaintiff): The captain has a lien on the cargo for demurrage.

[Mr. Searle here asked to be allowed to put in certain original invoices which had just arrived from Port Elizabeth.]

We have not seen them, but I do not object to their going in. To proceed: The charter allowed sixty-seven days for loading and for discharge. The contract was that the cargo was to be discharged in thirty-five days, but, of course, they could get more time by saving time in loading.

[Kotzé, J.: But the endorsement on the charter expressly gives thirty-five days for discharge.]

My contention is that forty-five days were allowed for discharge at Port Elizabeth; then demurrage would commence, and the lien would come into operation. The bills of lading were subject to the provisions of the charter party, and hence the captain did not lose his right in rem over the goods by signing these bills. There is nothing to show that we ever gave up our right to lien.

[De Villiers, C.J.: How does the question of lien affect the case?]

Because the captain stopped the discharge, and came to Court for leave to attach the goods. The consignee has a right of action against the charterer if the captain enforces his lien, but the consignee has no immediate contract with the captain. Unless the bill of lading is read with the charter party, all rights under clause 35 as against the charter vanish. The bill of lading was signed without prejudice to the stipulations of the charter party. Looking at the two documents together, it is clear that the charterer was Blumenthal. He made the bills of lading. The conditions as to demurrage were inserted in the charter party. Blumenthal shipped the goods, and the bill of lading was signed on June 15, 1901. This bill was a blank bill, and the effect of handing it over to any endorsee was to transfer property in the cargo to him. No express freight is stipulated for in the bill of lading, and the word as used therein only means freight as per charter party. If I once show that the consignee was by the bill of lading put on inquiry as to the terms of the charter party, it follows that the captain by signing the bill of lading abandoned his rights as to lien for demurrage after thirty-five days. See Scrutton (p. 47) where he cites De Laurier v. Wylie (17 S.C. Sess. C., 167).

[De Villiers, C.J.: But is there any proof that Blumenthal was acting as an agent for Searle?]

He was clearly in that position, for he was not selling cement, etc., which were shipped by him; the correspondence clearly shows this. See Ireland v. Livingstone (41 L.J.. Q.B., 201, and 5 H.L., 395), cited at p. 574 of Benjamin on Sales. As I have pointed out, we are entitled to say that Searle and Co. were acting through their agent, Blumenthal. It would be monstrous to say that the ship was bound to lie forty-seven days at Port Elizabeth until they could take delivery.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But see McLean v. Bellinghan (2 Scot's Rep.).

It is difficult to see how Bellingham could have been anything but an agent or a broker between the two parties. The whole case is really between Searle and Co. and us, and if other parties are joined, it is only that they may be able to plead in reconvention. I would refer to Scrutton (p. 323, 3rd Edition). An endorsee of a bill of lading is put upon inquiry as to the terms of the charter party. McAloney v. Spilhause (11 Sheil, 509). So in this case Searle knew the condition of the port better than the captain could be supposed to know it. If we must stand or fall by the charter party, see Wright v. N.Z. Shipping Company (40 L.T., 413), which was not overruled by Postlewaite v. Freeland (L.T., 601). See also The Jaederen (68, L.T., 266).

[De Villiers, C.J.: The captain tried to get lighters, but could not.]

That is only secondary evidence.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You represent the late captain, and what he said to his mate is evidence.]

It is not necessary that we should put in evidence to which we object.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then the other side can put it in.]

I object to their doing so.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I make a note of your objection.]

It was the duty of the consignees, if of anybody, to engage lighters, and Searle took no steps to get them beyond making inquiries from one individual. This case is on all fours with Wright v. N.Z. Shipping Company. Postlethwaite's case does not override Wright's, but only decided that demurrage could not be claimed if the custom of the port were observed. In this case we have to deal with alternative customary methods of discharge. Surely a duty was cast upon the consignees to arrange to receive their cargoes. See Milman v. S.A. Milling Company (12 C.T.R., 690). Searle could have provided a private lighter had he been willing to pay for it.

[Kotzé, J.: The large lighters were all engaged.]

They could have got the Penguin. She was engaged for only a few days. I now go on to point out that we are not responsible for restraints of princes, therefore we are not responsible for any delay caused by the presence of transport ships. On December 14 a store was allotted to us, but we could not discharge till January 2. The bill of lading, however, makes exception as to delay arising from restraints of princes in favour of the ship only, and not of the consignee.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What restraints of princes were there?]

The action of the military.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You knew that the place was in possession of the military, how, then, can you claim for delay?]

Take the case of a strike: that case would afford a mutual exception to both the ship and the consignee, but this is quite a different matter. By the charter party the consignees were bound to take delivery as fast as the goods could be delivered from the ship's slings. They excuse themselves on the ground of want of landing facilities, and this rose from the vis major employed or threatened by the military. See The San Roman (26 L.T., 948).

[De Villiers, C.J.: Has that question anything to do with demurrage?]

Yes, because the consignees must be ready to receive their goods from the slings, and must show that we got delivery according to the custom of the port.

[The Court requested Mr. Benjamin to address himself to the claim in reconvention only.]

Mr. Benjamin (for defendants, plaintiffs in reconvention): There are three claims in reconvention, viz., those of Searle and Co., of Dreyfus and Co., and of Phillips. This last is a claim in respect of short delivery, which is admitted.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then as to delay. The master, you say, refused to discharge; where is your damage?]

That is shown by the correspondence put in. Searle and Co. lost on salt and on cement in consequence of these articles not being delivered in time for a favourable market. They lost about 5s. per case on matches. In all they lost about £55. This is not a case on all fours with one in which the master cannot deliver owing to the perils of the sea, for here the goods were in the harbour. The claims of Dreyfus and Co. have been considerably reduced. Counsel for defendant in reconvention has relied strongly on the clause in the bill of lading as to weight and number of goods delivered, but the defendants have already abandoned that ground by admitting responsibility for a shortage of 38 cases of mouldings. See Scrutton on Charter Parties (p. 117 and 118, 4th edition). The onus is on the ship to show that number and weight stated in the bill of lading were not duly received on board. See also the recent case of Holtman v. Stewart (88 L.T., 702).

Mr. Schreiner (in reply on damages claimed in reconvention): See Scrutton (p. 281). The case for the plaintiffs in reconvention has been argued as if the measure of their damages should be regulated by the interest on the value of their goods. There is nothing to show the ship knew that the goods were required for a certain market. No doubt there have been cases in which special damages have been given, where the carrier had notice that the goods were required for a particular season, but this is quite a different case.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea: (Sept. 3rd.)

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an action for demurrage brought by the master of the ship Marga against the defendants, who are merchants, residing at Port Elizabeth. The plaintiff in his declaration relies mainly upon the terms of the charter party, which was entered into between him and Blumenthal at Hamburg, and the terms which he relies upon are these: As much as is payable abroad, according to the bills of lading, in cash at the port of discharge on right and true delivery of the cargo, and the balance—but in no case less than one half—to be paid in Hamburg after the final departure of the vessel from the Elbe, in cash, at the financially quoted rate of exchange for short sight bills on London, less 6 per cent. for interest and insurance, on receipt of which the charterer's responsibility concerning this charter to cease, the captain to have a lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage." Then with regard to demurrage there is an endorsement to this effect on the charter: "The ship has in all 67 days for loading and discharging; of these days 22 have been used in Hamburg, thus 45 days are left for discharge to be counted, as per the charter party." The defendants, as I have said, are merchants at Port Elizabeth, the goods were consigned to them, and they were holders of the bills of lading, upon which they ultimately received delivery of the goods. The clause relating to the discharge is as follows: "The master to deliver the goods with all reasonable despatch, and the consignees are to be ready to receive them free from alongside when at hand, and to take delivery as quickly as the goods are delivered in ship's slings by the ship, otherwise the master may discharge at the expense and risk of the owners, or, in his option, charge demurrage for the ship at the rate of 4d. per ton net register of ship." The captain to have a lien on the goods for all these charges. The first question to be decided is whether the defendants are bound by the charter party or by the terms of the bill of lading. The bills of lading make no reference to the charter party, but the contention is that the defendants knew of the terms of the charter party, or if they did not know the terms they ought to have known these terms. The general rule is concisely stated by Carver, in his work on "Carriage by Sea," as follows (Section 160): "When the bills of lading are in the hands of strangers to the charter party, either as original shippers or as indorsees to whom the property has passed, they show the contract under which the goods are being carried; and the shipowner's claims, exemptions, and liens on the cargo, given by the charter party, are not preserved as against such shippers or indorsees, except as far as those terms of the charter party are expressly incorporated in the bill of lading." Counsel for the plaintiff has, therefore, taken great pains to convince the Court that Blumenthal, the charterer, was in reality the agent for the defendants. My opinion, however, is that the evidence wholly fails to establish such a contention. I have read and re-read the correspondence, and am unable to find in that correspondence any proof whatever that Blumenthal was other than the vendor. Much stress has been laid upon the fact that this is what is called a c.i.f. contract, and that the price was to cover the cost, insurance, and freight, but that is no proof that an agency was intended to be established. If it had been proved that a commission was payable to Blumenthal, then certainly there would have been some evidence that there was an agency, but it is clear that no commission was payable. Upon this point the judgment of Lord Blackburn, then Mr. Justice Blackburn, is of importance, and I do not think there is any subsequent case which in any way overrules his dicta: "If the consignor is a person who has agreed to supply the goods at an agreed price to cover cost, freight, and insurance, the amount inserted in the invoice is the agreed price, and no commission is charged in such a case. It is obvious that if the freight is high the consignor gets the less for the goods he supplies; if the freight is low he gets the more, but, inasmuch as he has contracted to supply the goods at this price, he is bound to do so, though, owing to the rise in price at the time of shipment making him pay more for the goods, or of freight causing him to receive less himself, because the shipowner receives more, his bargain may turn out to be a bad one. On the other hand, if owing to the fall in price in the port of shipment or of freight the bargain is a good one, the consignee must still pay the full agreed price. This results from the contract being one by which the one party binds himself absolutely to supply the goods in the vessel as it is stipulated for, at a fixed price, to be paid for in the customary manner, that is part by acceptance on receipt of the customary documents and part by paying the freight on delivery, and the said party binds himself to pay that fixed price. Each party therefore takes upon himself the risk of the rise or fall in price, and there is no contract of agency or trust between them, and therefore no commission is charged." Now it seems to me that that is exactly the case here, and that there is no agency established, and that, therefore, the defendants are not bound by the terms of the charter party, but are bound by the terms of the bill of lading alone. I have already read those terms. The master is to deliver the goods with all reasonable despatch, and the consignees are to be ready to receive them free from alongside when at hand, and to take delivery as quickly as the goods can be delivered in the ship's slings by the ship. Mr. Schreiner has relied upon the case of Milman v. S.A. Milling Company, (12 C.T.R., 690), which was recently decided in this Court, but in that case the Court held that the consignees had contributed to the delay, and that they were liable. There is one case, however, which counsel for the plaintiff greatly relies upon, and that is the case of Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company. I do not wish to say more in regard to that case than this, that if it is in conflict with the case of Postlethwaite v. Freeland, the Court should follow, as it has recently done, the decision in the later case. The two cases may, however, be distinguished, as was done by Lord Selborne, on two grounds—first, that there was no express reference to the custom of the port, and, secondly, that there was no evidence that reasonable diligence would not have enabled the charterer to provide sufficient lighters. So that he went mainly upon this question of evidence. But the Court has been referred to the most recent case upon the point that was decided in the present year, also in the House of Lords, the case of Hulthen v. Stewart and Co., decided on the 25th May. "By charter party it was agreed that a steamer should proceed to a named port, and there deliver a cargo of timber, 'to be discharged with customary steamship dispatch, as fast as the steamer can deliver . . . according to the custom of the port,' with an exception in respect of delay caused by a strike or lock-out. The ship duly arrived at the port, and was ready to deliver the cargo, but delivery was delayed by the crowded state of the dock to which she was ordered. There was evidence that she would not have been discharged more quickly, under the circumstances, elsewhere in the port, and that the consignees had used all reasonable means to procure the discharge." The Lord Chancellor, in his judgment, expressed his surprise that the question should have been again raised after the previous decisions thereon. Lord Macnaghten was equally emphatic, and he ended his judgment in the following words: "It is, I think, established that in order to make a charterer unconditionally liable, it is not enough to stipulate that the cargo is to be discharged 'with all dispatch,' or 'as fast as the steamer can deliver,' or to use expressions of that sort. In order to impose such a liability, the language used must in plain and unambiguous terms define and specify the period of time within which delivery of the cargo is to be accomplished. I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed with costs." The House of Lords were unanimous in the same way as the Court of Appeal had been unanimous. The remaining question is, whether in point of fact the defendants had used reasonable diligence, all such diligence as could reasonably be expected from them to receive delivery of the cargo as fast as the ship could deliver it. Upon this point there is certainly some evidence in support of the view that lighters might have been obtained, but the impression of the whole of the evidence upon my mind is that it would have been impossible for the defendants to receive delivery of the cargo more quickly than they did. It is said that the Penguin was available, but we have the evidence of Mr. Searle that he had tried, that he had spoken to the agent for the Penguin, and endeavoured to get the lighter from him, and had failed. But if evidence were wanting on the part of the defendants, I think that evidence is really supplied by the evidence given on behalf of the plaintiff himself in Belgium. The bill of lading, as I have already remarked, provides for the master to deliver with all reasonable dispatch, and the consignees to take delivery as quickly as the goods are delivered in ship's slings by the ship, and then comes this clause: "Otherwise the master or agent may discharge and store them at the expense and risk of the owner of the goods, or, in his option, charge demurrage." It is clear from the evidence taken on behalf of the plaintiff himself in Belgium that there was an anxiety to prove that the master had done everything to discharge and store the goods at the expense of these owners, and witness after witness was called, and stated that the master had made the admission. He stated that he had gone daily on shore in order to obtain lighters, and on each occasion he had failed to obtain lighters. An objection was raised to the admission of this evidence, because it is said that the plaintiff himself did not put it in. Of course, the plaintiff is not bound to put in any evidence which has been taken on commission; but if that evidence has been taken, and it comes to the notice of the Court which authorised the commission, I consider that the Court would have been justified without any consent on either side in directing that that evidence should be put in. But that point does not arise now, because the defendants themselves have requested that that evidence, taken on behalf of the plaintiff, should be put in, and the Court allowed it to be put in in so far as it contains admissible evidence, and consequently any admissions made by the master, the plaintiff in the present case, or rather the former plaintiff—because he is dead now; he represented the owners—and any admissions made by him to the witnesses would clearly be evidence. It is, therefore, now before the Court, and upon that evidence it is perfectly clear that the master informed his chief mate and several of the crew that he had done everything he could to obtain lighters on shore, and the chief mate says he speaks from his knowledge, because he had seen the master endeavour to obtain lighters. It was as much to the interest of the master to endeavour to obtain lighters as it was to the interest of the consignees, and, therefore, I think these admissions made by the master are of some importance to the case. But, quite independently of these admissions, I think that the evidence, taken as a whole, must lead the Court to the conclusion that the defendants have done everything in their power that could reasonably be expected from them to obtain quick delivery of the cargo. Owing to the congested state of Port Elizabeth at the time, the congestion being caused by the great number of ships in the Bay and the large quantity of cargo that was being landed for the military, the defendants were unable to obtain quicker delivery. When the master could obtain a berth and was in a position to discharge his cargo he refused to deliver the cargo, claiming his lien. Of course, I think he would have had his lien—I need not go into my reasons now—for his demurrage, but, if there was no demurrage payable, he clearly was wrong in detaining these goods, and for that detention I consider he is liable to damages. The only question is what the measure of damages should be. The contention of the plaintiff is that the measure of damages should be only the interest on the value of the goods, whereas the defendants' contention is that the measure of damages should be the profit which they would have made upon the goods. Well, I must say that the evidence is not very satisfactory as to the profits. Part of the damage seemed to have been occasioned by the delay of the Railway Department, which sent the goods, and there is the admission in the case of Dreyfus that there were other circumstances which occasioned the damages, and upon the whole, without laying down a hard and fast rule that only interest should be chargeable, the Court is of opinion that in the present case no more than interest upon the amount should be charged. It is not quite clear what that amount is, but the parties may come to terms upon what the amount is on which interest may be charged. As to the claim of Phillips, I consider that it should not have been made. It is wholly outside this case. Here are a number of defendants brought into court to have a question of demurrage decided, and then there is the claim for short delivery, and I am by no means satisfied that there was short delivery. The case has not been clearly made out, and, as to the claim of Phillips, there should be absolution from the instance. The judgment of the Court will, therefore, be upon the claim in convention for the defendants, with costs, and, as to the claims in reconvention, there will be judgment for Searle for the amount presently to be ascertained, as well as for Dreyfus for the amount to be ascertained presently. As to the other claim, there will be absolution from the instance. The costs of the action will be paid by the plaintiff.

Maasdorp, J., and Kotzé, J., concurred.

Judgment was entered for the defendants on the claim in convention, and on the claims in reconvention for Searle for £3 7s. 11d., and for Dreyfus for £18 0s. 6d., absolution from the instance in the claim of Phillips, costs to be paid by the plaintiff. It was also ordered that Mr. Searle's personal expenses be included in the costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

FORD V. FORD. { 1903. Aug. 13th.

Mr. Upington moved for a decree of civil imprisonment against the defendant upon an unsatisfied judgment of this Court, delivered on the 15th May last in an action for divorce. Upon that judgment a writ was issued for £45 6s. 4d. and £1 4s. 6d., taxed costs. The summons also called upon defendant to show cause why he had not paid two sums of £4, being monthly instalments for the maintenance of his child. Correspondence was read, which had passed between the parties, showing that a dispute had arisen as to defendant's access to the child.

Defendant said that he had been placed in a very unfortunate position by his wife's unfaithfulness. He was now in debt to the tune of £109 5s. 2d., and he should like to show the Court why he had come into this position.

Maasdorp, J.: We cannot go into that. Why didn't you raise the matter at the proper time?

Defendant: I was badly advised by my solicitors. I was blackmailed in my last case.

A decree of civil imprisonment was granted, to be suspended on payment by defendant of £6 a month—£4 towards the maintenance of his child, and £2 costs—the first payment to be made on the 1st September.

Defendant: Will you allow me to have my child one day per month?

Maasdorp, J.: You must move the Court by a proper application.

Mr. Upington moved for provisional sentence on the sum of £300 on a certain mortgage bond with interest from January 1, 1903, £9 being a half year's interest due from June, 1902, and that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable.

Order granted.

BARRY BROS. V. TELFER.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £475 6s. 4d., with interest from the 29th November, 1902, and costs of suit.

Order granted.

COTT BROS. V. LAMPERT AND WOLLAS.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for the provisional order granted on August 6 by Mr. Justice Maasdorp to be made final.

The defendants appeared, and one of the men said that their assets were sufficient to meet all their debts. They were only short of ready money.

Maasdorp, J., said it appeared that at the meeting the debtors offered to pay their creditors 10s. in the £.

One of the defendants repeated that they were not insolvent.

Maasdorp, J., advised defendants that they should instruct an attorney and have these statements put on affidavit before the Court. The matter was ordered to stand over till later in the day.

Later the defendants consented to an order for compulsory sequestration, and the Court accordingly granted the order.

WELLS v. WHITE. { 1903. Aug. 13th

This was a motion to make absolute a rule nisi granted on the 26th June, calling on respondent to show cause why he should not be interdicted and restrained from using a certain road.

The petition of Mary Wells, stated that she was the owner of certain property at Newlands, known as Kelvinside, which property was adjoined by that of the respondent, John Joseph White. Petitioner's property was bounded on one side by a 40-feet road, on another by a 30-feet road, and on a third by a 25-feet road. The said 25-feet road was on the land of the applicant, and was her property. The respondent had used this road, and had broken down a fence at the end of that road so as to get thence to his property. The 25-feet road was made by the person from whom applicant had bought the property. Respondent insisted on using the road. Applicant prayed for an interdict restraining respondent from using and trespassing thereon.

The respondent deposed, on affidavit, that he claimed that he was entitled to have access to the road in question for himself and his tenants, and that applicant was not entitled to the sole and exclusive use of the same. When deponent purchased the property this road was shown on the diagram attached to the transfer. The fence referred to was respondent's property, having been erected by the person from whom he purchased. Part of the 25-feet road fell into the 40-feet road, and it was over this part that deponent got access to his property. He had no objection to waiving his right to the use of the 25-feet road, providing the 40-feet road was extended to the 30-feet road, so as to give him access to the property. The 25-feet road was laid down by the common predecessor, and was shown on the diagram of deponent's predecessor.

The affidavit of one Brodie stated that he formerly owned the property of applicant and respondent. Before selling to respondent's predecessor he reserved the 25-feet road as his absolute property. He subsequently sold part of the property to applicant, inclusive of the road in question. Neither the respondent nor his tenants had a right to the use of the road. He referred the Court to the diagrams.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for the respondent; Mr. Benjamin for the applicant.

Sir H. Juta, K.C.: A 40-feet road runs at the back of our property. At the side there is a 30-feet road. The 40-feet road is a continuation of a 25-feet road. The applicant in her petition does not show what title she has to the 25-feet road or to the 40-feet road. That road was laid down by a common predecessor, and these roads were marked on Rymer's diagram. Rymer divided the property, and sold to applicant's and respondent's predecessors in title respectively. Roberts's affidavits show that although the road is on the applicant's property it is not part of her property.

[Maasdorp, J., (to Mr. Benjamin): You do not claim the 40-feet road?]

Mr. Benjamin: Oh, yes, we say it is part of our property. We do not admit that respondent has a right to come on the road. He can only get on the 40-feet road by using the 25-feet road.

[Maasdorp, J.: Your petition refers to title deeds. Where are they?]

I thought they had been put in; but counsel for the respondent admits that the road is on our property. How, then, can the respondent be justified in using it?

[Maasdorp, J.: These roads are on the remaining extent; but there may be a servitude over the applicant's property.]

There is nothing registered on our title deeds. The respondent does not claim this road either as a via necessitatis or by prescription. If a right had been given by a former proprietor, it might have been binding on his immediate successor, but surely not on a remote successor. Admittedly the property is ours, and it rests with the respondent to justify his user.

Sir H. Juta was not called upon in reply.

Maasdorp, J., said the information before the Court was of too meagre a character for the Court to decide that the applicant was entitled to an interdict, and under the circumstances the rule nisi would be discharged, but the Court would allow the notice of motion in the matter to stand as summons in an action to be instituted by the applicant, costs of the motion to be costs in the cause.

ESTATE BERENS v. VAN WYK.

Principal and agent—Deed of sale—Retention by agent.

This was a motion for an order calling upon the respondent to show cause why he should not be ordered to deliver to the applicant a certain contract of sale in terms of which certain landed property at Stellenbosch was sold in April, 1903.

The affidavit of Mrs. Berens set out that on the 8th April, 1903, the respondent, acting under instructions, sold certain property, and failed to deliver contract of sale. The answering affidavit of the respondent stated that he signed the contract of sale on behalf of the applicant for whom he was acting. The replying affidavit of the applicant denied that the respondent was acting on her behalf to the extent stated.

Mr. Benjamin for applicant; Mr. Bisset for respondent.

Mr. Bisset said that the respondent was not entitled to deliver up the deed without the consent of both parties. If the application was granted the effect of it would be that the purchaser would have to pay an attorney the full costs of purchase. The agreement between the parties practically reduced the amount of the purchase price, and counsel contended that if the applicant ratified one part of the contract she must ratify the other.

Maasdorp, J.: The respondent in this case, acting as the applicant's agent, executed a deed of sale. He now holds that deed of sale as the agent of the applicant in this matter, and the principal is entitled to the custody of that document, and the Court must order the agent to deliver up the document belonging to his principal. The order will therefore be granted as prayed. This order will in no way affect the rights of either the purchaser or the seller in any arrangement that may have been entered into as to the conveyancing of this property. The custody of this document by the seller cannot affect any rights the purchaser may have, he not having a party to this matter. I may mention that no right of lien that the respondent may have on this document is set up. If that had been set up the Court would have determined his rights in that respect. The defence which he sets up has failed. Consequently, the order of the Court is that the document be handed over to the applicant, and the respondent pay the costs of the application.

ESTATE WEIDNER (MASTERTON) v. BRAND.

This was a motion for an order of attachment against the respondent for contempt of Court in failing to comply with an order directing him to file a full and true account of the estate.

Mr. Benjamin for the applicant; Mr. Close for the respondent.

Mr. Benjamin: The respondent has now filed a full account, so there can be no question of contempt of Court, and now we have to deal only with a question of costs, and ask that the respondent should be ordered to hand over all documents.

Mr. Close: The application as to the handing over of the documents is a supplementary application.

[Kotzé, J.: In whose favour is the balance?]

In that of the respondent by some £745. The respondent is quite justified in refusing to hand over his accounts, because it is necessary that he should retain them in order to prove his claims.

Mr. Benjamin (in reply): The correspondence which passed shows that it was admitted that the property was registered in the applicant's name.

With the consent of counsel on both sides the account was referred to Mr. Maynard Nash as referee, before whom the account might be debated.

GRAHAM v. FIETH. { 1903. Aug. 13th.

Interdict—Discharge.

A. had instituted an action against B. for the recovery of certain bricks, and at A.'s instance a Judge in Chambers had interdicted B. from selling them pending the result of the action. B. now applied to have this interdict set aside.

Held, that as A. now consented to the sale of the bricks without prejudice to his right in them, the interdict should be discharged, the bricks sold and the proceeds paid into the hands of B.'s trustee pending the action. Costs to follow the result of the action.

This was an application for the discharge of a certain interdict granted by Kotzé, J., in Chambers, on July 23, restraining the applicant from disposing of certain bricks and other materials.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for applicant): We had a good opportunity of selling these bricks. We do not ask that they should be sold by public auction, but we do ask that they should be realised as soon as possible.

Mr. Benjamin (for the respondent): I see no objection to the bricks being sold, provided the trustees are not allowed to deal with the proceeds. We did not understand from the notice of motion the position taken up by the applicant.

Mr. Schreiner: Our affidavits and notice of motion are sufficiently clear, and it is the fault of the respondents that the costs of opposition have been incurred. I submit that we are, therefore, entitled to the costs of this application.

Maasdorp, J.: In this case, it seems the respondents instituted an action against the applicant for the recovery of certain bricks, and he made application to the Court to restrain the applicant from selling the bricks. An advertisement of the sale of the bricks appeared the day before the application was made by the respondent in this case, and an interdict was then granted restraining the applicant from selling, pending the result of the action. The applicant now moves that the interdict be set aside. The Court has not gone into the affidavits, and if we did go into the affidavits it would be difficult to decide now to whom this property belonged. It is impossible for the Court to come to the conclusion now that the respondent was wrong in the first instance in restraining the applicant in this application from selling his bricks. If the bricks belong to the respondent he had a perfect right to restrain any person from selling them, but, seeing the position in which the matter now stands, the respondent consents to allow the question as to the proprietorship of the bricks to stand over pending action, and allow the bricks to be sold and the proceeds to be retained by the trustee. In giving that consent, the respondent has not given up his claim to the bricks, and if it should turn out ultimately that he was entitled to the possession of the bricks, then he was justified in coming to the Court to restrain the applicant, and under these circumstances, I think the question of costs will depend upon who is the successful party in the action. Under all circumstances, the Court will order that the interdict be discharged the bricks be sold, and the proceeds retained by the trustee pending the action already instituted by the respondent, and the costs of this application will be costs in the cause.

BOBBINS v. LE ROUX. 1903. Aug. 13th. " 28th. Sept. 15th.

Title to land—Interdict—Motion.

This was a motion for an order compelling the respondent to remove certain building and other material deposited on a certain lane on the Camp Ground, Rondebosch, and to restrain him from trespassing on the said lane.

When this matter was previously before the Court, it was decided that the information was then insufficient. The original affidavits were now put in, together with a further affidavit of the applicant, stating that the respondent continued to obstruct the passage and cause annoyance. The affidavit of Herbert Scholtz set forth that as a result of a search of the deeds the lot near the lane had been transferred to the applicant in 1896. In the respondent's lot, No. 9, there was a special condition that he could not make any use of the private lane on the southern boundary of the estate.

The answering affidavit of the respondent denied that he had given any annoyance. The road was certainly in a muddy state, but not so bad as the applicant stated.

Mr. Upington for the applicant. Mr. C. W. de Villiers for the respondent.

Mr. Upington put in the title deeds.

Mr. Upington (for applicant): Lot 1 was transferred in 1849, and again in 1853, from Meyer to Drossel ,and on August 16, 1877, Miss Hull transferred it to Gerard Myburgh. Lot 9 was transferred by Hawkins's Estate to Martin. Lots 2, 68, 69, 70 were transferred to Martin on June 18, 1849. Martin transferred to Gaugain in 1854, and in 1858 Gaugain transferred to Steinbock, who sub-divided lots 2, 68, 69, and 70. He transferred lot 9 to Haybrittle in December, 1858, and Haybrittle transferred to Myburg on April 7, 1881. Thus Myburgh was then owner of lots 1 and 9, and his estate transferred lot 1 to the applicant on June 18, 1897. No. 9 was transferred to Burhr on November 16, 1886, against which transfer the condition was registered that the transferee must not use the road on the south of the property or cut down trees on the south boundary of the property. Burhr transferred to Eason on August 24, 1889, Eason to Roberts on March 4, 1891, and Roberts to Le Roux Bros. on July 22, 1896, and Le Roux Bros. to the respondent on June 26, 1900. I contend, therefore, that the condition attached to the transfer to Burhr in November, 1886, clearly shows that we are entitled to the free use of this lane, and the respondent is not.

[Maasdorp, J.: There was no restriction till Myburgh got the place. How do you show you have the dominant tenement?]

[Kotzé, J.: The dominant tenement has been sub-divided; has the owner of each sub-divided portion a right to the servitude in full?]

[Maasdorp, J.: It is most important to ascertain which of these two properties is the dominant tenement. The matter must stand over until the Court can be satisfied on this point.]

Postea (August 28).

Mr. Upington: When the case was last before the Court I traced the history of this property since 1818. The applicant's predecessor in title transferred lot 9 to G. Myburg, and retained lots, 1, 64, 65, and 67. The affidavits and plans put in show that the respondent's property abuts on the lane in dispute. When Myburg restricted the rights of lot 9 it must be presumed that he did so in favour of 1, 64, 65, and 67. The respondent has, therefore, no right to this lane as far as the title deeds show; but he tries to set up an adverse user. We claim the right to the free use of this land to his exclusion. He does not dispute the title deeds, which are conclusive in our favour, and there is nothing on affidavit to support his claim to adverse user, and the onus of proving this user is on him. Even James Baron does not say he has used the land for thirty years.

[Maasdorp, J.: Was this road ever mentioned to Myburg?]

I do not think it was. I understand that it is still part of the remaining extent, and our contention is that the title deeds show that, as owners of this remaining extent, we have a right to the exclusive use of the road in virtue of our succession from G. Myburg.

[Maasdorp, J.: Then if anyone were to buy any one of these lots from the applicant, could such purchaser claim to use the lane?]

Certainly he could; the plan shows that.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers (for the respondent) referred to the deed of transfer to respondent's predecessor, which provided that he and his successors should have the use of the lane. That deed applied to the greater part of the property, certainly to more than was held by Myburg. Myburg did not hold all the property Venables had held. The property certainly included lot 1, but I do not think it included lot 9. The road marked on the old plan runs between the respondent's land and the rest of the estate.

Mr. Upington (in reply).

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (September 15).

Kotzé, J.: My brother Maasdorp and I are both of opinion that the application should not be granted, but that petitioner should be left to obtain her remedy by an action. If she should institute an action, the costs of the application would abide by the result of that action.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice, the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.]

Ex parte HOFMEYR. { 1903. Aug. 14th.

Admission of Attorney—Act 30 of 1892.

An official intimation having been made to the Court that the Governor does not intend to specify any examination in statute law for Transvaal attorneys, inasmuch as no examination is required in the Transvaal for attorneys of this Court.

Held, that the applicant, who had been admitted in the Transvaal and had complied with all the provisions of the 2nd section of Act 30 of 1892, except those contained in sub-section d, was entitled to be admitted as an attorney of the Supreme Court.

De Villiers, C.J.: In the matter of the application of Mr. W. A. Hofmeyr to be admitted as an attorney of this court, it appeared from the petition presented to the Court on a previous occasion that the applicant has complied with all the provisions of the 2nd section of Act No. 30 of 1892, except sub-section (d), which provides that the applicant shall have passed such an examination under the Statute Law of the Cape of Good Hope as the Governor shall from time to time specify. When the application was made, I was informed that the Governor had not specified any such examination, and it was stated that the applicant ought to be admitted if the Governor does not intend to specify such examination, and the case was postponed to enable the Attorney-General to give some information upon the point. Since that time the Attorney-General has filed an affidavit, to the effect that the Governor has not specified, and does not intend to specify, any examination, in terms of section 2. It appears also that our attorneys are admitted as attorneys of the High Court of the Transvaal without further examination. Under these circumstances, as the Governor does not intend to specify any examination, and there is this reciprocity in the Transvaal, I am of opinion that the Court should allow this application, and the order will be made accordingly, the oath to be taken before the Registrar of the Supreme Court.

EYSSEN v. CALDER AND CO. { 1903. Aug. 14th.

Master and servant—Negligence — Common employment — Labour agent.

The defendants entered into a contract with the Military authorities "for the supply of native labour" at certain specified rates of wages. The defendants employed a timekeeper to engage the men, to observe the time during which the men worked and to pay them at the end of every week the wages, which were less by six pence a day per man than the amount agreed on with the Military authorities. The men were employed by the Military authorities to stack bales of forage under the control and supervision of a Military superintendent, and the defendants had no power to give any command as to the manner in which the work should be performed. The plaintiff, who was one of the men engaged by the defendants, sustained an injury through the fall of a bale caused by the negligence of one of his fellow servants.

Held, that the defendant was not a master of the men and was not liable in damages for the injury.

This was an action for damages for personal injuries received through the negligence of the defendants' servants.

The declaration set out that the plaintiff was a labourer, and resided in Cape Town, and the defendants were produce dealers, carrying on business at Maitland and Wynberg. In October, 1902, the plaintiff was employed by the defendants to work about a certain stack of forage at Maitland, and while so employed, was injured through the negligence and carelessness of the defendants' servants. A bale from the top of the stack struck the plaintiff on the eye, and he ultimately lost his sight. He had been six weeks out of work, and could not now earn so much money. The plea stated the plaintiff was engaged on behalf of the military authorities, and denied the plaintiff was employed specially to work about the said stack. The stack was not built by or under the control of the defendants' servants, and they could not be liable for any damage sustained.

Mr. Wilkinson for plaintiff; Mr. Upington for defendants.

Mr. Wilkinson said that the plaintiff was one of a gang of eight men who were engaged by the defendants some time in February, prior to which they had been working for the military. In working at the stacks of forage at Maitland, the plaintiff was under the direction of the defendants' foremen. On October 5, when the accident occurred, the plaintiff and two other men, who would be called, were working at the stack. It was usual at the close of the day to cover up the stack as a protection against rain, and suddenly, without anyone touching it, a bale fell from the top of the stack and struck the plaintiff on the eye, causing the injury.

Evidence was then called for the plaintiff.

Dr. Kitchen identified a prescription, but he had no recollection of the man who got it. The prescription was for the eye.

Dr. Wood stated that some time ago the plaintiff called at the Somerset Hospital, and witness recommended on his out-patient paper that he should have an artificial eye.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Can you recollect what caused the injury?]

Witness: The eye was blind and painful, and consequently I removed it.

You could not say what caused the injury; whether it was through disease or external injury?—I could not, on oath, my lord.

John Hy. Eyssen, plaintiff, said that on the 5th October, between 6 and 7 o'clock in the evening, he was working between two stacks at Maitland. The gang with which he was working were employed covering up the stack, and witness was busy on the ground fastening the ropes. There were four men on the top of the stack. The stack was only partially built. The gang that covered the stack had nothing to do with the building of it. The builders generally left at 5 o'clock. A ridge of bales was placed in the middle of the stack, to allow the rain to run off. Witness knew the exact way of stacking the bales, and if they were not put in as a brick wall was built, there was danger of some of them toppling over. While working below, he heard the foreman call out, "Take care, the bale is coming down." Witness looked up, and the bale struck him on the eye and the shoulder. There was a noise like the cracking of a whip when he was struck on the eye. He could not see, and he showed it to the foreman. First of all, he went to Dr. Kitchen, who gave him a prescription. In consequence of what the doctor said, he went to the hospital and saw Dr. Wood, who gave him medicine, but said that the eye would have to be removed. Dr. Wood ultimately removed the eye. He was six weeks out of work, and he could not earn as much money now. He could only earn now about 5s. a day, whereas he was making 5s. a day and earning overtime before the accident. In February last Lieutenant Jones asked for volunteers to go to Maitland, and witness was one of a gang of eight. Lieutenant Jones said they were going to work for the contractor, and they would get overtime. Mr. Calder paid him his wages at Maitland. While he was working for the military he got 9s. for Sunday work, and Calder paid him 7s. 6d. for the same work. They were all dissatisfied, and the foreman spoke to Mr. Calder about it. The latter said that they had nothing to do with the military now, and that they were working for him. That was said in the presence of the whole gang. He always received his pay from Mr. Calder. The Kafirs went to the same office for their pay. The defendants' foreman looked after the building of the stack.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He was employed by the military at the South Arm, and Lieutenant Jones asked for volunteers for Maitland. Mr. Broers superintended the building of the stacks, and witness did not know whether Sergeant-Major Hare was in charge of everything. Sergeant-Major Hare did not give him orders, and witness did not hear him give orders to the foreman. He was made night watchman after the accident, and dismissed by the military for sleeping at his post two weeks ago. The military paid him from May 4. Mr. Wallace ordered him just the same as Mr. Broers. He did not see Mr. Calder before he came to Maitland. He did not know there was always danger when the tarpaulin was thrown over the stack.

Re-examined by Mr. Wilkinson: He was busy fastening the rope when the bale fell. The bale did not come down in consequence of the pulling of the ropes. Long after the accident payment by the ticket system began. He had frequently seen Mr. Calder walk about looking at the work, but he could not say that he gave orders. The foreman gave him instructions. He had seen Mr. Calder about compensation, and on the first occasion the defendant promised to see everything all right.

Joseph Jemmet, labourer, stated that he was working on the top of the stack in question. The stack was partially built. When properly built a bale could not fall off the top ridge. These particular bales were not properly stacked. No one had been working at the spot from which the bales fell before it fell. Witness saw that the top bales were not properly placed, but the foreman would not let him put them right, saying to cover them up however they were. Witness was paid for his Sunday's work by Mr. Calder. He received 7s. 6d., but with others he complained that that amount was too little. Mr. Calder said he had nothing to do with the military. After the accident the ticket system was adopted for paying the men. Witness received his orders from Luyt. When witness complained about the 7s. 6d. Mr. Calder said, "I am employing you; the military pay you 9s., but I pay you time and a half." He always understood he was working for Mr. Calder.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: Witness saw Sergeant-Major Hare in company with the foremen, but he could not say whether he (Sergeant-Major Hare) was in charge of the place. He had been working at Maitland for twelve months. Mr. Broers never gave witness any orders.

By De Villiers, C.J.: He got his orders from Luyt, who, he understood, was employed by Mr. Calder. A bale weighed about 100 lb. The falling of the bale was the fault of the men who stacked the bales and the man who should see they were properly stacked.

William Waldemar Hayward said that he was one of the gang who was working on the stack with the plaintiff and the previous witness. Witness was only paid 7s. 6d. for the Sunday's work; he should have got 9s. The men complained that the money was short, and they went to Mr. Calder, who said that the military paid what they liked, and he (Mr. Calder) paid what he liked. Sometimes fault was found with the witness for setting right the bales which the stackers had improperly stacked. Witness got his orders from Mr. Broers and Mr. Luyt.

William Luyt stated that he was in charge of the men. Mr. Calder paid the stackers. Witness very seldom got any orders from Mr. Calder; he got them from Sergeant-Major Hare.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: Witness sometimes saw Sergeant-Major Hare give orders about the stacking.

Mr. Wilkinson closed his case.

Mr. Upington called

Henry James Broers, who stated that from October to July last he was employed by the military as superintendent foreman, under Sergeant-Major Hare, at Maitland. The stacking was controlled by witness and Sergeant-Major Hare. Calder and Co. had no control whatever over the stacking: Calder had no such authority. Calder merely supplied the labour, but from the time the men began work until they finished they were under the control of the military. The men were paid by Mr. Calder. The plaintiff did not report his accident to the witness. Witness or Sergeant-Major Hare inspected the stacks before the stackers stopped work.

Cross-examined by Mr. Wilkinson: Calder had not contracted to stack the forage; the contract was only to supply labour. The pay tickets originally came from Mr. Calder. Mr. Calder had nothing to do with witness. It was not a fact that it was Calder and not the military who controlled the men. Calder's timekeeper, Wallace, never interfered with the men.

Re-examined by Mr. Upington: Mr. Mountain was employed by the military as checker and clerk. Previously he was aware of an accident, and the man was given an easy job.

James Mountain said that in March and April last he was in the employ of the military authorities. He remembered the plaintiff being engaged at the stacks under Sergeant-Major Hare. Broers was superintendent under Hare. Witness was a checker and clerk under the military. He was in charge of a gang of boys. Calder and Co. merely engaged the labourers, but did not in any way interfere with the work. Calder and Co. paid the labourers by tickets. Injured men were usually paid during the time they were unable to work.

Cross-examined by Mr. Wilkinson: Men employed by Calder would report the matter to Sergeant-Major Hare, who would ultimately refer the matter to Calder, in order that the men might be paid. Hare would naturally want to see the work properly done by the contractors. Witness was paid by the military.

Re-examined by Mr. Upington: The men under witness were paid by Calder.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Who saw that the stacks were properly placed?]

Mr. Broers and Sergeant-Major Hare.

What control had Calder over the stacks?—None whatever.

Supposing any work was negligently done, the bales not properly placed, could Calder come and say, "put that straight"?—Well, no; I should not say so. He had nothing whatever to do with it.

Would his orders have been obeyed?—Probably, yes.

By Hare?—Oh, no.

Supposing there was negligence, who caused that bale to fall?—Probably it was the fault of the Kafirs.

Yes, but who looks after the Kafirs?—Mr. Broers.

Was he paid by Calder?—No.

Alex. Calder, partner in the defendant firm, identified the contract he entered into to supply the labour to the military. Witness had no control whatever over the plaintiff at his work. He paid his wages by ticket, which was checked by his timekeeper. He got the money from the military at the expiration of each month. The military prepared the pay sheets, which were attached to the accounts. The plaintiff was sent up by Lieut. Jones.

Cross-examined by Mr. Wilkinson: Witness did not ask for the conditions when he found that there had been an omission to enclose them. He did not think that the conditions might have been burdensome; in fact, he never gave the matter a thought. He contracted to do the work for a certain sum per man, and then paid the men himself. He was the only person they could look to for payment. The military designated their work, and superintended the men. He had no power to dismiss the men without the officer's sanction. He had no control over the work. Wallace did not, to witness's knowledge, give instructions. Wallace was there to check the time. He remembered a complaint being made to him by the men that they were not being paid sufficient for Sunday. He did not think that he said he was employing them now, and not the military. He would deny a thing if he did not remember it even if several men swore to it. He only paid the men in accordance with their engagement by him. Witness paid Luyt and Wallace. The people that were employed by the military were paid by the military, and the people that were employed by him were paid by him.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Supposing the military find fault with a man for the way in which he did his work, how were they to get rid of him?]

They would discharge him on the spot.

Would they have the right to do it?—Yes, my lord.

Did they ever do it?—I believe they have in reference to some Kafir labourers.

Then how would it be reported to you that the man was discharged?—By my timekeeper.

Is the timekeeper the only man you employed besides these labourers?—The only one, my lord.

Who paid the timekeeper?—We did, my lord.

You did not get his money back?—Yes, from the military; he was included as a foreman.

Did you get a commission on that?—No, my lord, we, practically speaking; paid more than he was getting from the military.

The timekeeper is not mentioned here in this contract?—No.

Is there any other contract besides that?—No.

Because sometimes these people worked at Green Point, is that under the same contract?—Yes.

Had you any control over the manner in which the stack was being placed?—No.

Had the timekeeper any control?—No control.

Then your sole object in having a timekeeper is to make sure you don't pay more than they are entitled to?—Just so, my lord.

All you did was to engage the men and pay the men?—That's all, my lord.

Whom did you employ to engage the men?—The timekeeper, my lord.

Who was your timekeeper, then?—Wallace, my lord.

Was he the timekeeper all through?—Not at the Docks, my lord.

Had you any control over Broers?—No control at all, my lord.

Nor over Hare?—No, my lord.

Mr. Wilkinson (for plaintiff): The question is, whose servants were the injured man and his fellow-servant? The accident itself affords prima facie evidence of negligence; and the only question is who is responsible for that negligence? If the defendant had appointed Broers and Horne he would still be responsible. I submit that he is the actual master. The defendant takes up the position that he is merely a labour agent, but he cannot get out of his liability to his servants by saying that they were employed in carrying out a contract which he had entered into with somebody else. The defendant may have taken his orders from the military, but the military did not employ the plaintiff. Broers reported Calder to the military authorities for careless work on a stack. Calder then appears to have been responsible to the military, but the men in his employ were responsible to him and were paid by him while the men employed by the military were paid by them. If Calder did leave the management of his servants to the military, that does not affect the question of his liability. The master is responsible for the acts of his servants, done within the scope of their employ. Forman v. Barnet (6 M. and W., 49). Calder engaged the men; he paid them; he had power to discharge them. The question is, who had the final control of the plaintiff's acts? See Beran on Negligence (p. 820-821). If the relation of master and servant existed between the defendant and the plaintiff, there is nothing to show that it was ever terminated; and it is a very significant fact that, according to Mountain's evidence, injured men would refer to Calder. We are rather in the dark as to the relations between Calder and the Government, as we have nothing before us to show exactly what they were. I submit that Calder was the employer, and that he, and he alone, is liable.

Mr. Upington (for the defendant) was not called upon.

De Villiers, C.J.: I confess that I entertain the greatest sympathy for the plaintiff, who has lost the sight of one eye through the falling of a bale of forage on his head while he was employed in covering the stack. The stack was being covered by the military authorities, under the control and supervision of their own superintendent. The men employed to do the work were subject to the commands of the superintendent as to the manner in which they did the work. It has been contended, however, that inasmuch as the defendants had engaged the men and paid them their weekly wages, they stood in the relation of masters to the men, and are liable for the negligence of some of their servants resulting in injury to their fellow-servants. In the view which I take of the case, it is unnecessary to consider the question whether the doctrine of the English common law as to non-liability of a master for injury resulting to one servant from the negligence of another servant holds good in our law. That doctrine appears to be founded on the supposition that a servant on taking service contracts that, as between himself and his master, he will run the risk of any injury that might be done to him through the negligence of his fellow-servants engaged with him in a common employment. I am not prepared to say that this Court would import any such term into a contract of service without clear proof that the parties themselves had agreed to it; but the question would only have arisen for decision in the present case if the plaintiff and the men whose negligence caused the injury had been engaged upon a work over which the defendants exercised control. The defendants, however, were only the agents of the military authorities in engaging and paying the men, and for this service they charged a commission. They employed a timekeeper, who engaged and paid the men, and the defendants received from the military authorities the amount of the wages at which they had undertaken to supply the men. That undertaking was embodied in their tender, which was "for the supply of native labour." Having supplied the labour, the defendants ceased to have any control over the men, beyond paying the men, and, if thereto required, dismissing the men. They had no right to give any command as to the manner in which the work should be performed, and cannot, therefore, be held liable for any injury resulting from the negligent performance of that work. The persons who could and did give such commands were the military authorities, and it is to them only that the plaintiff should look for compensation for the serious injury done to him. There must be absolution from the instance, with costs.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZÉ.]

S.A. BREWERIES V. HARBOUR BOARD. 1903. Aug. 14th. „ 17th.

Collision on road—Negligence.

This was an action brought by the South African Breweries, carrying on business in Cape Town, against the Table Bay Harbour Board, to recover £40 damages for the loss of a mule, in consequence of the negligence of the defendants' servants.

The declaration set out that on or about the 19th May, 1903, a certain traction-engine belonging to the defendants, with two trailer wagons attached, driven or under the charge of the defendants' servants, acting in that behalf, collided in Buitenkant-street, Cape Town, with a certain wagon, drawn by two mules, and that, in consequence, one of the mules was so injured as to necessitate its being shot. The cause was the careless and negligent driving of the defendants' said servants, and the negligent manner in which the said trailer wagons had been loaded by the defendants' servants. The plaintiffs had sustained damages to the amount of £40, the value of the said mule, but the defendants refused to pay this sum or any portion thereof. The plea admitted that the defendants refused to pay the plaintiffs £40 or any other sum, and said that the injury to the said mule was caused by the negligent driving of the plaintiffs' servant in charge of the said mules, and that had he driven the mules with due and proper skill and care, he would have avoided the said collision. Wherefore defendants asked that the said claim should be dismissed, with costs.

The replication was general.

Mr. Gardiner for the plaintiffs. Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Bisset), for the defendants.

George Hansell Clother, a commercial traveller in the plaintiffs' employ, and formerly a clerk of works, said he saw the collision, and he prepared a plan (produced) of the neighbourhood where the accident took place. He was driving from Commercial-street or Boom-street into Buitenkant-street. He was riding in his own cart. The traction engine was going up towards Roeland-street ahead of him; he was travelling in the same direction. He noticed a wagon belonging to the South African Breweries. He saw the last trailer collide with a case on a wagon near the stoep. Its near wheel was at the stoep, and the mules were near the granite step, facing into Boom-street. The wagon must have been right in the sluit at the time of the collision. The collision occurred by some timber on the last trailer striking a case on the wagon. In forcing the wagon back the trailer caused the dissel-boom to swing back, and one of the mules reared and its foot was caught under the wheel of the second trailer. The timber was overhanging eighteen inches over the nave of the wheel. The driver of the wagon did his best to keep the mules straight, but the engine proceeded for some time, though they called out to the engine-driver to stop. The engine man's explanation was that he was turning to the right into Roeland-street. Witness told him he ought to have been on the other side, so as to give the trailers room to swing round the corner. He took measurements, and he found that the marks of the trailer wheels on the offside were 6 ft. 3 in. from the stoep. The wagon that day was 5 ft. 10½ in. wide outside of case to case.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He did not see a cart in the road, which would have caused the engine to go out of its proper course. He did not see where the trailer was before the actual contact.

Bejarin Benjamin, driver in the plaintiffs' employ, said he was driving a wagon on the day named and was coming from Boom-street into Buitenkant-street, when he saw a traction engine going up Buitenkant-street. He turned his horses into the side of the street to avoid the traction engine, the same side as the accident occurred on. He did not see the acciden. occur. He passed along to Louw's bottle store. He heard some shouting. When he entered Buitenkant-street he did not see any cart about there.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: If he had been driver of the wagon he would have stopped when he saw the traction-engine.

By the Court: He did not see the wagon moving just before the accident happened.

James G. R. Shipman, superintendent of the stables of the S.A. Breweries, gave evidence as to the value of the mule, which he stated to be worth £40.

Andries, a coloured man, deposed that he was the driver of the wagon. He did not see the engine and trailers before he came around the corner; he only saw them when the engine was on him. He pulled in almost to the stoep, his near wheel being almost against the curb-stone. Witness did not see the flagman. The last trailer went against his wagon. He had drawn to the side to give way to the engine. The engine passed, but the trailer struck the wagon. The driver of the engine did not stop.

Sir Henry Juta: You say you didn't see the engine before it was right on you?

Witness: No.

So that I wasn't far wrong in saying that you were blind as well as deaf?—I can see very well.

In cross-examination by Sir Henry Juta, the witness said he could not go any further because there were two curbstones in the way. He passed the first curbstone when the engine was alongside the wagon. He drove between the stone and the engine. He drove past the engine and the first trailer; the second trailer struck the wagon.

Re-examined: When the first trailer passed witness the wagon was standing still.

By Kotzé, J.: The engine was in Buitenkant-street when witness first saw it. Witness and the engine were both in Buitenkant-street. Witness was in Roeland-street when he first saw the engine.

Charles L. Burton, commercial traveller, said he saw the accident. Witness was driving a trap directly in front of the Breweries' wagon. There were two or three wagons off-loading at the corner, and witness did not see the traction engine until he turned the corner. It was not on its proper side, but was going to its proper side at an angle of about thirty degrees. The traction engine was on one side of the stoep, and witness was at the other when he first saw it. Witness took his cart in between the two granite slabs, and lay about two feet from the stoep. Witness's pony had to jump over the one slab. When he saw the danger witness's boy whipped the pony, which jumped over the slab, the cart also going over the slab. But for this witness would also have had an accident. Witness stopped. He heard a great crash behind him, and saw the wagon against the stoep, the mule being under the trailer. The Breweries' wagon was about three yards behind witness. The Breweries' wagon was much wider than witness's cart, and witness had to jump his pony to get out of the way. The engine did not stop.

Cross-examined by Sir Henry Juta: Witness did not see the wagon behind him until after the accident. Witness was close to the stoep before he saw the danger.

By the Court: Witness jumped the slab to get out of the way of the second trailer. The engine had passed, and the driver could not see his predicament. Witness did not think he could have done anything else to avoid the danger. Witness came around the corner very quickly, and was in the fix before he saw the danger. Witness's samples were broken as a result of the jump.

Mr. Gardiner closed his case.

Sir Henry Juta called

James Lambert, the driver of the traction engine in question. He said he went towards the centre of the road, because there was a trap standing on the left-hand side of the road. There was a man in front with a flag, and another man was walking on the right-hand side of the first trailer. Witness saw the Breweries' wagon coming down Roeland-street. There was ample room for the wagon to pass. It passed the engine, and the man on the side of the first trailer. Witness had to come further into the centre of the street to avoid the granite slabs. The engine was going at about 2½ miles an hour; the wagon was coming at the pace of a slow trot. Witness did not know what happened behind him. Hearing the pilot blowing his whistle, and the people shouting, witness pulled up. The wagon could have stopped after passing the engine. There was about nine feet of road space on witness's right-hand side when the engine passed the wagon.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: Witness looked behind as the first trailer passed the wagon, and saw that there was about two feet between the trailer and wagon. The second trailer ought to have allowed more room than the first. The only conclusion witness could come to was that the wagon turned into the second trailer. Witness did not recollect seeing Mr. Burton's trap. Witness had been employed steering and driving traction engines by the Harbour Board for two years. Witness was just turning again to the side, after having passed the trap he had referred to, when the accident occurred.

Robert D. Kelly, traction engine inspector, in the employ of the Table Bay Harbour Board, said he visited the scene of the accident about half an hour after it occurred. The traction engine was 7 feet 6 inches wide, and the trailers, with the planks, measured about 7 feet in width. The planks were packed on the trailers lengthways. The greatest width of the planks was 22 inches, so that the planks could not have projected 18 inches, as stated. Witness saw the wagon, whose hind off wheel was nine feet from the stoep. The wagon was 4 feet 10 inches in width from wheel to wheel, so that between the near side wheel and the wall there would be 4 feet 2 inches. There were a lot of people walking about, and it was difficult to find the tracks. Witness found the tracks of the wagon. There were traces of it having turned towards the side of the road. There was a granite block on the side of the road which would have induced the driver of the wagon to turn to the centre of the road. Witness saw a dent in the case on the wagon.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He distinctly traced the tracks of the wagon. He was quite sure that the wagon came down nine feet from the kerb, measuring from the off-wheel.

Angelo Bosna stated that he was the flagman in front of the engine when the collision took place. There was a cart in front of the engine, and to pass it the engine had to go into the middle of the street. The South African Breweries wagon came alongside in the opposite direction, and passed the witness about three feet away.

Joseph Ross, employed by the Harbour Board, said that he accompanied the engine and trailers on the occasion in question. He was walking by the trailer on the right hand side. The engine had to go to the middle of the road to pass a cart. The brewery wagon came along, and passed the witness. He did not see the collision actually take place. When he saw the brewery wagon first it was about twenty yards away.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He did not notice any cart go past him before the brewery wagon came along.

By Maasdorp, J.: The brewery wagon, when it passed him, was about 5 feet from the trailer. He could not understand how the accident happened, because when the brewery wagon passed the witness it was quite clear of the trailer.

George Blommestein stated that he was the "steerer" of the traction engine. As he went up the street there was a one-horse trap in the way, and witness went somewhat to the middle of the road. When he saw the brewery wagon he turned his engine in to the left again. He saw nothing which would lead him to believe that there was likely to be an accident.

Sir H. Juta closed his case.

Counsel were then heard in argument on the facts.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (August 17).

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiffs sue the defendants for £40 daamges for the loss of a mule, said to have been injured by the negligence of defendants or their servants. Defendants deny negligence, and plead that the injury was caused by the negligence of plaintiffs' own servants. A traction engine with two trailers, belonging to the defendants, was passing up Buitenkant-street, and met a wagon drawn by two mules of the plaintiffs' coming down the street. The wagon came into collision with the second trailer, and a mule was so seriously injured that it had to be shot. Did the accident then arise from negligence, and, if so, was it from the negligence of the plaintiffs or of the defendants? Under ordinary circumstances, there is room enough for the engine and two ordinary vehicles to pass each other at the place of the accident. The engine had to swing over to the right to pass a cart standing on the left side. This would not be evidence of negligence, but would certainly call for a sharp look-out by those in charge of the engine. From the track of the trailer to the opposite wall was 6 feet 3 inches. The granite block spanning the gutter projects 4 feet 10 inches, leaving an open space of 1 foot 5 inches. Burton's evidence corroborated this, for in order to pass with his narrow buggy he had to jump his horse and cart over one of the granite blocks. The engine, therefore, was driven so close to the right side that no vehicle coming from the other direction could pass there. Even that was not proof of negligence on the part of the defendants. It seemed that up till the time when the wagon passed the engine there was no negligence on either side. The vehicles were brought into close quarters, as may often happen in crowded streets, and due care and diligence should be used to avoid accidents. Plaintiffs' wagon stopped before the accident. The defendants' engine should also have been stopped, and the driver was guilty of negligence in not stopping it. It was contended that the wagon should have stopped some time before it got up to the engine, but if ordinary traffic must give these engines so wide a berth, they would become an intolerable nuisance in the streets of the city. The wagon driver did his best to avoid the accident, and the engine driver was negligent. After the trailer struck the wagon and dragged the mule under its wheels it took a great deal of shouting from the passers-by to bring the engine to a stop. The injury to the mule was caused by the negligence of defendants' servants. The value of the mule was £40, and judgment must be given for that amount, with costs.

Kotzé, J.: The plaintiff complaints that the driver of the defendants' traction engine, with two trailers attached thereto, negligently came into collision with his wagon drawn by two mules, and that as a result one of the mules was so seriously injured that it had to be shot. By Act 6 of 1873 a locomotive may be lawfully used on a public road, provided it is not constructed or employed in such a way that it constitutes a public nuisance. The Act also leaves unaffected the common law remedy of any person to recover damages for any injury sustained by him in consequence of the use of a locomotive. The plaintiffs' case, however, does not rest on the defendants' traction engine being a public nuisance, and special damage suffered in consequence, but on the alleged negligence of the driver in charge of the engine. Now, although a locomotive may be lawfully on a public road, those who so employ it are under a duty to exercise reasonable care and skill towards all persons likewise lawfully using the road. What amount of care and skill will be considered reasonable must very much depend upon the particular circumstances of each case. And certainly the driver of a traction engine, like the driver of a motor car, regard being had to the great power and, in a crowded thoroughfare, the danger of the machine, should at least use the same amount of care and diligence which a person of ordinary prudence would exercise under the circumstances. The plaintiffs have to establish affirmatively that there has been such a want of care and diligence, as I have described, displayed by the defendants' servants, and that this was the direct cause of the collision, in order to entitle them to succeed in this action.

In the first place, it has been said that the traction engine with the two trailers was on the wrong side of the street, and that this raises some presumption of negligence. This may be true where it is coupled with other circumstances, as, for instance, where a driver is about to turn a corner in a crowded street. But the mere fact of being on the wrong side of the road is not per se sufficient proof of negligence. It is not like a case where the maxim res ipsa loquitur applies, and it may be satisfactorily explained. It will, therefore, be necessary to consider this fact in connection with the other material facts of the case. The evidence shows that the engine was drawing two trailers loaded with timber, and was proceeding up Buitenkant-street. As it neared the upper portion of this street, where there are still old-fashioned stoeps to the houses on either side, and where the street is in consequence somewhat narrower, the driver, in order to avoid a cart or buggy standing on the left or proper side of the street, steered the engine over on to his right or off-side of the street. This caused the trailers to come round with a curve or angle towards the other side of the street, and did not leave sufficient room for an ordinary vehicle, such as a cart or wagon, coming from the opposite direction and keeping on its proper side to pass with safety. There happen to be two granite slabs or blocks placed over an open and flat storm drain, each leading from the street to a stoep. When the trailers were approaching one of these slabs, the witness Bertram came up with his cart from the opposite direction and on his proper side of the street, and it was only by whipping up his horse and going over the slab that he escaped a collision with the second trailer. Meanwhile, the plaintiff's driver had come round from Roeland-street with a wagon drawn by two mules. He passed three wagons standing in Buitenkant-street, at Hoffman's stores, on the same side of the street, and, as the engine driver had by this time commenced to steer his locomotive towards the centre of the street, the driver of the wagon, by keeping to the left, passed the engine on the proper side. Seeing what was happening to Mr. Bertram's cart, the plaintiff's driver pulled up between the two granite slabs, and almost immediately after that some planks loaded on the second trailer struck the load on the plaintiff's wagon, which turned the front wheels of the wagon half round. This caused the mules to rear and plunge, and one of the mules was so seriously injured that it had to be destroyed. The wagon, when the driver pulled it up, had its rear wheels on the side of the storm drain, and was consequently as close to the stoep on the proper side of the street as it could possibly be expected to be. There is a conflict of evidence as to whether there was sufficient room for the plaintiff's wagon to have safely passed the trailers. The defendant's witnesses maintain that there was, and the plaintiff's witnesses affirm that there was not. I am satisfied that while there was sufficient room for the wagon to pass the engine there was not sufficient space to enable it to clear the second trailer. The engine-driver, Lambert, says that when the wagon passed him on the proper side it was about two feet from the engine. The steersman on the engine states that in making a turn with the engine an extra space of three feet should be allowed for the second trailer to pass safely an object passed by the engine. It seems to me, therefore, that those in charge of the engine were at fault in making too wide a turn and keeping too much to the wrong side of the street, and not allowing sufficient room for a vehicle coming from the opposite direction to pass on its proper side. When it appeared that Mr. Bertram could not pass the second trailer, and only escaped a collision by jumping his horse and cart over the granite slab on the side of the street, the engine which was drawing that trailer along should immediately have been stopped. An engine with trailers attached to it should be handled with due care and skill, and on this particular occasion there was no one in the employ of the defendant on the back trailer to warn the engine driver or the steersman on the locomotive in front of what was going to happen behind. A man with a suitable whistle could at once have stopped the engine, and so prevented the damage done to the plaintiff. This seems to me a simple and reasonable precaution to have taken. The engine sets and keeps a number of trailers in motion, and if those in charge of the locomotive have in a public street to look in front of them, then seeing, as has been proved in this case, that danger may arise at the back, proper and suitable precaution should be taken to provide against that. The Harbour Board has, in my opinion, failed in its duty in this respect, and I think the plaintiff company has made out a prima facie case against the defendant. But now the defendant maintains that the plaintiff's driver was guilty of contributory negligence. The rule of law on the subject is clear. It is not enough for the defendant to assert that the plaintiff's driver was negligent. He must satisfy the Court that such negligence or want of diligence, if any, was the direct and immediate cause of the collision. Or, to put it in another way, although there may have been negligence on the part of the plaintiff's driver, if the defendant's servants could by the exercise of due and proper care have avoided the collision, the plaintiff will be entitled to recover. If, as the defendants desire to make uot, the driver of the wagon was to blame by driving against the trailer, I should have expected either that the off mule attached to the wagon would have been injured in a different manner, or that the wagon would not have been so much to the side of the street with its near wheels in the open drain. It was pressed upon us, with much ability, by Sir Henry Juta, that the plaintiff's driver, when he turned from Roeland-street into Buitenkant-street, should have kept to the right, that is in this instance the wrong side of the street, and so have passed on. No doubt he might have done that, but instead of doing so he first passed these wagons standing at Hoffman's store on his side of the street, and then seeing the engine being steered towards the centre of the street, he passed it on his proper side. It was only after he had done this that he noticed he could not pass the second trailer, and pulled up. Those in charge of the engine also knew that, and should have stopped the machine. The man walking in front of the engine with a flag, who is in the defendant's employ, did not warn the plaintiff's driver. It cannot be successfully maintained that the plaintiff's driver knowingly or carelessly put the wagon in danger. Under the circumstances, I think the act of the defendant's servants, and not that of the plaintiff's driver,, was the direct cause of what occurred. The plea of contributory negligence therefore fails. As the value of the mule is not disputed, our judgment should be infavour of the plaintiff for £40 and costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C. K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

TRIAL CASES.

HUNT V. HUNT. { 1903. Aug. 17th.

This was an action brought by Douglas Hunt against his wife, Elizabeth Hunt (born Van der Hoven), for the restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce. Mr. Close was for the plaintiff, and the defendant was in default.

Mr. Close (for plaintiff): The defendant has been summoned by edictal citation. There was personal service. The parties were married in Johannesburg on the 29th September, 1892, under ante-nuptial contract. On the 3rd September, 1898, the defendant wrongfully and maliciously left the plaintiff, who now asks for a restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce, and forfeiture of all benefits under the marriage, with costs of suit.

Douglass Hunt stated that in 1898 a son was born in Johannesburg, issue of the marriage, and the parties afterwards went to England. In England the defendant announced her intention of going back to her parents. Witness objected, but she persisted, and finally left in the month of September, and had not since returned to him. In January last year she announced her intention of not returning at all. His married life had been a very unhappy one, owing to money matters. The defendant was the daughter of a very wealthy man, and witness was a clerk in the Standard Bank in Johannesburg. She was continually running him into debt, through her extravagant habits, and witness had unsuccessfully attempted to keep her within the limits of his income. He had to allow one policy of £500 on his life to lapse, but there was one of £300 still in force. In December, 1901, he understood that everything would be satisfactorily arranged by her father, but he suddenly discovered that she had again gone to England.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Who is Maud, referred to in this letter?]

Witness: My sister, my lord.

The defendant says that Maud had taken the part of a mother towards the child?—Yes, my lord, I had to leave the child with my sister.

Decree granted, the defendant to return on or before September 30, failing which a rule to be granted calling upon the defendant to show cause on the 12th October why a decree of divorce should not be granted, the plaintiff declared to have the custody of the child, the defendant to have forfeited all the benefits under the ante-nuptial contract, personal service to be effected.

Postea (October 12).

The Court granted a decree of divorce.

ALBERTYN V. ALBERTYN.

This was an action brought by Carl Albertyn, of Murraysburg, against his wife, Catherine Albertyn (born Benson), of Orange-street, Cape Town, for the restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce, the forfeiture of all benefits under the ante-nuptial contract, and the custody of the children.

The declaration set forth that the parties were married in September, 1899, under ante-nuptial contract. There were two children of the marriage. In January, 1903, the parties were living at Bredasdorp, and the plaintiff left for Murraysburg, to take up an appointment, the defendant agreeing to follow him. Thereafter the defendant refused to join the plaintiff, and had maliciously deserted him. The defendant's plea denied that she agreed to follow the defendant, and denied that she maliciously deserted him. The plaintiff had neglected and refused to support her, and had rendered her position intolerable. She claimed in reconvention the proceeds of a certain sale of furniture, a decree of separation a mensa et thoro, the custody of the younger child, and a reasonable sum for its support. The plea in reconvention denied that the plaintiff refused to render an account of the sale of furniture, which was sold on the defendant's account. He was prepared to render an account, and pay over the amount.

Mr. Gardiner (with him Mr. C. W. de Villiers) for the plaintiff; Mr. Benjamin for the defendant.

Mr. Gardiner said that since the pleadings had been filed, £21 had been tendered.

Mr. Benjamin said that his client did not intend to defend the action for the restitution of conjugal rights. He was instructed to apply for the custody of the younger child, which was fourteen months' old.

Mr. Gardiner said that the plaintiff was willing to give the wife custody of the younger child, with the usual order of reasonable access. He thought the defendant's counsel should withdraw the allegations of cruelty.

[De Villiers, C.J.: We must assume he cannot prove them if he withdraws.]

Mr. Gardiner then called the plaintiff,

Carl Frederick Albertyn, scab inspector, residing at Murraysburg, stated that he was married to his wife in October, 1899, and they lived happily until May, 1901. About that time they quarrelled, but having become reconciled, they lived happily until the end of the year. Later on, he again had reason to find fault with his wife's conduct. In January, 1902, he got his present appointment in Murraysburg, and he left his wife, who was to follow him. In February all arrangements were made for his wife to come to Murraysburg, but she sent a number of telegrams postponing the date of her departure. On April 4 he received a letter stating that she had decided never to return to him. On the day he got the letter he came up to Cape Town, and found his wife was staying in Simon's Town. He saw her, but she twice refused to return. On April 18 he wrote to her saying that if she would return, his house was open to receive her, but he received no reply.

Mr. Gardiner asked that the plaintiff should be allowed costs, because he had to unnecessary expense, owing to the fact that the defendant had persisted in the charge of cruelty, of which no particulars would be given to the plaintiff.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is defendant in a position to pay costs?]

I understand that the defendant herself has no money, but her relatives have. A sum of £21 has, however, been paid to the defendant by the plaintiff as the result of the sale of the furniture.

Mr. Benjamin said that the defendant had not received the £21.

Mr. Gardiner said that he had made a mistake; the £21 had been tendered to the defendant, but was refused. Under these circumstances, he would ask that the plaintiff be allowed to take that £21 as his costs.

Decree granted, the defendant ordered to receive the plaintiff on or before 30th September, failing which a rule to be taken calling upon the defendant to show cause on 12th October why a decree of divorce should not be granted; the plaintiff declared to be entitled to the elder child of the marriage, and the defendant declared to have forfeited all benefits under the ante-nuptial contract; no order as to costs.

Postea (October 12): The Court granted a decree of divorce.

HARRIS V. GAFFOOR.

This was an action brought by Elias Harris, stock and share broker, of Cape Town, to recover the sum of £1,949 15s. 5d., from Abdol Gaffoor, merchant, of Cape Town, in respect of certain share transactions.

The declaration set out that the plaintiff was a stock and share broker, carrying on business at Cape Town, and defendant was a merchant carrying on business at the same place. From time to time plaintiff had purchased shares in various companies for or on behalf of defendant, under a system which is known as "cover," the system being as follows: The defendant instructed the plaintiff from time to time to purchase shares, which shares plaintiff held until instructed to sell them. If at any time defendant's indebtedness to plaintiff in respect of the total amount of the purchase price advanced by the defendant and the interest due thereon exceeded the market value of the shares held by plaintiff, then it was and became defendant's duty to deposit with plaintiff such amount of money as would cover the difference, which amount of money was commonly called "cover." By established and recognised custom, a stock and share broker purchasing shares on behalf of a client under the system of "cover" was entitled, after due notice, to sell the shares held by him on behalf of such client, if the client should at any time fail to provide the requisite amount of "cover." On or about 17th November, defendant's indebtedness exceeded the then value of the shares held by the plaintiff to the extent of upwards of £1,000, and thereupon plaintiff gave notice that he would sell the shares then held by him on behalf of defendant, unless defendant provided further cover to the amount of £500, which defendant failed to do; and again on 10th March, 1903, plaintiff again gave defendant notice of his intention to sell. Thereafter, in or about the month of March, 1903, plaintiff sold the shares then held by him for defendant, as he was entitled to do under the aforesaid custom. Defendant was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of £1,949 15s. 5d., being the balance due after deducting the amounts realised by the sale of the shares. As an alternative to the aforesaid claim plaintiff stated that on or about 24th September, 1902, the parties agreed to the terms and conditions contained in a letter annexed. Thereafter the defendant signed two promissory notes for the sums of £100 and £150 respectively, which notes were dishonoured on 29th November, 1902, the date when the said notes became respectively due. In or about the month of March, 1903, plaintiff sold the shares then held by him, as he was entitled to do under the said agreement, the amount of £1,000 therein referred to being then exceeded. Wherefore plaintiff prayed (subject to a tender to return the promissory notes) for (a) judgment for the sum of £1,949 15s. 5d.; (b) interest a tempore moræ; (c) alternative relief; (d) costs of suit. In case the Court should find that the plaintiff was not entitled to sell the shares, plaintiff was willing to deliver to the defendant upon the payment of the amount of defendant's indebtedness, viz., £10,353 10s. 5d., an equivalent number of shares to those sold by him in March, 1903, and claimed as a further alternative, judgment for the sum of £10,353 10s. 5d., interest a tempore moræ, alternative relief, and costs of suit.

Mr. Benjamin for plaintiff; defendant in default.

De Villiers, C.J.: In giving judgment, the Court must not be supposed to hold that the custom as to what is called "cover" exists. I should not wish to say that the custom exists without evidence. I know nothing about the custom.

Mr. Benjamin: That being so, I will ask for judgment for the sum of £1,949 15s. 5d.

Judgment was entered in terms of the first prayer of the declaration, with costs.

Ex parte BAKER.

Mr. Benjamin appeared for the petitioner.

The petition set forth that the petitioner was the pastor of the Wale-street Baptist Church, which was administered by the pastor and eight deacons, one of whom was absent in England. On the 23rd March last, at a meeting of members of the church, it was decided to consolidate the different loans on the church property, and for this purpose arrangements had been made to obtain a loan of £10,000. The Registrar of Deeds, however, refused to sanction the loan without the signature of the absent deacon, who was present at the meeting of the church members at which the resolution in question was arrived at. The church property was registered in the names of the pastor and eight deacons.

An order was granted as prayed.

Ex parte DIXON AND ANOTHER.

Will—Vesting of bequest—Strydom v. Strydom (11 Juta 425) followed.

This was an application for leave to pass transfer of certain property.

The petition set forth that the petitioners were William Cornelius Dixon (in his capacity as executor dative in the estate of the late Adriaan Allettus Johannes Coetzee, and of his subsequently deceased spouse, Jacoba Petronella Kotze), and Alletta Alida Regina Coetzee, in her capacity as executrix testamentary of the estate of her late husband, Cornelius Albertus Coetzee,

The late Adriaan Coetzee and his wife executed a joint will in 1870, whereby they bequeathed all their immovable property to the children born of the marriage, eight in number, of whom the late Cornelius Albertus Coetzee was one. The first named petitioner, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the will, signed a power of attorney authorising transfers to be passed to the eight heirs of the immovable property found in the estate. The second named petitioner, whose husband survived his father but pre-deceased his mother, claimed to have the share of her late husband transferred to his estate, irrespective of the five children at present alive. The Registrar of Deeds had, however, rejected the deeds of transfer. In their will the testators declared to nominate and appoint each other reciprocally executor or executrix of the will and administrator or administratrix of their estate, and also guardian of their minor children. They appointed the survivor heir or heiress of all the property of the first-dying, but stipulated that the survivor should be obliged or bound to give to the children of the marriage a proper education, and to maintain them until their majority, or marriage, when "to each of them, as, or in lieu of paternal or maternal portion shall be paid out or secured such sum of money as the survivor conscientiously, and according to the state of the estate, at that moment shall find due to him or her, the testators further securing and bequeathing after the death of both, all the immovable property in the estate to the joint children, together with their lawful descendants." In his report the Registrar referred to the will as most ambiguous, it being difficult to decide what the intention of the testators really was. The petitioners prayed for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to pass transfer to the estate of the late Cornelius Albertus Coetzee irrespective of the five children who have survived him.

Mr. Gardiner for the applicants.

In argument, Mr. Gardiner referred to passages in the will which referred to heirs, as proving that it was in the contemplation of the testators to appoint their children heirs. He also alluded to a condition in the will by which the survivor of the testators was given power to alter the same except in regard to the institution of heirs, and contended that the immovable property vested in the children on the death of the first dying, and not on the death of the survivor, and that the survivor only had a usufructuary and not a fiduciary interest. Counsel cited the case of Strydom v. Strydom (11 Juta, p. 425), in support of his contention.

De Villiers, C.J.: Upon the principles laid down in the case of Strydom v. Strydom, the Court is of opinion that there was a vested interest in the present case, and that the executor was justified in selling. An order will be made in terms of the petition.

EXECUTORS OF MOODIE v. CURATOR OF MOODIE. { 1903. Aug. 17th. „ 24th.

Legacy — Condition — Uncertain day — Vesting — Will — Construction—Gift to children on attaining twenty-one — Intermediate income for maintenance — Discretionary power.

A testator bequeathed to his daughter E. the sum of £20,000 "on attaining the age of twenty-one years," and directed that during her minority the interest or income of the legacy, "or so much thereof as may be necessary," shall be paid to his wife, "such interest or income to be paid or expended for or towards the maintenance or education of the minor." The daughter survived the testator, but died at seventeen, unmarried and intestate.

Held, that the legacy had vested before her death and was transmitted to her heirs ab intestato.

This was a special case stated for the judgment of the Court.

The statement of the case was as follows: (1) The plaintiffs are the executors testamentary in the estate of the late George Pigot Moodie, appointed under his last will and testament. (2) The defendant is Sir Henry Hubert Juta in his capacity as curator ad litem of George Frederick Arthur, Charles Alfred and Minna Sophia, the minor children of the said George Pigot Moodie, hereinafter called the testator, and of his late widow Rosa Minna Pigot Moodie. (3) The testator died on the 2nd November, 1891, leaving a will duly executed on the 24th June, 1889, of which will plaintiffs annex a printed copy, and pray that the said copy may be considered as forming part of this case. (4) The testator left his wife, Rosa Minna Pigot Moodie and the three aforesaid minor children, and also his youngest child, Edith Rosa, him surviving, but his said wife died on or about the 17th January, 1896, and the said Edith Rosa died in the early part of the year 1903 at the age of seventeen (17) years or thereabouts, unmarried and intestate. (5) The testator bequeathed to his son, George Frederick Arthur (who was his eldest son), or to his eldest son surviving at the death of his wife, certain landed property described in the said will, and the sum of forty thousand pounds (£40,000) sterling, if and when he should attain the age of twenty-one (21) years. (6) He also bequeathed to each of his children other than the eldest son as aforesaid the sum of twenty thousand pounds (£20,000) sterling, in the case of sons on their attaining the age of twenty-one (21) years, and in the case of daughters on their attaining that age or marrying previously with the consent of their mother or guardians, as the case might be. He also made certain other bequests to relatives and others, as will appear from a copy of the said will. (7) He further instituted and appointed his children jointly and in equal shares to be sole and universal heirs of all the residue and the remainder of his estate, and directed that during the minority of any of his children the interest of any legacy or inheritance of such minor child or so much thereof as may be necessary should be paid to his said wife, and after her death to the lawfully appointed guardian of the minor, such interest to be expended for the maintenance or education of the minor. The plaintiffs contend that the legacy of £20,000 to the youngest child, Edith Rosa, as also her share of the residue of the estate of the late George Pigot Moodie were vested in her at the date of her death, and that an executor must be appointed to administer her estate, and to distribute the said legacy as in intestacy amongst her brothers and sister represented by the defendant, succession duty being payable thereon. The defendant contends that the said legacy to Edith Rosa and her share of the residue of the estate of the late George Pigot Moodie had not vested in her at the date of her death, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to administer and distribute the same amongst her brothers and sisters. Wherefore the parties pray for judgment upon their respective contentions, with the cost of this suit.

The will contained the following direction: I direct that during the minority of any of my children the interest or income of any legacy or inheritance of such minor child or so much thereof as may be necessary shall be paid to my said wife, or after her death to the lawfully appointed guardian of the minor, such interest or income to be paid or expended for or towards the maintenance or education of the minor.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Gardiner) for the plaintiffs; Sir H. Juta, K.C., for the defendants.

Mr. Schreiner said that his contention was that on the death of Mr. Moodie, the right, both in respect of the £20,000 and in respect of the residue of the estate, vested in each of the children, although the enjoyment was postponed, and that there was no postponement of the vesting until the coming-of-age or marriage of the legatees. That was the neat point at issue between the parties.

The question is whether the survivor had a mere beneficiary interest in the estate or not. The terms of the will clearly show tht the testator meant to institute the children as heirs; on any other supposition, these terms would be contradictory. The children, therefore, were appointed as joint heirs. See Oosthuizen v. Mock (1 Roscoe, 330).

[De Villiers, C.J.: The whole question is, did the property vest on the death of the first dying or not?]

Yes; but see Rahl v. De Jager (1 Juta, 38). I admit that that case does not go as far as I ask the Court to go now, but see Strydom v. Strydom's Trustees (11 S.C.R., 423). See also In re Zipp (Buch. 1878, p. 132). The will shows that the property was left to the survivor for the education of the children. We find a similar bequest In re Henning, Ex parte Strydom (7 Juta, 53), and Wiese and Wiese v. Burger (5 Searle, 253). That case is not quite in accordance with Strydom's case. The respondent does not wish to take up any position inconsistent with the doctrine laid down in the case of Human v. Human's Executors (10 Juta, 172). See also Van Leeuwen's Censura Forin (3, 8, 34) and Sande on Restraints (3, 4, 7). In Strydom v. Strydom's Trustees it was held to be a question of intention whether a testamentary right is to vest in the receiver immediately on the death of the testator or not, but that there is a conclusive presumption of immediate vesting where the gift is made to a person alive at the testator's death, and no mention is made of any supervision or postponement. See also Van Breda v. The Master (7 Juta, 360) and Voet (7, 1, 12). English law is not quite in accordance with our own law on this point. See Theobald on Wills (p. 506 and seq., 5th edition). As Van Leeuwen puts it, the only question is, was there any intention to postpone the enjoyment of the bequest. As to English cases, see Fox v. Fox (15 Ir. Ch., 89). See also In re Wintle (2 Ch., 1896—711). There it was argued that Fox v. Fox was wrongly decided, but that was not so.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (for the defendants): These English cases are not in point. In the case of this will it is quite clear that the legacy did not vest until the son had attained his majority. If clause 8 of the will does not give the survivor a usufructuary interest, why was it inserted at all? Then as to the share of the residue of the estate, we say it vested in the survivor.

Mr. Schreiner (in reply): The eldest son survived the testator, and on the death of the testator he had a vested right unless he happened to die before his mother. Edith Rosa has a right under the will, and her right cannot be subject to any alienation. See Strydom's case (11 S.C.R., 423).

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (August 24):

De Villiers, C. J.: The question raised in this special case is whether or not a legacy of £20,000 and a certain inheritance left by the last will of the late George Moodie to his daughter Edith, vested in her upon his death or was contingent upon her attaining the age of twenty-one years or marrying previously with the consent of her mother. Edith was one of the several children of the testator, and the legacy in question was given in the following terms: "I give and bequeath to each of my children, other than the eldest son, in the case of sons on attaining the age of twenty-one years, and in the case of daughters on attaining that age, or marrying previously, with the consent of their mother, the sum of £20,000." In regard to the eldest son the testator bequeathed to him the sum of £40,000, "if and when he shall attain the age of twenty-one years." The residue of the estate, after payment of legacies, is disposed of as follows: "Subject as aforesaid, I institute and appoint my children jointly and in equal shares to be sole and universal heirs of all the residue and remainder of my estate and if one or more of such children shall die in my lifetime having issue, such issue shall come into the place of the deceased parent." By a later clause (8th) the testator directs as follows: "I direct that during the minority of any of my children the interest or income of any legacy, or inheritance of such minor child, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be paid to my said wife, or after her death to the lawfully-appointed guardian of the minor, such interest or income to be paid or expended for or towards the maintenance or education of the minor." The testator died in 1891, leaving his wife and children, including Edith, him surviving, the wife died in 1896, and Edith died in the present year at the age of seventeen, unmarried and intestate. The plaintiffs, as executors testamentary, contend that the legacy to Edith and her share of inheritance vested in her during her lifetime, and have been transmitted to her heirs ab intestato while the defendant as the curator ad litem of her minor brothers and sister, contends that neither the legacy nor the inheritance vested, and that the amount should be administered as part of the estate of the late George Moodie.

In regard to the share of inheritance accruing to Edith there can be no doubt whatever that it vested in her on her father's death. There is no condition attached to the institution of heirs save and except that during their minority only the interest should be paid to them, but such a condition cannot affect the question whether the inheritance itself vested in the heirs on the death of the testator.

A more difficult question is raised by the terms in which the legacy of £20,000 was given to each of the children, except the eldest son. The defendant contends that the bequest is conditional on the children attaining majority or marrying, and that, as Edith did not reach majority or marry before her death, the condition never was fulfilled in her case. The time fixed for the payment of the legacy is certainly an uncertain day, and prima facie, therefore, according to the rules of construction adopted in the Roman law, the arrival of the day should be treated as a condition attached to the legacy. I have, however, had occasion in previous cases to point out that this general rule is subject to indications of a contrary intention contained in the will. If the uncertain time was inserted in the will merely for the purpose of postponing the enjoyment of the legacy itself, it was held, under the Dutch as well as under the Roman law, that the bequest should be treated as unconditional. The rule, as stated in Digest 36, 2, 26, S 1, has been treated by Voet and other commentators, as applicable to the construction of wills under the Dutch law, and has been more than once recognised in this Court. The passage purports to contain the response of Papinian in reference to a case where a testator expressed his desire that a hundred aurei should be given to his foster child by his heirs, and that the money should be transferred to a third party in trust, to pay the interest to the child until his twenty-fifth year, and on his attaining that year to pay him the capital itself. The response was that, although the child had died before attaining his twenty-fifth year, he transmitted the fidei-commissum to his heir, and the reason given was that it would seem that a definite age had been prescribed for the payment of the capital and not that a condition had been attached to a fidei-commissum left unconditionally. The terms in which this reason is stated are: "Nam certam aetatem sorti solvendae praestitutam videri, non pure fidei-commisso relicto conditionem insertam," and are translated by Mr. McGregor in his excellent and useful commentary as follows: "Because this specified age was deemed to be the time fixed for the paying over of the capital, and did not seem to be a condition inserted in a fidei-commissum bequeathed subject to a condition." I venture, however, to think that the proper rendering of the term "pure" is "unconditionally," and not "subject to a condition." Voet adds that it is a question of intention in each case whether an uncertain day has been introduced as a condition, or for the purpose only of postponing payment. To illustrate this view, he cites a passage in the Digest (36, 1, 46), in which the opinion of Javolenus on the following case is given: "Sejus Saturninus, chief pilot from the British Fleet, had by will, instituted as his fiduciary heir Valerius Maximus, captain of a trireme, with the request that he would restore the inheritance to Sejus Oceanus on his attaining the age of sixteen years; Sejus Oceanus, however, died before attaining that age, whereupon his uncle claimed the estate as his next of kin, but Maximus, the captain, claimed it himself on the ground that the person to whom he had been directed to restore it had died. The opinion on the case was that the fidei-commissum vested during the lifetime of Oceanus, "that is to say, if in postponing the time of payment the testator should appear to have committed the guardianship to the fiduciary heir rather than to have attached an uncertain day to the fidei-commissum." It is clear, then, from this statement of the Roman rules of construction that even where a legacy was payable on an uncertain day, a very slight indication of an intention to the contrary was held to rebut the presumption that he intended the legacy to be conditional. The fact that the testator had directed the payment of interest to the legatee until the capital should become payable, was regarded as an indication of his intention that the legacy should vest before the legatee attained the prescribed age. I can find no trace in the Roman law of the distinction drawn by some of the English courts between cases in which the trustee is directed to apply the whole income for maintenance in the meantime, and those in which a discretion is conferred on the trustee to apply less than the whole income for that purpose. The ecclesiastical courts derived their rules of construction from the civil law, and the courts of equity followed the rules which had thus been established, and the distinction to which I have referred must have been of later growth. It is, moreover, by no means clear that the distinction would still be recognised at the present day. In the case of Fox v. Fox (19 L.R. Eq., 266), Jessel, M.R., said: "Being opposed to the frittering away of general rules, and thinking that such rules, so long as they remain rules, ought to be followed, I hold that a gift contained in a direction to pay and divide amongst a class at a specific age, followed by a direction to apply the whole income for maintenance in the meantime, is vested, and not the less so because there is a discretion conferred on the trustees to apply less than the whole income for that purpose." That the learned Judge did not intend to confine this rule to the case in which there is a direction to divide the gift among a class is clear from a previous passage in his judgment, in which he expressly says that there is no valid distinction between such a case and that in which there is a gift to each of a class in equal shares on attaining the requisite age. The correctness of the Master of the Rolls' judgment has been doubted in some subsequent cases, but in the recent case of Turney v. Turney (2, Ch. Div. 1889, p. 739), Lindley, M.R., remarked: "I am by no means satisfied that Fox v. Fxo was wrongly decided. So far as I have considered it, my impression is that the decision is very good sense and very good law." But whatever the correct rule of the English courts may be, I am satisfied that the rule, as laid down by Jessel, M.R., correctly represents the state of our own law on the point.

In the present case, the direction was that, during the minority of the children, the interest or income of any legacy or inheritance of such minor children, "or so much thereof as may be necessary," shall be paid or expended for or towards the maintenance or education of the minor. The whole of the interest would have to be paid to the minor, unless the trustees should find that less would be sufficient for her education and maintenance, but in the latter case, I take it, the interest not so paid would have been allowed to accumulate for her benefit. The defendant's counsel, however, contends that the direction in the present case cannot be regarded as indicating an intention that the legacy of Edith should vest before she attained majority or married, seeing that the direction equally applies to the legacy given to the eldest son, which, it is assumed, cannot possibly vest until he attains the age of twenty-one years. It is not necessary to decide whether this is a correct assumption, for the terms in which the legacy is given to the eldest son are wholly different from those in which the gifts were made to the other children. The gift to the eldest son was to take effect "if and when he shall attain the age of twenty-one years," and it would by no means follow that if the legacy to him were held to be contingent on his being the eldest son at the time he reached that age, the legacy to the other children should be held to be contingent on their reaching the same age. I am clearly of opinion that in their case the legacy vested on the death of the testator, and that, consequently, the judgment of the Court should be in terms of the plaintiffs' contention. The costs will be paid out of the testator's estate.

Kotzé, J.: The question in this case is whether a legacy of £20,000, bequeathed by the testator, George Pigot Moodie, to his daughter, Edith Rosa, vested on the death of the testator. The answer depends upon the cardinal rule of interpretation applicable to every testamentary disposition. The intention of the testator, which must be gathered from the terms of the will as a whole is to be our guide. The clauses of the will which have a bearing on the point are as follows:

"(2) And I, the said George Pigot Moodie, give and bequeath (4) to my said son or to my eldest son as aforesaid, the sum of £40,000, if and when he shall attain the age of 21 years.

"(5) To each of my children, other than my eldest son as aforesaid, in the case of sons on attaining the age of twenty-one years, and in the case of daughters on attaining that age or on marrying previously with the consent of their mother, or in case of their mother's death, with the consent of their guardians, the sum of £20,000.

"(8) I direct that during the minority of any of my children, the interest or income of any legacy or inheritance of such minor child, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be paid to my said wife, or after her death to the lawfully appointed guardian of the minor; such interest or income to be paid or expended for or towards the maintenance or education of the minor."

Edith Rosa Moodie survived the testator and died in the early part of the present year, at the age of seventeen and unmarried. Now, so far as she is concerned, the bequest to her is coupled with the mention of two periods of time, namely, the attaining of majority or marriage before attaining that age. This being so, regard must be had to the question whether the time mentioned relates to the bequest itself or merely refers to the payment thereof to the legatee. In the former instance, there is no vesting of the legacy, which lapses with the death of Edith Rosa; whereas in the latter instance there is a vesting, and on the death of Edith Rosa the legacy passes to her heirs. Which of these is the correct conclusion to come to in the present case depends, as I have observed, on the intention of the testator and the language he has employed in the will. This is plain from all the authorities, who give numerous instances, chiefly drawn from the Corpus Juris, illustrating this general rule. Thus, in Code 6, 53, 5, we find it laid down that a bequest in the following form, "I give and bequeath to my daughter 100 aurei, which she shall receive when she has attained the age of majority," is not a conditional legacy, but only the right of claiming it is postponed until majority. Huber likewise says that "I will that 400 guilders shall be paid to John after the death of my wife" is a conditional bequest; but "I bequeath to John 400 guilders, which after my wife's death shall be paid out of the proceeds" is a pure legacy, and is transmitted to his heirs, if John dies before the wife, for the words containing the bequest are distinct from the words relating to the payment. It was so decided in the case of A. Wolters, plaintiff, against T. Friesma, defendant, on the 27th October, 1637. (Heed. Rechts., bk. 2, ch. 29.) Likewise where a testator said, "I bequeath 1,000 guilders to my niece, which my heir shall pay her on attaining majority or marriage," the legacy must be paid to her heirs if the niece should happen to die a minor or unmarried (Van Leeuwen, Com. 3, 9, 34). In the present case, if Clause 5 stood by itself it might be open to doubt whether the future day, which may or may not arrive and is wholly uncertain, does not amount to a condition having the effect of postponing the vesting of the bequest until the happening of the condition. Under such circumstances, Voet (36, 2, 2) says that if the legatee should happen to die there is no transmission of the bequest. So, if we read Clause 4 alone, it would appear that the testator, in dealing with the bequest to his eldest son, used words which, prima facie, show that he intended the legacy to him to be conditional, and only to vest if and when such son attained the age of 21 years; while in Clause 5 the testator worded the bequest differently, and said that he gives and bequeaths £20,000 to each of his children, other than his eldest son, "on attaining the age of 21 years, and in the case of daughters, on attaining that age or marrying previously." It may be contended that this difference in the wording of the bequest is not accidental but intentional, and that the testator had some reason for making the distinction with regard to his other children, and that, therefore, the time mentioned, that is to say, the words, "on attaining the age of 21 years or marrying previously," relate not to the bequest itself but to the day of payment, so that we have here to deal with a case of dies cedit sed non venit. But apart from this way of looking at the two bequests, the one in favour of the eldest son, the other to the remaining children, the different clauses of the will must be read together and construed as a whole in order to ascertain the real intention of the testator. Accordingly, it may happen that words which, taken by themselves, appear at first sight to be conditional or unconditional, may, when read in conjunction with the other clauses in the will, come to have an opposite meaning. This was very clearly pointed out by the Chief Justice in Van Breda v. The Master of the Supreme Court (7 Juta, 360). Clause 8 directs that during the minority of any of the testator's children the interest of any legacy or inheritance to any minor child, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended for or towards the maintenance or education of such minor child. This clause, it seems to me, manifests an intention on the part of the testator that the legacy or inheritance shall vest on his death, but that its enjoyment or receipt by the legatee or heir shall be deferred until the arrival of the stated time. For the interest having been directed to be expended for the use and benefit of the legatee or heir, the effect of what the testator has said is to give the principal sum, that is, the bequest or inheritance itself, in any event, to the legatee or heir. Van Leeuwen (Cens. for., 3, 8, 33) and Voet (l.c.) mention the case where a legacy was left to a foster-child, with a direction that it should be transferred to a third person, and that the child should up to his twenty-fifth year receive the interest, and on attaining that age the principal sum itself. It was held that on the death of the foster-child before the stipulated age the bequest passed to his heir. The reason for the decision was that the mentioning of the age of majority was for the purpose of paying out the legacy, and did not make the bequest conditional. The same principle is applicable to the present case. But it has been urged against this view that as Clause 8 refers to all the testator's children, it includes the eldest son. The clause, it is said, must have the same meaning with regard to him which it bears with respect to the other children, and as under Clause 4 the bequest to the son is clearly conditional, any argument sought to be drawn from the words of Clause 8 in favour of the other children is conclusively met by this circumstance. Now, this contention is open to a twofold objection. Assuming for a moment that the bequest in Clause 4 to the eldest son is conditional, that fact does not necessarily rebut the inference to be drawn from the words of Clause 8 in favour of the other children, for so far as they are concerned, there is nothing in the bequest to them in Clause 5 inconsistent with the construction which, both upon principle and authority, should be placed on the language of Clause 8. The testator may well have intended by Clause 4 that, although the eldest son should also during minority obtain the benefit of the interest of the bequest to him under Clause 8, the bequest itself should not vest until he attained the age of majority. In the next place, the mere use of the words "if and when he shall attain the age of twenty-one years" may be said to be controlled by what is stated by the testator in clause 8, and so these words which are prima facie conditional, do not after all import any condition. In the instance which I have quoted from the Code the words also were "when she shall have attained the age of majority," yet the legacy was held to have vested on the death of the legatee before attaining that age. Although this case must be decided according to our own law, it is satisfactory to know that the law of England, which seems to have borrowed much of the doctrine of vesting of legacies from the civil law, is in this respect similar to our own. In vol. 2 of Williams on Executors, at page 1098 (9th edition) I find several cases where the bequest was to the legatee when he or she shall attain the age of 21 years or marry with consent of executors and trustees, with a direction that in the meanwhile the interest shall be applied for the benefit of the legatee, and where it was held that the legacy vested on the death of the testator. I am of opinion that, both with regard to the legacy of Edith Rosa and her share of the residue of the testator's estate, the Court should declare that these were vested in her at the date of her death, and pass to her heirs. It is not necessary to say anything with regard to the appointment of an executor to her estate, or the payment of succession duty, for now that the question of vesting has been decided these matters will be regulated as by law provided.

APPEAL CASE.

CARLE v. DAWSON. } 1903. Aug. 17th.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Acting Resident Magistrate, of Wynberg.

Mr. Rainsford appeared for the appellant; respondent was in default.

The appellant, Carle, in his capacity as secretary of the Industrial Life Assurance Company, sued Dawson, a former agent of the society, for a refund of £14 12s. 6d., money received by him, and which he agreed to refund to the plaintiffs. Defendant was engaged by the company as an agent on an agreement terminable at 14 days' notice. The agreement provided that for each "life" insured through the instrumentality of the plaintiff, the defendant would at once be paid by the company, an amount equal to six times the amount of the first weekly premium, as well as 20 per cent. for all weekly collections; but that, in case the premiums were allowed to lapse, such lapses should be made good by the defendant by a refund of the amounts of six times the weekly premium. In January defendant gave two weeks' notice of his resignation, and on that date the company informed him that various lapses, amounting to £7 or £8, had occurred. It was subsequently ascertained that the amount which had so lapsed up to the time of the resignation was £9 0s. 10d., and defendant refunded £3 of this. After the resignation, there were further lapses amounting to £5 11s. 8d. Defendant, at the opening of the proceedings in the court below, tendered the amount of £6 0s. 10d., being the sum which had lapsed previous to his resignation, and the Magistrate gave judgment for plaintiff for this sum, with costs, excepting costs of the day which plaintiff was ordered to pay. In his reasons the Magistrate stated that he held that the conditions of the agreement were no longer in existence after the agency had ceased. The defendant could not after that date have received any consideration from the plaintiff company for any collections made, and it was not now possible for the plaintiff company to recover, the agreement having ceased before the lapsing of the £5 11s. 8d.

After hearing argument on the facts, the Court dismissed the appeal.

De Villiers, C.J.: The only question of importance which arises in this appeal is whether the lapses referred to in clause three are lapses occurring during the subsistence of the agreement, or whether they would include lapses which occurred after the agreement has come to an end. Now clearly the ordinary reading of a contract of this nature would be that a party makes himself liable only for lapses which are the results of any negligence which might occur while he has himself a control, and I am of opinion that, if the parties had intended to extend defendant's liability to lapses which might occur after he has ceased to be an agent, the contract would have expressly said so If the appellant's contention is correct, then the plaintiffs would not be bound to take any trouble to collect the premiums; they would just allow the matter to run on, and afterwards claim the amount from the defendant, who had no further control. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

ENSLIN V. ZUIDMEER. { 1903. Aug. 17th

Interdict—Natural flow of water —Embankment.

The respondent removed an embankment on his own land which had been constructed about twelve years before by his predecessor in title, the effect of the removal being to allow more rainwater to flow in its natural course on to the applicant's land than had flowed while the embankment stood.

Held on motion, that the applicant was not entitled to an interdict restraining such removal.

This was an application to make absolute a rule nisi restraining respondent from allowing stormwater to flow from his property on to the applicant's ground pending an action to be brought for a perpetual interdict. The parties are owners of adjoining properties at the Paarl, and applicant complained that respondent allows stormwater to flow from his ground, which is immediately above that of applicant on to his (applicant's) ground, and has removed a certain embankment which hitherto had prevented the water coming down on to his property. It was deposed on behalf of respondent, who was not at present in the Colony, that the embankment was his property, and had been built by his predecessor in title to separate his property from that of the applicant. It was denied that there was more than the natural flow of water from respondent's land to applicant's, or that there was a greater flow than when the embankment existed.

Mr. Benjamin for applicant; Mr. McGregor for respondent.

After hearing Mr. Benjamin in argument, the Court, without calling upon Mr. McGregor discharged the rule.

De Villiers, C.J.: The learned judge to whom application was made for an interdict was very careful to confine the remedy to a rule. He granted a rule nisi, and I am satisfied that if the information which is now before the Court had been laid before the learned judge, he would not even have granted a rule. The applicant brought this application after the respondent had left the Colony, and the affidavits now put in show that the plaintiff had not even made out a prima facie case for an interdict. The embankment referred to seemed to be an embankment on the respondent's own property; placed there, apparently, by his predecessor in title, to separate his property from that of the applicant. The former owners of the property said that at the time they held the ground there was an embankment, which was the dividing line between the two properties, and that this could not prevent the rain or stormwater from being discharged on applicant's property from that of the respondent. So, according to this, the embankment did not prevent the stormwater flowing on to the applicant's property, but even if it had, it did not follow that the respondent was not justified in removing the embankment, which was placed there by his predecessor in title. If by the removal of this embankment the water flowed in a natural course on to the land of the applicant, he could not complain; he must take his land with all its disadvantages of situation, and if the lie of the land was such as to bring this water down, he must receive it. It was not alleged that the embankment was removed in such a way as to cause the water to take an unnatural course, and thus to flow on to applicant's land. The rule nisi must be discharged, with costs.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

LE ROUX v. VAN DER WESTHUYSEN AND OTHERS. } 1903. Aug. 17th.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved for the awards of the arbitrators relating to certain farms in the division of Oudtshoorn to be made rules of Court, and for costs, in accordance with the 6th section of the award.

Order granted as prayed.

KELLER v. LE ROUX AND OTHERS.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved for an award of arbitrators relating to the subdivision of water to lower farms in the division of Oudtshoorn to be made a Rule of Court.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte GLEESON.

Mr. Buchanan moved on behalf of the petitioner, as executrix, testamentary of her late husband, for leave to raise a further mortgage on the estate for £2,000, to meet certain debts, instead of selling part of the property. The major heirs consented to this course being adopted, but there were certain minors interested. The Master's report was favourable.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte SUTTON.

Mr. Alexander moved on behalf of the petitioner, who is a watchman in the employ of the Customs Department, at East London, for an order terminating a certain deed of trust, executed by the petitioner in 1899, in favour of his wife and children. It appeared that the net income accruing from the trusts, which were invested in shares, was now only about £32 a year, and the petitioner's wife was willing to forego her interest in the trusts, provided that the same were liquidated, and the money employed in the maintenance and education of the children. There was £550 on fixed deposit, and £960 was originally invested in shares, but it was not expected that the shares would now realise so much.

An order was granted declaring the trusts at an end, appointing Mr. Bolton, accountant, East London, and Mr. Fleumer, solicitor, East London, to liquidate the trusts, and hand over the proceeds, less liquidators' fees, to the Master, money to be paid by monthly instalments for the maintenance and education of the six children.

STRYDOM v. MARKOTTER.

Mr. McGregor applied, as a matter of urgency, for an order, re-investing the applicant, Johannes Jacobus Gert Strydom, of Klein River, Kongh, in the district of Uniondale, with the possession of a certain mare. The applicant's statement was that on Thursday, August 6, he went to the town of Uniondale, a distance of about 30 miles, with his cart and two horses, for the purpose of taking his sick child to a doctor for treatment. The horses had been in his lawful possession for a considerable time as his sole property. On his arrival at the town of Uniondale, he obtained permission from a storekeeper—Abraham Pieter Hansen—to place the two horses in his stable reserved for customers. On Saturday, the 8th August, while the petitioner was attending to his sick child, Christoph Carl Markotter, a clerk, in the employ of John Thomas Stone, of Uniondale, proceeded to the stable, and, secretly and without the applicant's knowledge or consent, removed one of the said horses, a Colonial mare. Markotter took the mare to another stable in the town, and he was still in possession of the animal, and refused to give up the same, although requested to do so. Markotter alleged that he lost a Colonial mare in the protection camp during the administration of martial law, resembling the petitioner's mare in colour and in other respects. The petitioner said that the mare was born in November, 1898, and that in or about May, 1901, he handed over the mare to the military authorities, in accordance with instructions, for the purpose of being sent away to the protection camp. After the cessation of hostilities and in or about August, 1902, the said animal was returned to him by the military authorities as his own legitimate property, and it had since remained in his quiet and lawful possession up to the month of August, 1903. The said mare was the bona fide property of the petitioner, and was taken possession of unlawfully by the respondent, Markotter.

A rule nisi was granted, calling upon the respondent to show cause on the 31st August why he should not be ordered to restore the horse to the applicant, and in the meanwhile an interdict was granted restraining the respondent or any other person in possession of the horse from disposing of or parting with the same.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

ESTATE OTGAAR v. HAUPT. { 1903. Aug. 18th.

Contemplation of insolvency—Act 38 of 1884, Secs. 6 and 84 — Undue preference — Pledge—Agency.

The trustees of O.'s insolvent estate sued H. for £10, paid to H. when (as it was alleged) O. contemplated insolvency. The payment was made within six months of the date of sequestration. The trustee further demanded the restoration of certain goods which had been pledged to H. by O. and delivered.

Held that as at the time O. made payment to H. of the said £10, he expected to be able to satisfy his liabilities, such payment was not an undue preference.

Held further, that as on the evidence it appeared that the goods aforesaid had been handed to the defendant that he might raise money by selling them and not as a pledge, the agency of defendant terminated on O.'s insolvency, and that consequently the said goods formed part of the insolvent estate.

This was an action for the delivery of certain goods, a declaration of undue preference, and the defendant's forfeiture of proof against the plaintiff estate.

The declaration stated that the plaintiff estate was declared insolvent on 10th March, 1903. On the 11th February, Otgaar, being then in contemplation of insolvency, paid the defendant £10, being part of an alleged debt of £29 15s. 10d., and subsequently delivered to the defendant certain goods to the value of £115 15s. 3d., to be sold by public auction. The plaintiff wrote to stop the sale, but the defendant refused to deliver up the goods. Wherefore plaintiff claimed (1) delivery of the said goods, (2) a declaration that by being a party to an undue preference, defendant had forfeited his right to prove in the insolvent estate, (3) alternative relief, (4) costs of suit.

The defendant's plea admitted the formal allegations of the declaration, but set out that Otgaar purchased a cart and horse at a public auction on the 16th January, for the sum of £29 15s., the conditions of sale stipulating that the purchaser should pay in cash, which Otgaar had failed to do. Otgaar being pressed for payment, promised to hand over certain goods as a pledge. On 28th March, 1903, the defendant sold certain goods, which realised £17 13s. 3d. All the transactions with Otgaar were in the usual order and course of trade and business. On 7th May and 19th May the defendant tendered to the plaintiff the amount realised for the goods and the remainder of the goods, subject to his right to prove preferentially against the estate. It was admitted that Otgaar requested a return of the goods, but their alleged value, £115, was denied.

The replication of the plaintiff set out that the tender was insufficient to satisfy the claim.

Mr. Gardiner (with him Mr. Bisset) for the plaintiff. Mr. Benjamin for the defendant.

Cornelius J. Muller, clerk in the insolvency branch of the Master's Office, produced the papers relating to the insolvency of Otgaar. The petition was signed on February 24, the order of sequestration was issued in March, and the trustee was elected on the 27th March, the appointment being confirmed on the 16th April.

Harry Otgaar, the insolvent, said he was a grocer and general dealer, and he started business about May, 1902. The business went all right at first, but after the New Year it slackened off. He was sued by Percy Strutt and Co., and received a summons for the 10th February. He wrote to Mr. Haupt and the latter's clerk (Mr. Marshall) came to his shop. In the letter he asked Mr. Haupt to sell some goods by auction for him. He denied that he sent the goods to Mr. Haupt as a pledge for a debt. His desire was to obtain money to pay his creditors. A list was prepared of the goods. On the 12th February Strutt obtained judgment against him in the Stellenbosch Magistrate's Court. He first ascertained that his position was not sound two days after the judgment. He came to Cape Town to try to raise money, and he knew at that time that if he did not succeed he would be insolvent. About three or four days after he had sent goods to Mr. Haupt to be sold by auction, he determined to surrender his estate. He sent two letters to Mr. Haupt. He first wrote about the 15th or 16th February, asking Mr. Haupt to stop the sale and return the goods at once, because he wanted to make up his schedules. In his second letter he asked the defendant to send back his goods. The defendant replied that he (Otgaar) could make up his schedules from the duplicate list. About the 26th February he again wrote to Mr. Haupt, telling him that he had completed his schedules, and he wanted the goods returned. He took the values from the invoices. His assistant swore to the value of the goods.

[Maasdorp, J.: You shuld have a disinterested appraiser.]

Witnese said he bought a cart and horse at an auction sale held by Mr. Haupt in January. The cart he bought for £2 15s., and the horse for £27. He did not know what the conditions of sale were. He took the property away without paying for it. He was first asked for payment about two days afterwards. He saw the defendant personally the following day. There was an item in his book of £10 paid to the defendant for the cart and horse. He thought that entry would be very nearly correct.

[Maasdorp, J.: Upon your own showing, you were not contemplating insolvency.]

Witness said that the entry in his book might be incorrect as to a day or two. The payment might have been made on the 13th February. He sent his goods on the 11th February, but he was not quite sure that he made the payment on that date.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He did not know that the sale of the cart and horse was for cash. He had sometimes got credit at auction sales. He thought he should have credit in this case. He was surprised when Mr. Marshall, the defendant's clerk, came round to him for the money a day or two afterwards. He could not pay the money at the time. It was not arranged that he should send his goods to Mr. Haupt in order to liquidate the debt. He told Mr. Marshall that he would send up these goods, as he wanted them sold to meet the claims of Messrs. Strutt and other creditors. The goods were of the value of £120, and he expected that they would realise at auction about £80.

By the Court: He had expected that the goods would be sold on the day after he sent them, the 12th.

Cross-examination continued: He came to see his father-in-law at Observatory in February to try to raise money after he had received Messrs. Strutt's summons. He scheduled the goods at cost price. He thought he would be able to raise about three-quarters of the cost price of the goods at the sale by auction. An estimate of £56 would be under the value. About this time he paid Mrs. Wiener £40.

By the Court: He knew that his position was hopeless after his attempts to raise money had been unsuccessful in Cape Town. He thought he might still carry on if he had got money for the goods at auction. Two days afterwards he received other summonses.

He paid the £10 before the goods were delivered to Mr. Haupt.

Johannes Jacobus van Wyk, sole trustee in the insolvent estate of Otgaar, said the assets were £926 9s. 2d., and the liabilities £1,123 4s. 4d. At the end of December the assets were the same, and the liabilities about £11 less. This was the state of affairs until the surrender. It was difficult to say what the estate would pay—roughly, he estimated, from 8s. to 10s. in the £. Witness had found the values in the schedules very fair, so far as he had realised them. Insolvent had not paid his clerks since October. After witness's appointment, at the end of April, witness sent for insolvent, who brought a list of the goods which Haupt had received. Haupt had two sales to witness's knowledge. He used to hold a sale every Saturday. After witness's election as trustee, but before the confirmation of the appointment, Haupt called and asked witness if he had a list of goods attached to the schedule. Witness said he had not received the papers. He asked Haupt if he was going to prove his claim, and Haupt replied that there was no need to prove his claim, as he had secured himself in time, having received goods from Otgaar to cover his claim. He said Otgaar's wife had sent him the goods. On the 2nd May witness wrote Haupt a letter asking that the goods should be returned, or their value paid. Haupt replied, stating that the goods could be had at the auction room, and enclosing an account of the dealings between Otgaar and himself, showing a balance of £2 1s. 9d. Further correspondence ensued between the attorneys. Witness had seen the statement of account sent by Haupt. Witness, on comparing this with lists, found a number of items short. These amounted in value to £4 13s. 6d. There was a difference of £14 3s. between the value given in the stock list and the sale price stated by Haupt to have been received by him.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: Haupt did not tell witness that the goods were sent to him because Mrs. Otgaar, who had managed that branch of the business, was going to give it up. No portion of the business belonged to the wife. Witness did not know what steps Haupt took in regard to advertising the sale of these goods. Witness had attended one of the two sales, and was struck with the cheap way in which the goods were being sold.

Mr. Benjamin: Quite so; you were struck with the cheap way in which the rival auctioneer was selling. You could have got much higher prices?

Witness: Quite so.

By the Court: At the time of the sale witness did not know that the goods being sold were those from Otgaar's shop. He had since come to the conclusion that there were, after having examined the vendue roll.

Wilhelm J. Mooy, former foreman to insolvent, said he made up the schedules of stock. He took the values from the invoices.

Mr. Gardiner closed his case.

Mr. Benjamin called

Edward Marshall, clerk in the employ of defendant, who said: The only notes witness had received from the insolvent were after the goods had been received. To the best of witness's recollection, the first note contained an intimation that Haupt was not to sell any more goods, as Otgaar was handing in the schedules and a request for the return of the goods. Witness wrote on the back of the note a message to the effect that he could not return the goods, as Mr. Haupt was away. He sent this back by the same messenger. There was a second note, which witness did not keep. It was to the same effect. The sale of the horse and cart was advertised in the "Cape Times" to take place on the 16th February. They were purchased by Otgaar for £29 15s. Witness called to see Otgaar twice during the same and the following day, and said he wanted the money. Witness did not know anything of the £10 paid to Haupt. Witness "worried" Otgaar a good deal for money, and Otgaar said he would send the goods. He gave witness to understand that the proceeds of the sale of these goods were to cover the price of the horse and cart. The list of goods put in was substantially correct. There were three small errors. Witness valued the whole of the goods shown in the list at £56 10s. 5d. The goods sold realised £19 odd. Witness considered that the prices obtained was very good for an auction sale—infinitely better than those which would be obtained on the Parade at Cape Town.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: It was unusual to allow credit at Government sales. He was not positive of the words Otgaar used, but there was no doubt that his intention was that the goods should cover the debt for the horse and cart. Otgaar was not to deduct the money, but witness understood that he expected a balance. No one ever dreamt of getting the value of goods sent to an auction room. Sold from a shop, they might realise £65 or £70, and Otgaar's valuation was absurd. He was not time-checker at Garlicks, he was assistant in the wholesale department. Coloured men often gave double the value on a Saturday afternoon, and that was his explanation of the difference of fifty per cent. between his valuation and the actual realisation.

Re-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He considered that he got a good price for the goods, and, if necessary, he could return the balance in stock.

By Maasdorp, J.: Taking £19 as a fair value of the goods sold, the remainder would fetch £56.

Re-examined by Mr. Benjamin: The insolvent took the horse and cart without the consent of the aucitoneer. Some of the goods were old fashioned, and a good many of them would be difficult to sell.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: Witness did not give the insolvent permission to take the horse and cart. He did not see him take them.

By Kotzé, J.: Witness asked for the money a day or two afterwards, but not for the horse and cart.

F. Haupt, the defendant, stated that he was an auctioneer, carrying on business at Stellenbosch. The insolvent bought the horse and cart at a Government sale at Stellenbosch. Special conditions were printed for the sale, including "strictly cash." The insolvent took the horse and cart without permission. Cash had not been paid for the horse and cart, and witness then gave Mr. Marshall instructions. Subsequently, on February 7, he was paid £10 on account for the horse and cart. Some time before the cash was paid the goods were delivered at the store. Previous to the cash being paid, witness instructed Mr. Marshall to worry Otgaar for the money. About a week after the sale Otgaar suggested sending up the goods to be sold, from which witness could deduct his account. Witness did not like the idea of it, and then Otgaar suggested that he might take the goods until he (Otgaar) would pay him the cash. Witness received no word from Otgaar as to the return of the goods. The insolvent got credit for whatever goods were sold, and witness disposed of them because they were his property. Witness offered to tender the remainder of the goods subject to his right to prove preferentially against the estate.

By Maasdorp, J.: About the 6th or 7th March he knew that Otgaar had an intention of surrendering his estate.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He did not know that it was necessary, after sequestration, to have the pledge valued and handed over to the trustee. He found out aftterwards that he had made a mistake in selling the goods. He was positive that the goods were delivered before the money was paid. There was no definite time fixed that he was to hold the goods. Witness said that his clerk was perfectly right in refusing to release the goods. There was nothing to debar witness from selling all the goods, even if all the money had previously been paid. It was not on account of the sequestration that he sold the goods as soon as possible. He did not say in the letter to the attorneys that the goods were with him as a pledge, but stated that the goods were said to belong to Otgaar. Otgaar might have sent other people's goods, yet he took them as a pledge from Otgaar. In order to make what the auctioneers call "a sporting lot" certain underclothing that was missing might have been sold.

Re-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He would return everything, so long as he had the right to claim preferentially on the insolvent estate.

This closed the evidence, and counsel having been heard in argument,

Maasdorp, J: In this case the plaintiff claims from the defendant the recovery of certain goods alleged to form part of the property of the insolvent estate of Otgaar, which he alleges are at present in possession of the defendant, and he also claims the sum of £10 paid by the insolvent to the defendant, which he alleges to have been paid under circumstances that constitute an undue preference. Now, the first question that we have to decide in this case is whether, when the payment of £10 was made by the insolvent to Haupt, the insolvent contemplated the sequestration of his estate. Under section 6 of Act 38 of 1884 it is provided that when any payment is made within six months of the sequestration of the estate that the insolvent shall be presumed then to have contemplated the sequestration of his estate, but that presumption may be rebutted by proof to the contrary given by the defendant. It appears, under section 84, where a payment is made by an insolvent to any creditor at a time when such insolvent is contemplating the sequestration of his estate, and if by such payment he intends to prefer the creditor, to whom such payment is made, such payment will be regarded as null and void, and the trustee shall be entitled to recover the value of the amount of such payment from the creditor who received an undue preference. We have therefore to decide whether, when this payment was made by the insolvent to Haupt, he contemplated the sequestration of his estate. We must take it a payment was made as alleged by Mr. Haupt on the 7th of February. It would seem that the insolvent had carried on a very good business up to the end of last year, but, as he admits, business grew rather slack during January, and, in consequence, he had some difficulty in satisfying his creditors, and in February they began to press him. We find a summons was issued against him by Strutt and Company on the 10th February. The insolvent says that not being then possessed of ready cash to meet the demand he placed in the hands of Mr. Haupt some goods, which he wished him to sell in order to secure means to satisfy this debt of Strutt and Company. On the 12th judgment was obtained by Strutt against him for the sum of £51 18s. 4d., and even then he says he believed that, with the assistance of some friends, he would be in a position to satisfy that claim, and he proceeded to Cape Town to see whether he could raise a loan in order to meet the demands that were then pressing. He felt that he would succeed in raising such a loan, and then be in a position to satisfy the pressing creditors. If those were really the feelings entertained by the insolvent at that time he could not be said to have, up to the 12th February, contemplated the sequestration of his estate. Now, the manner in which the insolvent gave his evidence in this case impressed me with his truthfulness, and I quite accept the evidence as given by him, it being our object to ascertain what it was that passed through the mind of the insolvent at the time when he made this payment. The best person to inform us on this point, if he be regarded as truthful, would be the insolvent himself. Now, the insolvent has stated that by the 12th he would be able to carry on his business, and he did not then anticipate insolvency when his assets amounted to £926 and his liabilities amounted to £1,122. He would, therefore, consider the position as what might be regarded as a not very great access of liabilities over his assets, and I quite believe that the insolvent, whose business was then running, contemplated that he might be able to overcome his difficulty, and so avoid sequestration. Upon the whole, I come to the conclusion that the insolvent did not contemplate the sequestration of his estate until the 14th or 15th February. The defendant has therefore succeeded in rebutting the presumption of contemplation of sequestration which is spoken of in the 8th section of Act 38 of 1884. In the absence of such contemplation, the payment of the £10 made by the insolvent to Haupt was a good payment, and cannot be set aside as an undue preference. The next and more important claim for the Court to decide upon is that part of the plaintiff's case in which he demands the restoration of the goods held by the defendant, and alleged to be the property of the insolvent, and at present vested in the trustee. The defendant's plea to that claim is that the goods were pledged to him for a debt which was due, and that he still holds them as a preferent claim, and is entitled to retain the property as against the trustee. There is a tender of this property by him to the trustee, but that is a conditional tender upon certain terms which the trustee was not bound to accept, and, consequently, the Court has now to decide whether the goods must be handed up as belonging to the estate of the insolvent. The defendant having set up this claim of pledge, the onus of proving it now lies upon him. Here there is certainly some conflict of evidence between the insolvent and the defendant, but, under the circumstances, and after carefully scrutinising it, it does not appear to be a very serious conflict. The insolvent says that when he found he was in want of cash to pay pressing creditors, he handed over to Mr. Haupt a certain quantity of goods, with instructions to sell them so as to enable him to pay these creditors. Mr. Haupt also states that these goods were delivered to him for the purpose of being sold, and he also admits that he was then contemplating that out of the proceeds certain creditors should be paid. He further says that it was understood between them that he should satisfy himself first out of the proceeds. Now, I come to the conclusion that, upon the facts which are proved in this case, even upon the statement of the defendant himself, that no pledge has been established. If instructions were given to Mr. Haupt to sell these goods for the purpose of raising funds to meet the claims of creditors, and even amongst them to satisfy his own claim, that does not amount to a pledge; it merely amounts to an agency to raise funds out of the proceeds of certain goods. If the goods had been given as a pledge, Mr. Haupt would have been obliged to retain them, and under ordinary circumstances, would not even, without an order of Court, have been entitled to sell them. Upon the whole of the evidence, I come to the conclusion that the goods were handed to Mr. Haupt for the purposes of sale, and that the proceeds were afterwards, either wholly or in part, to be paid back to the insolvent. If that is so, then the agency so constituted ceased upon the occurrence of the insolvency, and the property in the goods vested in the trustee. The trustee is, therefore, now entitled to recover the goods which belong to the insolvent estate, and which are in the hands of the defendant. There is some question as to the value of the portion of the goods which were disposed of by the defendant. The defendant seems to have sold some of the goods at two of his commission sales, and realised the sum of £19. The rest of the goods are still in his possession, and there would be very little difficulty now, in compliance with an order of Court, to restore the rest of the goods. As to the value of the goods disposed of, we are inclined to come to the conclusion they realised what they would have realised if they had been disposed of by the trustee. Consequently, no loss has been incurred by the estate, if we order that the goods now in possession of the defendant should be restored to the trustee, and that he also pay over the sum of £19, in view of such of the goods he has sold, together with the sum of £4 for some goods, which, in some manner unknown to the defendant, must have gone astray. Judgment will therefore be given for the plaintiff for the restoration of the goods still in possession of the defendant, and for the payment of the sum of £23, the defendant to pay costs of suit.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE]

THERON v. THERON. { 1903. Aug. 19th.

This was an action for the restitution of conjugal rights, or, failing compliance, a decree of divorce. Mr. Burton appeared for the petitioner, and the respondent was unrepresented.

The evidence taken on commission showed that the parties resided in the division of Clanwilliam, and that they were married in the Dutch Reformed Church, without community of property, on the 21st January, 1889. The petitioner, Esther Maria Jacoba Antoinette Theron stated that her husband maliciously deserted her in 1895, leaving the farm in anger, and declaring that he did not want petitioner to be his wife any longer. In 1898 the defendant sued her for divorce on the ground of unfaithfulness, but he failed to prove the charges. In 1899 they appeared before a Commission of the Dutch Reformed Church, but the defendant then stated that he would not return to petitioner, and that he did not want her as his wife any longer. Defendant had taken 7 horses, 48 cattle, and 100 sheep, which petitioner had got from her parents.

A decree of restitution of conjugal rights was granted, defendant being ordered to return to the petitioner on or before the 30th September, or, failing compliance, to show cause on the 15th October why a decree of divorce should not be granted against him.

Postea (October 15th) : The Court granted a decree of divorce.

JEFFERY v. KOTZE. { 1903. Aug. 19th.

Lease—Documentary evidence.

This was an action for the execution of a certain lease or payment of the sum of £300 damages, and for the return of certain movables or the value thereof.

The declaration set out that the plaintiff was a builder, and the defendant a farmer, both residing at Glen Lily, in the Cape Division. About February, 1902, one, Thomas Henry Johnson, entered into a lease with the defendant, which they both agreed to sign, but the defendant neglected to do so. In July the plaintiff and Johnson entered into a contract by which the former became lessee of the latter's rights with the defendant. Johnson was willing to execute the original contract, but the defendant refused to do so, and also to deliver to the plaintiff the movables, which were valued at £68 16s. The agreement set out that the defendant let certain land and premises at Elsie's River Halt for a period of three years and four months for the purposes of brickmaking to Thomas Johnson, the latter to pay a royalty of four shillings for every 1,000 bricks manufactured. Wherefore the defendant claimed (a) The sum of £300 as damages, (b) An order for the return of certain moveables retained by the defendant or their value.

The plea denied that defendant let any portion of the farm to Johnson. It was agreed that Johnson could take clay and manufacture bricks during the defendant's pleasure on condition that he paid four shillings on every 1,000 bricks. The defendant knew nothing of the sale of the rights to the plaintiff, and was always ready to deliver the said movables to Johnson on payment of the sum of £50 as a royalty on the bricks already manufactured.

The replication was general.

Mr. Gardiner (with him Mr. Bisset) for the plaintiff. Mr. Upington for the defendant.

Thomas Henry Johnson, brickmaker, said he knew the defendant's farm. In February last year he bought Vicary's plant, which was working on the farm, and he went to see Kotze. He asked defendant whether he could grant a lease to him, and Kotze agreed to do so for three years and four months, letting him have five acres or more ground on payment of a royalty of 2s. per 1,000 to the defendant. It was arranged that witness should draft a lease, to be afterwards submitted to a lawyer. The lease said that he should pay a royalty of 2s. per 1,000 bricks, and if Kotze supplied wood the terms should be 4s. per 1,000. Kotze assented to the document, and on the following Saturday they went to the office of Mr. Du Preez, attorney. Mr. Kotze took the draft of the lease to Mr. Du Preez, and instructed him to draw up the lease. Before the lease was prepared, Mr. Du Preez died. It was afterwards stated that they might get it drawn up by Mr. Du Preez's clerk. He commenced work in March, and paid his first royalty on the 10th. In April witness went to Du Preez's office, and he arranged for the clerk to draw up a lease, which he took early in April to Kotze. Witness was accompanied by a Mr. Tadman. He asked Kotze to sign the lease, but the latter refused, saying that witness must first pay up his royalties. Witness admitted that he had kept back a certain amount, because the lease had been unsigned. He paid the royalties in arrear a week later. Kotze then said he would let him know about the lease when he went to town. Kotze subsequently promised several times, but he did not get the lease signed. Witness in May desired to lay down machinery, and it was arranged that he should pay Kotze 4s. per 1,000 bricks royalty. They went to Mr. Glynn's office, and Kotze instructed Glynn to draw up an agreement similar to the other, excepting that the royalty was to be altered to 4s., and the provision as to wood was to be struck out. Witness afterwards took the lease to Kotze, who, however, said the lease must be signed before a proper authority, a solicitor. Kotze always made promises that he would sign the agreement, but he always found some pretext. Witness afterwards resolved to go to Johannesburg and he arranged to sell the lease and movables to Mr. Jeffery for £70. He sold at a low price, because he was anxious about the lease being unsigned, and he thought things were better in Johannesburg than here, as bricks were fetching a big price there. He made a profit of close upon £300 on the property during the four months he was there. He considered that the lease, if signed, would be worth £300. If the lease were signed brickmaking on the property should produce a profit of £1,000 a year. The yearly product should be 500,000 to 600,000 bricks. Before he left for Johannesburg he asked Kotze if he (witness) owed him any money, and the defendant replied that he did not.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: The agreement to enter into a lease was made on or about the 7th February. He was told that Vicary and Gamber had a lease to expire on the 30th April, 1902. Vicary was the only person whom witness saw. Vicary was anxious to go Home. He denied that it was arranged between witness and Vicary that witness should carry on the unexpired portion of Vicary's lease. He bought the plant on the condition that he should be given a lease. He arranged with Mr. Du Preez's clerk to draw up a lease in March. He believed he handed it over to Mr. Glynn. He owed the defendant about £8 for royalties when he presented the lease to Kotze to be signed. He paid the arrears on the 12th April. He asked Kotze again to sign, but Kotze refused, saying that there were no witnesses present. Kotze promised to let him know when he went to town, so as to get the lease signed. Kotze did not let him know. He left 26,000 bricks on the ground when he sold out. He paid a royalty of 2s. per 1,000 bricks on the bricks he made there. Vicary did not tell him that he had a lease. Vicary told him that he was paying a royalty of 2s. per 1,000 bricks. Witness's father effected the sale to Jeffery. Kotze ordered witness and Jeffery off the property on the 19th July. Witness went to Johannesburg the same night.

Re-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He did not use the shrubs as fuel, and the consequence was that he only had to pay 2s. per 1,000. He made no bricks after it was agreed that he should pay 4s. per 1,000, in case he laid down machinery.

John Warren Glynn, broker and commission agent, said the document produced was handed to him to be copied about the last week in June of last year. The two Johnsons and Kotze brought a document, the last named handing it to witness, instructing him to typewrite it, and to make duplicates. Witness had the document typewritten, and handed the copies to Kotze and the Johnsons. Kotze asked witness to strike out a clause, and witness did so, writing "cancelled" against it.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: No final agreement was arrived at in witness's office. Witness did not arrange to go out to Kotze's farm in connection with this matter.

Richard Owen Johnson, said that when he went, in company with others, to see Kotze about his son taking the land, the latter agreed to lease the land for three years and four months, on condition that two shillings royalty was paid for every 1,000 bricks manufactured. If shrubs were used, an extra two shillings were to be paid. Witness worded the contract, and Kotze agreed to the terms of it, and when the attorney died the defendant said that they could go on brickmaking. Witness arranged the sale with the plaintiff for £70, and the money was paid over by cheque. Before the money was paid Jeffery asked the defendant if he would sign the lease in favour of him, and the defendant replied in the affirmative. The defendant arranged an appointment to have it signed before a solicitor. He corroborated his son's evidence as to the value of the movables, and the amount of damages.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: Mr. Jeffery got a very good bargain. In Du Preez's agreement, the royalty was 2s. It was understood that the lease was to be for three years and four months, with the option of a renewal. Mr. Glynn was wrong when he said that the defendant was present to sign the agreement.

By Kotzé, J.: He was quite sure of that, although Mr. Glynn said the defendant was present.

Cross-examination continued: It was arrangend because of Kotzé's absence that Glynn should go to defendant's farm with the agreement for his signature. It was in March that he went with his son to see the defendant. Mr. Smith was also in the house. The defendant did not tell him to clear out, but, on the other hand, he agreed to sign the agreement. The defendant always had a "shuffling" excuse when witness called.

Re-examined by Mr. Gardiner: £8 would have been the full value of the plant he bought from Vicary.

By Maasdorp, J.: He thought his son gave instructions to strike out the clause against which "cancelled" had been written. Kotze was not then present in Glynn's office at the time.

Thomas Jeffrey, the plaintiff, said that while he was negotiating the agreement with Johnson to buy the plant, he knew there was difficulty with Kotze about the lease. Witness accompanied Johnson to Kotze's house, and asked him to sign the lease. Kotze looked through it, and said he would sign it. He said he wanted to take it in to his solicitor to get it signed. After witness met Kotze, and questioned him about the matter. Kotze then affected surprise at the information that witness had bought from Johnson, and repudiated having made a promise to sign the lease. Kotze said Johnson had no business to sell, as he owed him royalties. He told witness if he returned to the ground, he would kick him off. This was on the Saturday after the interview at Kotze's house. Afterwards Johnson and witness saw Kotze, who, in reply to Johnson, said the latter did not owe him any money. Kotze again promised to go into town to sign the lease, but failed to keep his promise, sending a man to say he was too busy. The appointment was made the previous day. When witness returned from town, where he had been to meet Kotze, he found that Kotze had removed his things. Witness would not have bought the lease if he had not been satisfied that Kotze would sign. Witness wanted bricks at the time for a large building he was erecting, and which he intended to be used as an hotel, provided he could get a licence. Witness altered "Johnson" to "Jeffreys" in the lease.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: Witness removed about 4,000 burned bricks from the ground. He paid no royalty on these; the royalty had been paid. He paid £70 for the plant, and the plant was worth that amount. He did not merely buy the chance of getting a lease.

Re-examined by Mr. Gardiner: The bricks he bought were made by Johnson.

Mr. Gardiner closed his case.

Mr. Upington called

John George Vicary, who stated that in November, 1901, witness and Mr. Gamber entered into a lease with Kotze of the brickfield at present in dispute. He remembered meeting young Johnson in February, 1902. Prior to that Gamber had gone out of the contract, and witness was carrying it on on his own behalf. Johnson wanted to buy the farm and the plant, and witness said that he could take over the remaining term of the lease. Witness took him to Kotze's house. Old Mr. Johnson was also there. Kotze agreed to Johnson taking over the farm for the remaining term, but there was no mention of giving a lease for three years and four months. Under his lease, he was paying 4s. a 1,000, which included wood and water.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: As far as he could recollect, Johnson did not remain longer with Kotze than witness. He thought Mr. Gamber was working the brickfield last season. Witness was bookkeeper to Mr. Gamber at present, but he could not say whether Gamber had at present the right over the farm.

Frederick Jacobus Kotze, defendant, said that in January last year Gamber and Vicary had a lease that was still current with him. Vicary introduced Johnson, and asked witness to transfer the agreement to the latter. He agreed to Johnson continuing the agreement. Johnson continued to work the brickfields until April 30, when he paid an amount of money as royalty. Johnson asked for an extension, and witness said he would consider the matter if the arrears were settled. Early in May Johnson and his son brought a paper, in the form of a contract, with which witness was dissatisfied. Witness said, except he saw a better proposal, he would not sign it. He never remembered going to see Mr. Glynn about this matter. Witness told the plaintiff that Johnson had no lease at all.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: The royalty was 2s. per 1,000. Johnson was unable to pay, and witness had to give him an account for any amount of cash given to him. Gamber was paying 4s. a thousand for bricks last season.

Re-examined by Mr. Upington: He merely agreed to allow Johnson to remain on to finish his bricks, when his transfer from Vicary was up.

Margheretta Magdalena Kotze, wife of the defendant, said she had previously seen Johnson and Jeffrey. Her husband had leased the brickfield to Gamber and Vicary. She remembered the two Mr. Johnsons and Mr. Vicary coming to see Mr. Kotze. Vicary asked if Johnson could continue his lease for the remaining few months, and that was agreed to. When the lease expired, she did not remember Johnson coming to pay a royalty. She remembered the two Johnsons coming to the house with a paper which they gave to her husband. Her husband did not agree to the terms of the document.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: She was not in the room all the time Vicary was there. She had not talked seriously with her husband about the case.

Francis Gamber said that at the end of 1901, with Mr. Vicary, he had a joint lease from the defendant. He left Vicary to continue the lease. Last season witness was working a bit of property as a brickfield on the same farm. Witness removed 21,000 bricks from the farm for Mr. Jeffery. He valued the plant at between £5 and £6.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: It would be difficult to make 30s. profit on bricks in that district.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiff, in his declaration, alleges that an agreement was entered into between Johnson and the defendant in terms of the document, which is annexed to the declaration. Upon reference to that document it appears to be a lease whereby the defendant let to Johnson a portion of his farm, with the right to make bricks thereon, the defendant promising to pay a royalty of four shillings for every thousand bricks made by him. The plaintiff claims specific performance of the contract. The defendant, in his plea, denies that such agreement was ever entered into. Upon looking at the evidence in this matter, I think the plaintiff has to meet several difficulties. He has to put before the Court clear and definite evidence of the contract, which he alleges in his declaration, and we find that his difficulties commence with the very form of his declaration. It will be necessary for the Court to decide at what particular time a final agreement—if any—was entered into between the parties, and then to decide upon its specific terms. Now it is alleged in the declaration that the contract was entered into in March, 1902 and one of the important terms alleged in the annexed document is that a royalty of four shillings in the thousand was to be paid by Johnson to the defendant. No sooner had we gone into the evidence which has been adduced in this case, when it appears that some agreement was entered into in the month of February, 1902, and the plaintiff says that the royalty under that agreement which he contracted to pay was the sum of two shillings per thousand bricks. Here we find that the declaration is in conflict with the evidence in two very material particulars,

I think it is not difficult to explain the discrepancies which we find here. It is caused in my opinion by the fact that there is a considerable amount of doubt and uncertainty in the mind of Johnson, who assigned his contract to Jefferys, as to when a final contract was entered into, and what the terms of that contract were. Johnson has said, in evidence, that in February, 1902, he made an agreement which the defendant agreed to reduce to writing, and to sign, and in that month the terms of that agreement were definitely settled. Two months afterwards we find the parties are still negotiating, and are at variance on very important points. Then the question is raised whether two shillings should be paid for every thousand bricks, or four shillings, and we find Johnson consents to pay the advanced sum of four shillings for every thousand bricks, although he alleges he had already entered into a binding contract with the defendant for the payment of two shillings. Now, I cannot accept it that, if Johnson was convinced that he had a contract which he could enforce against the defendant, in which the terms were very favourable, he should agree to alter these terms two months afterwards to others that were less favourable. But the difficulty does not end there. Some time after that again we find the parties apparently still negotiating. They go to Mr. Glynn's office, and there a document is produced, which contains certain terms which the parties, after consideration, agreed to strike out as not forming part of the contract which they were negotiating. Another document is produced, which Johnson took to the defendant, and which the defendant agreed to with the alteration of one of the terms of it. To my mind, the parties had not yet themselves come to a definite and final agreement as to the terms of the contract which they wished to enter into. Mr. Glynn, in giving evidence as to the interview, contradicts the two Mr. Johnsons in a very important particular. They say that a final agreement was arrived at, and Mr. Glynn was to take it to the defendant, and the parties would there meet and finally conclude the contract by their signatures. Mr. Glynn says nothing of the kind took place, and after the document had been reduced to type, he had nothing further to do with it, and he never undertook to get the document finally settled by the defendant. Now, we take a further step, and come to the alleged agreement between Jefferys and the defendant. It is said Jefferys, having purchased from Johnson his rights under the contract, went to see Mr. Kotze to get his consent to this assignment. It has been argued by counsel that, however much doubt there may be as to the finality of the former negotiations, here at least we have something which establishes a clear contract of lease. If we refer to the evidence of Jefferys, we find this: He went to Mr. Kotze and produced a written agreement, and asked whether he would consent, and after he had talked it over, Mr. Kotze, in just one or two words, said, "Yes, I shall go to my attorney and sign that document," but, says Jefferys, on the next occasion Kotze was so dissatisfied with the whole business that he said he would feel obliged to kick him off the farm. Here, you would fancy that the parties had such a difference that they could not proceed to a settlement of the matter. But Jefferys says immediately after that Mr. Kotze again consents to go into town, and finally settle the agreement, but no sooner does Jefferys leave, than he takes possession of the plant left by Johnson, and removes it from the brickfields, with the evident intention of putting a stop to any further work. I am not satisfied that the conduct of the parties was such as to establish a final agreement between Jefferys and the defendant. It is said it is very difficult to understand Mr. Kotze's conduct through the whole of this business, but after hearing Mr. Kotze's evidence, I find no difficulty in explaining his conduct. He seems to be a man who finds it difficult to make up his mind, and I am prepared to accept the evidence of the witnesses for the plaintiff that he had from time to time vaguely promised that he would go to town to see his attorneys, and see whether he could not fix up some agreement; that he from time to time put off carrying out his resolution, and never had at any time so fixed his attention upon the matter as to come to any definite conclusion as to the terms upon which he would enter into this contract. The uncertainty in his mind gave rise to the consequence that no final agreement was entered into between the parties, and upon that point of the case the plaintiff has failed. But he has a further claim for the plant that was left on the ground, and which he alleges he bought from Johnson. The defendant, in his plea to that part of the claim, alleges that he retains possession of the goods, because there is a further debt due by him from Johnson under the lease. If any money by way of rent was due to the defendant, he would have been entitled to a lien on the goods, but in the absence of proof to that effect he was wrong in retaining the goods. Upon that part of the case, the Court will have to give judgment for the plaintiff for the restoration of the goods. There seems to be some little difficulty in assessing the value of the property. Looking at the list, it is of a very meagre and simple character, and the values set opposite the items certainly strike us as very high, and when we remember that for this plant and for the bricks, worth £91, Jefferys paid £70, I am satisfied that the plant that he bought could not be of anything like the value put upon it by the plaintiff. Seeing the unsatisfactory nature of this evidence, we have to reduce the value, and we find, if we allow the plaintiff £15 it would cover the full value of such goods. The defendant will pay all costs, except those of the witnesses Glynn, Johnson, sen., Cadman, and that of the commission to take Wake's evidence.

Kotzé, J., concurred.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Honourable Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.) and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

ADMISSIONS. { 1903. Aug. 20th.

Mr. Alexander moved for the admission of Richard Davis Gately as an attorney and notary.

The application was granted, the oaths to be taken before the Resident Magistrate of East London.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for the admission of Victor Kotze as an attorney.

The application was granted, and the oaths administered.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

SCHRODER V. BENTLEY.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate.

Order granted.

HAWORTH V. CARLISLE.

Mr. Alexander moved for provisional sentence for the sum of £43 9s. 6d., being a judgment of the Magistrate's Court, and £1 18s. 1d. taxed costs, and also that certain landed property be declared executable.

Order granted, subject to the production of a proper certificate of service.

WOODS V. CARLISLE.

Mr. Alexander moved for provisional sentence for £20, on a judgment of the Resident Magistrate's Court, and £2 3s. 1d. taxed costs, and also for landed property to be declared executable.

Order granted, subject to production of certificate of service.

HUGHES V. CLIFFORD.

Mr. Benjamin moved for a decree of civil imprisonment against the defendant, upon an unsatisfied judgment of this Court, under which sums of £33 0s. 5d. and £50 11s. 5d. were due on certain taxed bills of costs, taxed by the plaintiff, an attorney, against the defendant.

Defendant complained that the plaintiff, Mr. Price Hughes, had charged him with costs which ought to have been paid by the co-defendant in the divorce suit, who had gone into liquidation, and was now carrying on business in the maiden name of witness's wife. Mr. Price Hughes agreed to do the work for £100, and his bill amounted to £300. He actually charged witness 5s. for speaking to him over the telephone for two seconds. Witness had no means whatever. He was earning £25 a month. He had offered, and was still prepared to pay 50s. a month.

The Chief Justice (to Mr. Benjamin): How is it the money was not obtained from the co-defendant in the divorce suit?

Mr. Benjamin: He has gone insolvent.

Defendant: He is in business at the present time in my wife's maiden name.

Mr. Benjamin asked for an order of £5 a month.

Decree of civil imprisonment granted, with costs, to be suspended on payment of £2 10s. per month, until the judgment debt and costs be paid, first payment to be made on the 15th September, with leave to plaintiff to apply subsequently to increase the amount.

LE SUEUR AND OTHERS V. JACKSON.

Mr. Alexander moved for provisional sentence on a certain mortgage bond for the sum of £1,000, with interest from January 1, 1903, and that the property be declared executable.

Order granted.

PEYCKE AND CO. V. BATH.

Mr. Alexander moved that the provisional order of sequestration against the defendant's estate be made final.

Order granted.

BRAND AND OTHERS V. VAN DER MERWE.

Mr. van Zyl moved for the provisional order of sequestration in the defendant's estate to be made final.

The defendant appeared, and put in a paper to the effect that he owned a farm, and was practically solvent.

The matter was ordered to stand over to the 12th October, the defendant in the meantime to endeavour to find a purchaser of the farm.

Postea (October 12).

The matter was again ordered to stand over.

Leave granted, citation to be returnable on the 12th October, personal service to be effected.

Ex parte MAASDORP. { 1903. Aug. 20th.

Attorney—Service of articles—Military service—Holiday.

M., an articled clerk, had been absent from the service of his principal for three months on active military service. Application was now made to have this period of three months reckoned as a reasonable holiday, and deducted from applicant's period of service.

Held, that the application must be refused and the applicant ordered to complete an extra three months' service.

This was an application on behalf of one Charles Hermanus Maasdorp for an order declaring that the petitioner's articles of clerkship be determined on the 11th August, 1903, and that his service was sufficient for the purposes of admission as an attorney of this Court. The petitioner, it seemed, had been absent for three months on active service with the Western Province Rifles.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for applicant). The applicant was entitled to take a three months' holiday without thereby breaking the continuity of his service. If he thought fit to spend his holiday in military service at the front why should he be made to suffer for this.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I don't know whether we can accept that, Mr. Schreiner; the view would be then that everybody who has been out fighting for His Majesty has been out for a holiday.]

Mr. Upington (for the Law Society): The position the Law Society has taken up is that if an articled clerk has been absent on active military service the period of such absence will not be deemed a breach in the continuity of his service, but that he serve a corresponding period of extended service. In re De Beer (10 Shiel 515).

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why cannot the applicant complete his service?]

He wishes to may other arrangements which will enable him to earn something during these three months. He was articled on August 17, 1900. We raise no difficulty on the ground of want of continuous service; but we do say that he should serve his full time. This case is by no means similar to Re Will (7 Juta 67).

Mr. Schreiner was heard in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: The application, raised by counsel on motion, is that the three months should be taken as holiday, but there is no evidence whatever that it should be taken by way of holiday to complete period of service. The applicant will not be called to be admitted until the 16th November, and he is at present articled, and I confess I don't see why he should not continue these articles until he is of age, and by that time he will have served the additional three months, which would bring the period of service up to three years. The Court will, therefore, declare that, for the purposes of his admission as an attorney and notary, the applicant's articles of service will expire on the 14th November. Under the new rules of the Court, the 14th day of November will be the last day of term.

Mr. Schreiner asked his lordship to alter the date to the 13th November, so as to enable the applicant to get his papers in order for the last day of term.

The Chief Justice consented to alter the date to the 13th November.

SCHAVEREIN v. WEINTROB.

This was an application brought by Morris Schaverein, of the Paarl, against Louis Weintrob, also of the Paarl, to have an interdict obtained by the said Weintrob set aside. The interdict restrained Schaverein from making certain alterations, and interfering with certain building materials at the Paarl, pending on action, to be brought forthwith by Weintrob against Isaac J. de Villiers, the original vendor of the property, and against Schaverein, as the subsequent purchaser.

The applicant's affidavit stated that the property was suffering because of the operation of the interdict, and that the respondent Weintrob had delayed bringing the action against De Villiers and applicant. Applicant was desirous of obtaining transfer of the property from De Villiers.

The affidavit of the respondent stated that he had been delayed in commencing the action because of his want of funds. He had had to dispose of certain portions of his landed property. He had been delayed in having transfer carried out, owing to the illness of the secretary of the Paarl Board of Executors. He had now made necessary arrangements, and a summons had been issued against the applicant and Isaac J. de Villiers, the latter of whom, deponent claimed, had already sold the property in dispute to him.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers (for the applicant) submitted that the previous order, which said that the former applicant (Weintrob) should proceed with an action against Isaac de Villiers forthwith meant that that action should be proceeded with this term. Only on the 12th of this month had the applicant taken out a summons, and it was impossible for the action to come on this term. In the meantime, the property was suffering injury and deterioration. There was no necessity for the respondent to have waited, because the cost of a summons would only be a few shillings. Schaverein was willing to take the responsibility of continuing these building operations.

Mr. Bisset (for the respondent) said the delay which had taken place had been due to the defendant being short of funds to proceed with his action, but he had now succeeded in passing transfer of certain of his property, and obtaining funds wherewith to proceed with the action. In view of the fact that delay was not due to Weintrob's negligence, he asked the Court to refuse the application, and continue the interdict against Schaverein.

De Villiers, C.J.: The respondent seems to have had funds to put the law in motion, and to apply for an interdict against the applicant, and having obtained that interdict, thus prevented the applicant from dealing with this property. Now the order of Court is clear: "That the interdict continue pending an action to be forthwith brought by the applicant against Isaac de Villiers for transfer of the land in question, and against Schaverein as subsequent purchaser of the land." This order was made on the 25th June last; nothing was done until on the 6th of this month notice is served upon the respondent that an application would be made for the discharge of the order, whereupon he issues a summons. He says now he had not the means to issue a summons, although he had the means two months since to set the law in motion, and to put the applicant to the inconvenience of having this interdict against him. Two months have elapsed, and those two months are certainly not "forthwith." The respondent, having failed to comply with the conditions upon which he obtained the interdict, I think the Court should now order that the interdict be discharged with costs.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Fairbridge, Arderne and Lawton; Respondent's Attorneys: Faure and Zietsman.]

Ex parte VAN NIEKERK.

Mr. Benjamin moved for leave to execute a certain deed of servitude in favour of the Colonial Government for the conveyance of water across the farm Prinsloo to Cookhouse Station, in consideration of the payment by the Government of £200 as compensation. Petitioner applied in his capacity as usufructuary, and as guardian of the minor heirs. The Master's report was favourable.

Order granted in terms of Master's report, money to be deposited with the Colonial Orphan Chamber.

Ex parte SIPIKA AND OTHERS.

Mr. Russell moved on behalf of petitioners, who are natives, resident in Griqualand East, for leave to transfer certain property.

The Chief Justice said that no order could be granted at the present stage. There should be notice given to all the parties interested, and some official statement as to the native custom and the law applicable to such cases.

THOMPSON V. THOMPSON.

Mr. Benjamin moved for a commission de bene esse to take the evidence of certain witnesses in England, and for the appointment as commissioner of Mr. Mackie.

Granted.

HARRISON V. HARRISON.

Mr. Benjamin moved on behalf of Helen Harrison to make absolute a rule nisi restraining her husband, Wm. Edward Harrison, from disposing of property in the joint estate pending an action to be brought for judicial separation, and for an order against him to pay £30 in order to enable applicant to proceed with her action.

Mr. Upington appeared for the applicant.

In the petition and affidavit allegations of drunkenness and ill-treatment were made against respondent. Respondent made an affidavit, in which he stated that he had not been served with a copy of the petition and supporting affidavit, and had no knowledge of the allegations made against him. He was willing to enter into a deed of separation, and to make applicant an allowance of £30 a month, but applicant had refused to agree to this, requiring half the estate as well.

De Villiers, C.J., said that the matter would be ordered to stand over until Thursday next for proof of service of the petition and affidavits, the interdict to continue in the meanwhile. His lordship trusted that the parties would come to some terms without further action. The £30 must be paid at once.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

ARENZ V. ARENZ.

Mr. Russell appeared for the applicant, Susan Henrietta Arenz, and moved for an order for leave to sue for restitution of conjugal rights by edictal citation. Applicant alleged that her husband deserted her in 1901. The present whereabouts of respondent was unknown; he was last seen at Salt River.

Leave was granted to sue by edictal citation, the return day being on the 1st November, personal service to be effected.

Ex parte LISMORE.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the appointment of a curator. The applicant was the father of a minor, who was entitled to an undivided share in certain property. Applicant wished to have a curator appointed to represent the minor at the meeting of heirs called for the division, and suggested the appointment of Mr. Botha, uncle of the minor.

Granted.

WOOD V. LOVEGROVE.

This was an application for the attachment of the respondent for contempt, he having failed to comply with an order of Court. A writ of execution had been issued, and a return of nulla bona made. The original action was for rent, for which plaintiff obtained judgment, and defendant succeeded on a claim in reconvention for damages for non-user of certain rooms, which were not habitable. Mrs. Lovegrove was ordered to pay the costs in convention and Mr. Wood the costs in reconvention, the total costs amounting to £224. A balance was due to the applicant of £68 12s., which Mrs. Lovegrove had not paid.

Mr. Close for the applicant. The respondent in person.

Respondent said she had understood that the judgment of the Court meant that the applicant could not call upon her for rent until he had put the defective rooms in proper order. They were still in a condition unfit for use, and she had been unable to carry on her business as a boarding-house keeper in consequence. In evidence upon oath respondent said she had no income or means of paying the amount due.

Maasdorp, J., said that no order would be made The Court had proof that defendant had neither property or income.

VAN NIEKERK V. VAN NIEKERK.

This was an application calling upon the respondent to show cause that day why respondent to show cause that day why he should not be required to pay £2 per month for the maintenance of the petitioner's children. The petition of Mrs. Van Niekerk set out that in November, 1898, the Court granted an order dissolving the marriage between herself and the respondent, and ordered respondent to pay £2 per month for each of the girls until they attained the age of 18 years, and the boys 16 years, with leave to make special application for increased maintenance. The girls were at present in such a delicate state of health that they were unable to support themselves. The petitioner was also in a delicate state of health. The girls had reached the age of 18 years, but owing to the medical expenses and the increased cost of living the petitioner was unable to maintain them. The respondent was in a good business.

The respondent's answering affidavit set out that he had carried out the order of the Court, and had paid £8 per month from November, 1899, to May, 1901, when the eldest child became of the age of 18 years. Thereafter, he paid £6 per month until July, 1902, at which date the next eldest child discontinued having deponent's support. Until September, 1902, he paid £4 per month until December, 1902, when the applicant did not avail herself of the money at her disposal. He was still ready and willing to give the required amount. After the eldest girl became of age he gave additional assistance beyond the order of the Court. He was earning a salary of £5 per month, and a little extra in mending boots, and was totally unable to pay any more. The eldest girl was about to be married, and the next girl would take her place at school as a teacher. The application for additional assistance was unnecessary.

The applicant's replying affidavit stated that on August 1, 1902, the respondent, through his attorneys, agreed to pay £6 per month, and on the 21st August, 1902, the respondent sent her £4, which amount was returned. The respondent afterwards left the Paarl, and she was instructed through his attorneys that he would only pay £4 per month. The respondent had since married, and sold his property for £780. One of the girls was earning £1 per month, but beyond that they were entirely dependent on the applicant.

Mr. Buchanan for applicant. Mr. Upington for respondent.

The matter was allowed to stand over pending further information as to the salary of one of the girls, and as to the statement re her impending marriage.

SOLOMON V. REID AND MURRAY.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved for an order calling upon the respondents to quit, give up, and restore to the applicant possession of his premises, situated at 21, Loop-street, and for an interdict restraining the respondents from further interfering with the applicant's servants in constructing the property.

Counsel put in the affidavit of the applicant, Joseph Solomon, which set out that the respondents entered into a contract to complete certain buildings in Loop-street by 15th June, and had failed to do so. One of the partners had since died, but there was an affidavit of service on the second partner, Murray, and counsel contended that the service was sufficient. Under clause 7 of the agreement the employer had the right, in case the respondents should fail to carry out the contract within the stipulated time, through their own want of diligence, to determine the contract.

The affidavits of the architect and clerk of works testified to the unsatisfactory progress of the work.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte ROETS.

Mr. Buchanan moved for leave to sell certain property in the interest of five minor legatees of the estate. There were nineteen legatees altogether, and, with the exception of one, they all agreed to the application on account of the smallness of the estate. The Master's report was favourable.

Order granted in terms of the Master's report.

Ex parte PRETORIUS.

Mr. Buchanan moved for an order interdicting Johannes Diederick Pretorius from transferring certain property. The sale was advertised for the 26th inst., and under the joint will the respondent could not dispose of the property.

A rule nisi was granted, returnable on the 12th September, to operate in the meantime as an interdict.

Ex parte AURET.

Mr. Russell moved for an order amending an order of Court, granted under the Derelict Lands Act.

Order granted.

Ex parte RICHARDS.

Mr. Pyemont moved for leave to sell certain property belonging to petitioner and his wife, who were married in community, on the grounds of the applicant's inability to support his children and to maintain the property in a proper state of repair. The Master's report was favourable.

Order granted in terms of the Master's report, costs to come out of the estate.

Ex parte METELERKAMP.

Mr. Gardiner moved for an order authorising the Master to pay out certain sums to support a minor out of her late father's estate.

Order granted in terms of the Master's report.

Ex parte KAISER BROS.

Mr. Buchanan moved as a matter of urgency for an interdict restraining Geo. Shaw and Joseph Heggarty from removing any goods from certain premises, for which the respondents had failed to pay the rent for the month of August.

Interdict granted, pending an action, with leave to the respondent to have it set aside.

APPEAL CASE.

REX v. OSPOWAT. { 1903. Aug. 20th.

Conflict of evidence—Magistrate's finding as to credibility of witnesses.

This was an application to set aside a judgment given by Mr. Lotter, A.R.M., of Cape Town, in which the appellant was ordered to pay a fine of £3, or in default, to undergo 21 days' hard labour, for the theft of 4s. 6d., the property of Charles Benjamin.

Mr. Howel Jones appeared for the Crown; Mr. Alexander for the appellant.

Mr. Alexander: The accused in the Court below (the present appellant) seems to have brought an action against the complainant. Our ground of appeal is that the evidence on the record does not support the conviction. The complainant's evidence is very unsatisfactory, and he contradicts himself several times. His story as to his having first spoken in Dutch, and translated what he had said into Yiddish and Hebrew is very improbable. Again, it is admitted that he took 4s. 6d from the prisoner, but there is no evidence that the prisoner had taken this from the till. The prisoner's statement is clear, and consistent, and his subsequent conduct supports his story. Surely he would not have taken out a summons if he knew that he was a thief. I submit that the complainant had the prisoner arrested simply from motives of revenge. The Magistrate should have given the prisoner the benefit of the doubt. See Rex v. Swartz (13, C.T.R., p. 638). In this case, the money was not marked, and the complainant could not possibly identify it.

Mr. H. Jones (for the Crown): The Magistrate had only to decide which witnesses he would believe. The whole case was simply one of conflict of evidence.

Mr. Alexander was heard in reply.

Maasdorp, J.: This is a case brought on appeal, on the ground that the conviction is not supported by the evidence. Now we must take it, the Magistrate, in finding the accused guilty, relied on the evidence given by the witnesses for the prosecution. There is, no doubt, a conflict between evidence given by these witnesses and that given by the defendant himself. But the Magistrate, who heard the evidence and saw the witnesses, believed the evidence given by witnesses for the prosecution, and the question now arises whether their evidence supports the charge of theft against the accused. The complainant himself says that he saw the accused come to the drawer, and he took money from the drawer with his left hand, and put it in his pocket. "I caught him with the money in his hand." Then, as to what took place afterwards, he is corroborated by Fontein, who does not appear to have seen the money actually taken; but from that time we have the evidence of both Benjamin and Fontein, and they say that the complainant accused the prisoner of theft of 4s. 6d., and that the complainant went to fetch a police constable, and Fontein adds, that after Benjamin had left, the accused went out of the back door and ran away. Now, if the Magistrate believed that evidence, then there was actual taking of the money by the accused. There was some evidence given which may perhaps have suggested that he had the right to take money out of the drawer for the purpose of giving customers change, but this is not the defence set up by the accused. He claimed the money as his own property, and he denied at the time having abstracted any money from the drawer. The Magistrate, under the circumstances, came to the conclusion that the money was actually taken from the drawer, and after it was taken, the accused denied having taken it, and when the complainant went for police assistance, the accused ran away out of the shop. The Magistrate was justified in coming to the conclusion that he had sufficient evidence before him to prove the charge of theft against the accused. It is impossible for the Court, under the circumstances, to interfere with the finding of the Magistrate, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice, the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D., and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

STORK V. STORK. { 1903. Aug. 21st.

Mr. M. Bisset applied, on behalf of the petitioner (the husband), for the evidence of his witnesses, resident at Kokstad, East Griqualand, to be taken on commission in the divorce suit which he had instituted against his wife. Petitioner pointed out that the travelling expenses would be about £40 for each witness, and he was unable to bear such a large outlay.

De Villiers, C.J., said that a letter had been received by the Registrar from the defendant, in which she said that on the 11th April, 1902, her husband issued a summons against her in the Supreme Court of Natal, and she appeared to defend the action, but her husband did not proceed with the case, and he had never obtained judgment. If the case were heard in Cape Town she must ask leave to defend in forma pauperis, as she absolutely denied that she had been guilty of adultery, or had done anything to entitle her husband to a divorce, and she had no means. Nothing could be done in the matter for some time, and he thought the application had better stand over for the present, so that the Registrar could communicate with the defendant, and inform her that she should communicate with an attorney in Cape Town, so that she might be defended at the trial. There was no hurry really, because the case could not be tried until next term.

MCINTYRE V. ROBINSON BANK.

Mr. Searle, K.C., moved, upon notice of application, for the removal of this trial set down for hearing on Wednesday next to the next Circuit Court at Port Elizabeth. Counsel said that the action was for £100 damages, because a cheque was dishonoured by the Port Elizabeth branch of the Robinson Bank, and he put in an affidavit sworn by Mr. Leighton, chief agent of the Robinson South African Banking Company, Ltd., to the effect that the principal witnesses resided at Port Elizabeth, that the incident occurred at Port Elizabeth, and that it would be beneficial for both parties for the trial to be heard there.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., for the plaintiff, opposed, and read an affidavit sworn by Mr. Trollope, attorney, to the effect that the Circuit Court at Port Elizabeth was a busy one, that it was difficult to confer with counsel, and that it was probable that any judgment of the Lower Court would be the subject of an appeal.

De Villiers, C.J.: The balance of convenience appears to be in favour of the trial at Port Elizabeth. It is said that the plaintiff or other party would probably appeal, but, even in case of an appeal, I think the expenses of a trial at Port Elizabeth, plus the expenses of an appeal, would be less than having the case tried, in the first instance, in Cape Town. Upon the whole, the Court is of opinion that the case should be removed, costs to be costs in the cause.

HANSEN AND SCHRADER V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT. { 1903. Aug. 21st.

Railway—Servitude—Expropriation—Amended title under Act 9 of 1879.

In 1873 the Government expropriated certain land forming portion of a farm for railway purposes, and paid due compensation to the owners. The portion expropriated was cut off from the rest of the land by means of fences, but the Government did not use the whole of the land so expropriated and no transfer of the portion expropriated was made to the Government, although a diagram shewing the portion cut off was attached to the transfer in the Deeds Office. The plaintiffs bought the farm with knowledge of the fact that portion had been cut off for railway purposes. In 1902 the plaintiffs obtained an amended title under Act 9 of 1879, which included the land expropriated, but stated that the grant was subject to conditions contained in previous transfers and the diagram attached to the grant shewed the portion expropriated for the railway.

Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to eject the Government or to claim compensation for expropriation.

This was an action brought by Hansen and Schrader, merchants, Port Elizabeth, against the Colonial Government, for a declaration of rights, ejectment and damages, in respect to a certain plot of land enclosed by the Railway Department on the line between Port Elizabeth and Bushman's River.

The declaration set out that the plaintiffs were the registered owners of a certain piece of land, which was originally granted, and known as Deal Party, situate near Port Elizabeth. In 1873 certain consents were entered into by the mortgagees of this land, the Provincial Trust Board and Church. In 1874 certain other persons, who were interested as heirs, and others in the estate, gave their consent to the expropriation of a certain piece of land. The consent given by the mortgagee was as to 13 acres of land on the estate Deal Party, to be utilised for the purposes of a railway between Port Elizabeth and Zwartkops River. According to that consent they agreed to 13 acres being deducted from the estate. In the Deeds Registry Office there was a plan marked (a), which showed the extent as being 13 acres. Under these consents the Government was entitled to only 13 acres, and not more, but they had taken possession of a great deal more, which was shown on the plan, and the plaintiffs said that, by reason of the Government taking possession, they had sustained damage, and they claimed £1,000. They said that, if the Court held that the Government were entitled to take possession of the land, they were only entitled to take as much as was required for railway purposes, and that they had taken a 100-feet strip, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to damages in respect to the excess in the sum of £750. In the alternative, plaintiffs prayed for an order for ejectment from the land, except as to the 13 acres, and a sum for damages.

The defendants' plea admitted the consents, but said that the owners of Deal Party did not specify 13 acres, or any other extent of ground. The extent of ground to which the Government were entitled was delineated on the plan annexed, and if it exceeded the 13 acres, it had been in legal possession of the Colonial Government, pursuant to the said consent papers. The defendants denied the correctness of the plan attached to the declaration.

[Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Benjamin), for the plaintiffs; Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. H. Jones), for the defendants.]

Sir H. Juta put in the amended title obtained by the plaintiffs, and proceeded to read correspondence which had passed between the Hon. Mr. Chase and Mr. Robinson, the Chief Inspector of Public Works at that time, and the plaintiffs predecessors in title. It appeared that the terms agreed upon for the servitude across the ground was £250.

John Anthony Chabaud, attorney, Port Elizabeth, said he was sent out to purchase the property now held by plaintiffs, and draw out the deed of sale. In passing the deed to the plaintiffs, he had no knowledge of the plan marked (a). He bought the land in 1891 or 1892. He first became aware of the plan about four months ago. They had correspondence with the Surveyor-General's office, and they then found that the encroachment had taken place. He did not notice the endorsement until about a week ago.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: About four months ago he heard from Messrs. Van Zyl and Buissinné that the Railway Department had objected to the amended transfer going through.

He believed that the transfer went through, because the Surveyor-General said that it must go through.

Mr. Schreiner said that there had been no deduction from the property. Between the parties to this suit, there was no abandonment of the rights claimed by the Railway Department.

De Villiers, C. J., commented on the want of harmony between the Surveyor-General's Department and the Railway Department, and said that the former department had actually given the plaintiffs a grant against the Railway Department. It was a pity, he added, that there was not more harmony between these two Government departments.

Mr. Schreiner said that the Surveyor-General would be called, and he would be able to give an explanation, no doubt.

The witness Chabaud said he had not seen the old title-deed of 1841. He had seen the endorsement as to the expropriation of land. He looked into the title in favour of Berry when he drew up the deed of sale in 1892. He bought on that title, which he found to be a freehold title. He did not go back beyond the title of Berry.

Mr. Schreiner: It is no use saying that, because you know that it is not freehold, but is a quitrent.

Witness: It has been so declared by the Government.

Mr. Schreiner: You know it is quitrent, and not a freehold title.

By the Court: It was put down as a quitrent. That mistake was evidently made by some former magistrate at Port Elizabeth. How they discovered that the Government had taken 34 acres, instead of 13 acres, was in consequence of the Surveyor-General handing them a redeemed quitrent, instead of a freehold title.

Mr. Schreiner said it was not freehold, and had never been freehold; it was quitrent.

[De Villiers, C. J.: But they redeemed it.]

Mr. Schreiner: But that does not make it freehold.

George Wm. Smith, Government Land Surveyor, Port Elizabeth, said that in September, 1902, he was requested by the Government to prepare a diagram of certain land at Deal Party. He was to cut off 13 acres claimed by the Railway Department. He went to Deal Party, and he found that certain land, greatly exceeding 13 acres, had been fenced off. He had communicated with the Railway Department, and he received the documents produced. The plan accompanying the letter from the Railway Department did not show a ballast pit at all.

Mr. Schreiner said that that was a sketch of the line as it ran subsequently, but it did not show the original sketch of land taken in 1873.

Sir H. Juta said the plaintiffs did not object to the ballast pit, but they objected to such an excessive area of ground being fenced off.

Witness, in further evidence, said that the distance of the railway line on Deal Party, as shown on the plan was 8,650 feet, though, by survey, it was 9,440 feet, so that the plan showed less than the actual quantity. The actual amount of ground taken by the Railway Department was 34.76 acres. The width of the strip of land enclosed by the fence was 100 feet; it was double line at that point. He should say that the railroad and ballast pit actually occupied a width of about 25 feet.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: There were about 16 acres of the land as ballast pit, so that 18 acres remained for the line crossing Deal Party. He did not suggest that there had been any alteration of the original condition of things. He was first asked to go into the matter now when an amended title was asked for, though he had been in Port Elizabeth since 1862, with the exception of an interval of 12 years.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: He believed the extent of the ballast pit was 13 acres.

Mr. Schreiner said he did not understand his learned friend's position, as a short time ago he had told them that he did not object to the ballast pit.

Sir H. Juta said that what he meant was that he could not object to the ballast pit as being for railway purposes.

Arthur Herbert Waite, plaintiffs' manager, said the property was bought in 1892, and had since become very valuable. He had first become aware of the plan (a) within the last six months; it was after the amended title had been granted. They had sold about 6 acres at various prices; the average was about £400 an acre. They had been selling the land principally to merchants, who were erecting stores. At the last sale they had they received £900 an acre. If they had the strip in dispute it would greatly increase the value of the ground adjacent. They had had good facilities for leasing.

By the Court: When they bought they supposed that the land in dispute belonged to the Railway Department.

By Sir H. Juta: It was only when the amended title came to be drawn that they found this excess out. Although the title deed gave them a certain extent, they found what they actually got was considerably less.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The property was now known as New Brighton. The ballast pit was not of much use in its present form, but it might be filled in, and then it would be valuable, as it was close to the line. He did not deny that the high value of the ground was due to the fact of the railway being there. It was a double line of railway, and over this particular section the Midland traffic, the Uitenhage traffic, and the Graham's Town traffic were carried. He was not aware that it was intended to lay down a third set of rails to cope with the growing traffic from the port. What they desired was to narrow down the strip fenced by the department to 13 acres in all. The high value was determined by the length of frontage to the railway. They had at present got this length of frontage.

Sir H. Juta closed his case.

Carl H. M. Jurisch, Surveyor-General, produced a copy of the amended titles. He said that the rights of the Railway Department were protected by means of the servitude, consequently they could not exclude it from the land to be deducted. They could make no deduction, so that they had to make a grant of the full area with a servitude upon it as per old transfer deed. It was not customary to state in the new deeds all the conditions contained in the old deeds. It was as if they annexed the old deeds; they did not recite all the old conditions when a new deed was granted.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: It was the practice not only in the Surveyor-General's office, but also in the office of the Registrar of Deeds, to refer to previous transfers without reciting the details.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: As a rule the Railway Department had held their land under servitude, but as this was found inconvenient they had now decided to obtain transfer.

James Bisset, retired civil engineer, Wynberg, said he was the resident engineer on the construction of the Eastern districts railway in 1871. He spoke as to the plan prepared at the time of the expropriation of the land. That plan showed a ballast pit. It was not fenced at that time. The area was determined by pegs when they prepared the plans. The plan he prepared showed a ballast pit, and also that the extent of land taken for the railway was 100 feet wide. The first intention was to take a strip of 71 feet 6 inches, but he found that would not be sufficient, and he expropriated 100 feet; he thereupon delineated the 100 feet width and the ballast pit. He never spoke to Mr. Chase about 13 acres. Mr. Robinson got the idea of 13 acres from the original intention to expropriate 71 feet 6 inches. The settlement for £250 did not pass through his hands.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He was not aware that the land was mortgaged. He was not aware that the consent of the mortgagees was given. All the legal questions were settled in Cape Town. He told Robinson that he was taking more than 13 acres. He could not tell the Court why the Government did not take transfer of the land.

Gowan S. Cresswoll Clarke, Chief Traffic Manager of the Railway Department, said that the land fenced in at Deal Party was the same as was fenced in in 1882. Both the ballast pit and the strip for the line were the same.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., having been heard in argument, the Court intimated that it would be unnecessary to hear Mr. Schreiner.

De Villiers, C. J.: Before dealing with the rights of the plaintiffs, I wish to say a few words in regard to the rights of their predecessors in title. It would appear that these properties passed from hand to hand until the plaintiffs became the owners, and that in the year 1873 the Chases were the owners of this property, and communications took place between them and the Government regarding the expropriation of certain land for railway purposes. Compensation was, in point of fact, actually paid to the then owners of the land in respect of the expropriation by the Railway Department. It is not quite clear how much was paid in respect of this land, because £275 was paid in respect of this land and other land, but, certainly, this is clear, the compensation actually paid was for land, including the land expropriated for railway purposes. It would appear also that at that time compensation was paid, not so much for the value of the land, as for the inconvenience to the then owners of being cut off from one portion of the land. That inconvenience would have been equally great whether the width of the railway was 100 feet or much less. There seems to have been some mistake as to the acreage, but there was no mistake about the land taken by the Government, which was clearly indicated by the fences placed there in 1873, and still standing in 1903. It is clear, therefore, that the owners, in 1873, after the expropriation by the Government, and after the payment by the Government of compensation, would have had no right either to eject the Government or claim further compensation. The land which had been cut off showed exactly what was required, and the then owners would not have been entitled to say that the land was not required for railway purposes. Now, the question is whether the present plaintiffs, who had nothing to do with the communications between the Government and the then owners, are subject to the same obligations as the former owners. After the compensation had been paid to the former owners, a diagram was attached to the transfer in the Deeds Office, showing the extent of land expropriated. The transfer deed of the plaintiffs stated that the transfer was subject to conditons of previous transfers, but, which is of greater importance, the plaintiffs knew when they purchased, that part of the land was in occupation of the Railway Department. Subsequently the plaintiffs obtained an amended grant under the Act of 1879, but that grant also referred to previous conditions, and cannot be held to have freed the land from servitudes existing before the grant. The diagram attached to the grant clearly shows the railway line. The Government never acquired the ownership of the land taken, but they paid full compensation for the use of the land, and they are entitled at all events to a servitude thereon as against the plaintiffs, who had full knowledge before they bought, that the land in dispute had been cut off for purposes connected with the running of railways. There has been no expropriation of additional land since 1873, and the plaintiffs are not, in my opinion, entitled either to eject the Government, or to claim compensation for land expropriated. The judgment of the Court will be for the defendants, with costs.

GENERAL MOTION.

REYNOLDS V. NEW CAPE CENTRAL RAILWAYS, LTD.

Mr. Benjamin, for the defendants, applied for a postponement of the trial from Friday next, and for the appointment of a commissioner to take the evidence of a material witness in the case, who was at present in the Orange River Colony.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., opposed the application on behalf of the plaintiffs, and put in affidavits setting forth that there was no reason for any departure from the ordinary course.

The case was allowed to stand over to September 8, by which time there is to be an effort to have the witness in Cape Town.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

GENERAL MOTION.

NYMAN V. RABIE. { 1903. Aug. 21st.

Mr. Buchanan moved as a matter of urgency for an interdict restraining the respondent, Arthur Rabie, from removing any articles from certain premises at Sea Point. The house had been let by the applicant to the respondent at a rental of £18 per month, but no rent had been paid since April, and since the respondent had been given notice to quit it was feared that he would remove his only property, and the applicant would have no redress.

Interdict granted, pending an action, with leave to the respondent to apply to have it set aside.

TAYLOR v. LOWRY BROS. { 1903. Aug. 21st.

Manager—Sales on credit—Adoption of manager's acts by principal—Evidence.

The appellant had been sued in the Magistrate's Court by the respondents for the price of certain shop goods sold by him while acting as manager of one of the respondents' stores, on credit: (as the respondents maintained), contrary to their instructions. A portion of these book debts had been (with appellant's assistance) recovered by the respondents who, however, had in the Court below obtained judgment against the appellant for the balance of the debts not recovered.

Held, that as no evidence had been given to show that appellant had been instructed not to give credit, and that even had he been so instructed, the respondents had adopted his acts by themselves recovering, with his aid, a portion of the outstanding debts, he was not liable for the balance, and that the appeal must be allowed with costs in both Courts.

This was an appeal against a decision of the Resident Magistrate of Tsolo, in which the respondent was awarded a claim of £31 14s. 9d., against the appellant, being an amount of book debts at a native store, at which the appellant acted as the respondent's manager.

The evidence for the plaintiff in the Court below was to the effect that the defendant was instructed not to give any credit. Defendant, before he left the store, said that he had outstanding debts to the amounts of £25 or £35, but, when the plaintiff looked over the books, he found debts to the extent of £200. A considerable sum was recovered, but the defendant had given no satisfactory explanation of the outstanding debts. The defendant stated that the plaintiff had complained of the business at the store. He had instructions to give credit, and it was usual to do so at native stores. When the plaintiff pointed out that the store was not prospering, he gave instructions to give more credit. The plaintiff did not instruct him to collect the debts before he left. The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, left the question open as to whether the plaintiff gave instructions with regard to credit or not, and decided that the defendant was legally bound to account for the goods. The Court thought it unreasonable to suppose that the law would allow the manager to give unlimited credit at native stores, and, in support of his judgment, he was guided by the case of Biddulph v. Yates (2 Sheil, 387).

Mr. Upington (for the appellant) cited Biddulph v. Yates (10 Juta, 32). In that case the magistrate overruled the exception, and gave judgment, and there the facts were very different from the facts in this case. There the plaintiff recovered £200 for which the defendant was unable to account, and there was a deficiency of £238. In this case there are no debts outstanding from the £200 save some £31 14s. 9d., and this sum is made up of small debts, none of which exceed £6.

Mr. Close (for the respondent): The chief point is, did the principal allow his servant to give credit or not? On that point the magistrate does not seem to have given judgment. The case of Rymer v. Solomon (2 Sheil, 350), shows that the appellant has failed to prosecute his appeal within reasonable time. I would suggest that the case should be remitted back to the magistrate for further evidence.

[Maasdorp, J.: It is only a question of whether you, having collected these debts, can now proceed by this form of action?]

We never took over the debts not collected. In so far as we have recovered, we have waived our claim for damages.

[Maasdorp, J.: You have waived nothing. You have recovered all you could.]

The appellant was instructed to collect debts as manager, but there is nothing to show that the principal ratified his action.

[Maasdorp, J.: You say that he gives no explanation as to what has become of the goods; but he has told you to whom he sold them, and says that he cannot now find the purchasers?]

Any man may make up an imaginary list of debtors, and say that he cannot find them; that would open the door to any number of frauds. The magistrate finds that the appellant made no effort to collect these debts.

Mr. Upington was not called upon in reply.

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiffs in this case sue the defendant for the recovery of £31 14s. 9d., said to be due by the defendant to the plaintiffs for goods from their store, the said goods having been supplied to the persons named without the consent or knowledge of the plaintiffs. Now, it appears that the defendant in this case was the manager at the business station of the plaintiff's, where the chief part of his work was to dispose of the goods in the shop to customers. He seems to have sold some of the goods on credit, and when the owner came to take possession of the place at the time when the defendant ceased his service, he found that there was on the books about £200 due for goods sold, and delivered to customers. Thereupon, attempts were made to collect these debts, and the plaintiff, with the assistance of the defendant, collected a considerable amount, reducing the uncollected debts ultimately to the sum of £31. The plaintiff claimed the recovery of this £31 from the defendant. Now, the allegations in the summons certainly are not borne out by the evidence. It would appear from the summons that goods were wrongfully removed from the store, but the plaintiff had failed in proving that, because it appears that the goods were sold and delivered to customers. Now, the real point in this case is that the defendant had sold the goods on credit, when he had got instructions not to do so, and that, consequently, he is now bound, at all events, to account to the plaintiff for the moneys due upon goods sold upon credit. The question might or might not have been of importance whether this instruction had actually been given by the employer to his manager. If it were of importance to decide whether the manager had been forbidden to give credit, then that fact is not one upon which the Magistrate has made any finding, and, if it were necessary that the plaintiff should prove it, the plaintiff, having failed in that proof, the case must now go off as if such proof had not been given. It does not seem to me, however, to be of importance to decide whether these instructions were actually given, because, when the employer found that credit had been given to a considerable amount, he did not repudiate these transactions and claim from his manager these moneys upon the ground of misfeasance. But he actually adopted these sales, and so far, he must be taken to have ratified the action of his manager to the extent of £200. We find that he successfully recovered in respect of a large portion of these sales upon which the moneys had not been collected, when he took possession of the business. The conduct of the plaintiff was such that we must take it that the purchasers of the goods have become the debtors to the plaintiff, and he must now look to them for the recovery of these debts. It is said that the defendant has made no effort to account for the goods which were placed in his custody by his employer, and that, consequently, upon the authority of the case which has been cited from 10 Juta, 32, he is now bound to pay whatever balance is still due to his principal. But it appeared in that case that for a certain amount for which there was a deficiency, no account had been given at all by the manager. In this case, however, when the manager is called upon to account, he gave the explanation which I have already mentioned: that he sold these goods on credit, that he had not yet recovered the amounts of these accounts still outstanding. The plaintiff, accepting an explanation by his manager, adopts his action in the matter, and takes steps to recover these moneys from the debtors. Under these circumstances, I think he has wholly failed to substantiate the allegations in the summons that goods have been removed from the store which are unaccounted for, and that goods have been removed from the store without his consent and knowledge. The evidence proves that the goods were disposed of in the ordinary course of business, and as often happens, there was some difficulty ultimately in obtaining payment of the debts. There is one point more. Mr. Close has contended that, as more than a reasonable time had elapsed in prosecuting this appeal, that the case should not be entertained. Now, it seems to me, it is too late to raise that question. Under the Rules of this Court, the question ought to have been raised in another form. When the respondent found that an unreasonable time had elapsed, he could have moved the Court, upon setting forth the circumstances of the matter by affidavit, to have the proceedings discharged. The appeal will be allowed, and the judgment altered to one of absolution from the instance, with costs here and in the Court below.

VAN NORDWYK V. ROTHMAN. { 1903. Aug. 21st.

Conflict of evidence—Magistrate's finding on facts.

The appellant was the plaintiff in an action decided by the Resident Magistrate of Riversdale, in which he sued for the recovery of a certain ostrich or its value. The evidence for the plaintiff was to the effect that he bought a number of birds when young, the ostrich in question being one. This bird strayed, and plaintiff alleged that it was now in possession of defendant. He identified it by a scar on the thigh, and by a burn on the neck. The evidence for the defendant went to show that the ostrich in question was one of a lot purchased by him, and was a few months old when he bought it. Subsequently the bird was lost, but it afterwards turned up on the farm. It was identified by defendant and his witnesses by its peculiar head. The bird had since died. The defendant further stated that the bird went away before it could be branded. It came back about four months after it was missed. Both parties swore positively that the bird belonged to them. The Magistrate, in his reasons, stated that the bird was not branded, but plaintiff alleged that he identified the bird by a wound of some four months' standing; while defendant said this wound was one of about 15 days' standing. The statements were conflicting, but he believed the evidence of Field-cornet Rothman, the father of the defendant, that the ostrich was the property of the defendant, and that the wound was of recent date.

Mr. Burton for appellant. Mr. Upington for respondent.

After hearing Mr. Burton in argument and without calling upon Mr. Upington, the Court dismissed the appeal.

Maasdorp, J.: I do not think the Court can interfere with the judgment of the Magistrate in this case. The Magistrate had to decide whether the plaintiff had succeeded in proving that the ostrich in question was his property, and he (the Magistrate) found that he had failed to do so. Now it seems to me that the arguments advanced by Mr. Burton, on appeal, could have been brought before the Magistrate with great force, and the Magistrate would then have been able to deal with all the points raised. But they cannot have the same effect upon appeal. There is no doubt that there was a bona fide dispute between the plaintiff and the defendant as to the ownership of the ostrich, and it seems that the principal point to which the Magistrate had to direct his attention in coming to his decision, was as to the appearance of a scar on one of the legs of this bird, which the witnesses on both sides swore to as a mark proving the ownership either of the defendant or of the plaintiff. It is certainly peculiar that when this mark was a matter of such importance, the plaintiff is supported only by one witness upon that point after the dispute had arisen between the parties. Another witness, who was actually upon the farm of the defendant, and saw the bird in his (defendant's) camp, never even took the trouble to raise the feathers, and examine the bird to ascertain whether the wound was such as he had seen upon the plaintiff's bird; and another important witness, Mr. Kuhn, who is said to have sold this bird to the plaintiff, was not even required to visit the farm for the purpose of examining the bird in order to give his opinion as to its identity. Under the circumstances, I think that the finding of the Magistrate upon this conflict of evidence must be accepted, especially when we see that he points out that he places particular reliance upon the evidence of one of the witnesses, who gave very pointed evidence upon his knowledge of this bird as the property of the defendant. The Court will not lightly interfere with the finding of the Magistrate upon such a question of fact, but I think, in this case, I might go even further, and say that after hearing the evidence read, it seems to me that the great weight of evidence in this case is upon the side of the defendant, and under the circumstances, the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP, and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

ESTATE CRAFFORD V. WATSON. { 1903. Aug. 24th.

Mr. Burton (with him Mr. De Waal), for the plaintiff, applied for an order referring this matter to arbitration. He said that the parties had come to an arrangement whereby the case was to be withdrawn from this court upon an undertaking by the defendant to go to arbitration, the basis of which was settled in terms of a letter written by the plaintiff's attorney to the defendant's attorney. Counsel mentioned the name of Mr. W. A. Currey, of the General Orphan Chamber, as arbitrator.

Order granted referring the matter to arbitration in terms of consent, and appointing Mr. Currey as arbitrator.

SHAW V. FOCK.

Mr. Upington, for the defendant, applied for the hearing of this case to be postponed on account of his client's illness.

Mr. Burton, for the plaintiff, said he did not object to a postponement, but he thought the defendant ought to give an undertaking to bear the costs of the day.

Mr. Upington said that in the case of Kornig v. Landeshutt (13 C.T.R., 420), where the plaintiff was too ill to appear, it was thought that it was unreasonable to ask that he should pay the costs of the day.

De Villiers, C.J., said that he thought there must have some some special reason in that case. This was the trial day in the present case, and costs had been incurred.

Mr. Burton said that under all the circumstances he would not object to the question of costs standing over.

The hearing was set down for the 7th September, the question of costs of the day to stand over.

FISHER V. ATKINS. { 1903. Aug. 24th.

Land agent—Remuneration.

The plaintiff, a land agent, who had been requested by the defendant to find a purchaser for a certain property, informed the defendant that B. was willing to buy for £3,500, but the defendant said he wanted £4,500. The plaintiff informed B. of this price, and some days afterwards the defendant asked B. whether he would buy the property, to which B. consented on obtaining a reduction of the price to £3,900. The Court, finding that the defendant had entered into communication with B. in consequence of the introduction of A.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to his commission.

This was an action brought by Adolph M. Fisher, broker, Cape Town, against Henry Atkins, commission agent and general merchant, Cape Town, to recover £97 10s. for brokerage upon the sale of certain properties.

The declaration set out that in or about March, 1903, the defendant placed in plaintiff's hands for sale as broker a certain property in the Gardens, and shortly afterwards certain other property belonging to him, namely, two cottages in Mill-street, Cape Town. Plaintiff entered into negotiations for the sale of the properties, advertised the same in the newspapers, expended time and labour thereon at defendant's special instance and request, and dealt with one Dr. Budd for the sale and purchase of the property. He offered to purchase the property for £3,500. The defendant was absent at that time in Europe, but when he returned the plaintiff submitted Dr. Budd's offer to him, but the defendant refused to sell for £3,500, and said that he wanted £4,500 for the property. Thereafter, the defendant sold the property himself to Dr. Budd for £3,900. Plaintiff claimed 2½ per cent. on the purchase price, the usual and customary brokerage charged by brokers on the sale of landed property, the sale having been effected through the plaintiff in consequence of the introduction aforesaid.

The defendant, in his plea, admitted the parties and the sale of the property, but denied that he placed the property in the hands of the plaintiff for sale as the broker. He said he had no knowledge of the allegations as to the trouble expended about the matter by the plaintiff, and that, even if plaintiff did act as therein alleged, which he did not admit, he so acted without the knowledge and instruction of the defendant. In March, he said, the plaintiff inquired from him the price of the two cottages, and he told him £4,500. He denied that the plaintiff mentioned Dr. Budd's name to him. He admitted that he refused to pay, but specially denied that the sale was effected through the plaintiff's agency.

Wherefore he prayed that plaintiff's claim be dismissed with costs.

The replication was general.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. M. De Villiers), for plaintiff. Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Benjamin), for defendant.

Adolph Mark Fisher, plaintiff, stated that between February and March last year he asked plaintiff if he wanted to sell certain property in Hope-street, and the defendant, after mentioning the price at £5,600, or £5,500 suggested that the plaintiff might try and dispose of two cottages in Mill-street, with the option of selling them singly, but, at the same time. Witness got dimensions, and advertised the houses in the daily papers, and also circularised the sale to his clients. The defendant was quite prepared to pay 2½ per cent. brokerage. About six months later Atkins went to England, and in February, 1903, while witness was negotiating with Dr. Budd about another house, he suggested that the two cottages would suit him better. It was arranged to complete the proceedings on the defendant's return, and in March witness met the defendant, and told him that Dr. Budd offered £3,500, but the offer was refused. About the 30th March, Dr. Budd purchased the property from the defendant for £3,900. Witness wrote for his brokerage on the 1st April, and eight days later the defendant expressed his surprise at the demand, and informed him that he had sold the property privately to Dr. Budd. The actual cost of advertising would be about £5 or £6.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He would tell the Court that all the property he advertised in his lists had been given him by the sellers. He considered that when he asked a man if his property was for sale that it was in his hands. Witness was told by a client that he would like to buy a house in that neighbourhood, but he did not ask the plaintiff in St. George's-street if he would sell the two cottages. It was unnecessary to have any documents in the matter, and he usually relied on a casual conversation. He never had any transactions with the plaintiff before. Several brokers probably got the same instructions. Witness did not stop the plaintiff in St. George's-street, and he had never said anything about the cottages up till the time the defendant left for England, and on his return the defendant said he would not take £3,500. It was usual to name the buyer to the seller. It was not unusual for brokers to give all the information they had immediately to the seller. It was not the ordinary broker's precaution to say that they had a purchaser without giving the name. The defendant required no introduction to Dr. Budd, as the latter was his tenant.

By De Villiers, C.J.: He did not mean to say that he would sell the property without consulting the owner.

He considered that he had no authority at the time of the sale to sell for £3,500 on account of the state of the property market.

Dr. Budd stated that in the month of March he had negotiations with the plaintiff about the purchase of the property. That was the first intimation he had of the property being for sale, but, on account of the healthy state of the market the plaintiff said he would wait for the return of Mr. Atkins. On the day plaintiff returned witness was interviewed by Fisher, who said that the defendant wanted £4,500. Witness would probably have given £3,500 for it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Probably? Certainly, you mean. You gave more for it later on.]

Witness: Yes, my lord.

He met Atkins on the 30th March, when the defendant gave him the refusal of the property until the next morning. Atkins said that Fisher had nothing to do with the property. Next morning witness purchased the property for £3,900, and he afterwards told Fisher about the purchase.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He was negotiating for another house when he saw Fisher. Witness first inquired of Fisher about the houses about the beginning of March or the end of February. Fisher was to find out if the property could be purchased for £3,500, and the plaintiff could not have closed the transaction without reference to him. Fisher could bring no better offer than £4,500. Nothing occurred with Fisher in reference to that property between the 17th and the 30th March.

Mr. Searle closed his case.

Mr. Schreiner called

Henry Atkins, the defendant, who stated that he had never put property in any broker's hands. Fisher never had any business with him. In February, 1902, the defendant met him in St. George's-street, but he had never been to defendant's office. That was the only occasion on which he had any interview with him. Fisher asked him if Windsor-terrace was for sale, and then inquired about the two cottages in question. Witness had no recollection of the plaintiff mentioning a purchaser to him for his own house. Plaintiff passed witness several times, and the words attributed to him by the plaintiff he never made use of. On the day of his return the plaintiff saw him in a tram, and asked witness if he would still take £3,500 for the property. Witness said that he would not, and the plaintiff promised to see him next day, but failed to keep his appointment. He would swear positively that Fisher never mentioned the name of Budd. On the 30th March he met Dr. Budd, and talked over the matter, and the latter asked for an option on £4,000 till the next morning. Dr. Budd said, "Shall I see Fisher about this?" and witness replied, "What has Fisher got to do with it." The doctor said that the property was offered to him by Fisher for £4,500. The following evening the sale was effected for £3,900.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: When Dr. Budd mentioned the name of Fisher witness considered that the sale was practically effected. He looked upon Fisher's demand as a piece of downright impertinence. He did not notice the property in the advertisements. He admitted that he had told Fisher that he would take £3,500 for the property, and if he had brought a purchaser at the time the brokerage would have been paid. Every broker had the particulars, and it was customary for them to stop an owner in the street and ask questions about any property that was for sale. Fisher did not tell him in the tram that £3,500 could be had for the property. He did not mention the matter to Dr. Budd because Fisher had given him the information that the former was a purchaser. Brokers, as a rule, did not divulge the name of the purchaser.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case, and counsel were then heard in argument on the facts.

De Villiers, C.J.: The defendant in his evidence admitted that before he left for Europe he had authorised the plaintiff to find a purchaser for the property in question for £3,500. He also admitted that if within a short time afterwards the plaintiff had found a purchaser at £3,500, and sent him the broker's note, he would have considered himself bound to accept the broker's note to conclude the purchase. No purchaser was found before the defendant left for Europe; but, during his absence, the plaintiff had communications with Dr. Budd, and he informed Dr. Budd that he had this property for sale for £3,500, and he understood from Dr. Budd that he would be prepared to pay that price. Dr. Budd does not remember the agreement arrived at, but he seems to consider he would have been bound to accept the property for £3,500, after what had taken place between him and the plaintiff. On the defendant's return the plaintiff met him, and they had a conversation in a tramcar, and the most important question in the case is really what took place in the course of that conversation. The plaintiff positively swears that he informed the defendant that not only could he find a purchaser for £3,500, but that the intending purchaser was Dr. Budd. The defendant admits there was a conversation, but he denies that Dr. Budd's name was mentioned. In my opinion, Dr. Budd's name was mentioned, and, in consequence of the mentioning of the name, the defendant afterwards approached Dr. Budd and concluded a sale for £3,900. Now, there is a direct conflict of testimony, and in that conflict the Court should endeavour from other communications in the evidence to conclude whose evidence was the more trustworthy. I cannot lose sight of the fact that the memory of the defendant is extremely treacherous. His communication with Dr. Budd took place on the 30th March, and ten days later he wrote a letter to the plaintiff in which he says: "I have sold the property to Dr. Budd personally, and at the time of the purchase your name was not mentioned." Now, that is wholly incorrect, because at the time of the purchase his name had been mentioned; and the defendant is bound to admit now that the name had been mentioned. His explanation is a very ingenious one. He says that the sale had actually taken place, and that the name of the plaintiff was mentioned afterwards; but, in point of fact, no purchase was concluded that day, and at the time of the negotiations the name of the plaintiff had been mentioned. If the defendant's memory was so treacherous then, ten days after the conversation, I should think it would be considerably more treacherous after the lapse of a considerable time. The only point in his favour is that there is a certain amount of improbability in the broker declaring the name of the principal until there is a fair probability of the sale being completed; but, however improbable it may be, it is not impossible. The cases that have been cited show that it is very often done, and in the present case there might be a good reason why the name should be disclosed, because Fisher, knowing that Dr. Budd was a tenant of the defendant, might think he would forestall him. I have come to the conclusion, with considerable reluctance, that the plaintiff's version is correct, and that he did in conversation in the tramcar inform the defendant that Dr. Budd was the intending purchaser. If this is the case, then I think the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. Mr. Schreiner has contended that the agency had practically ceased, but, in my opinion, the agency had not yet ceased. Supposing the plaintiff had succeeded in inducing Dr. Budd to pay £4,500, and had closed the bargain there and then, and drawn up a note, surely the defendant could not have repudiated the sale. The plaintiff is entitled therefore to recover for the services rendered to his client the amount of commission on the sale to Dr. Budd. Judgment will therefore be for the plaintiff, with costs.

Maasdorp, J., and Kotzé, J., concurred.

DORAN V. DORAN.

This was an action brought by Maud Edith Elizabeth Doran against her husband, Charles Doran, for judicial separation on the grounds of cruelty.

The declaration set forth that the parties were married in Cape Town in October, 1902, and there had been one child issue of the marriage. Since the date of the marriage, the defendant had made cruel and unfounded charges of infidelity against the plaintiff, and rendered cohabitation with him dangerous. Plaintiff claimed judicial separation a mensa et thoro, a division of the joint estate, and custody of the minor child.

The plea denied the allegations of cruelty, or that he had ever used threatening language to the plaintiff. On the 30th June last the plaintiff wrongfully deserted him, and in reconvention, he claimed an order calling upon the defendant to return to him, failing which a decree of divorce, forfeiture of the benefits under the marriage, and custody of the child.

The plaintiff, in her replication, denied that she wrongfully deserted him, and admitted that she had refused to return on account of the defendant's cruelty.

Mr. Upington for plaintiff; Mr. Close for defendant.

Maud Edith Elizabeth Doran, plaintiff, said that on the 24th October, 1903, she was married to the defendant. After the marriage, she lived near her parents' house. From the commencement, the marriage was unhappy. There were continual quarrels, and the defendant charged her with extravagance. As time went on, things got worse and worse. The defendant ordered witness to leave the house, and said that he would make her an allowance, and repeated the order on several occasions. On March 4th this year she went to England with her husband, and at that time there was one child of the marriage. She visited the defendant's relatives in Sheerness, and there the defendant became very abusive, and called her names. The defendant's people were extremely nasty, and his mother threatened to blacken her eyes, and the defendant did nothing to protect her. Several times she complained to her husband, but he took no notice. The defendant's mother turned her out, and on three occasions the defendant threatened to shoot her. He left her with £3 10s. at Liverpool-street Station, London, and told her if she was not at Waterloo Station at half-past ten on Saturday, he would leave for South Africa without her. He did not provide her with any accommodation. Witness then wrote to her mother about the ill-treatment. She found her husband at Waterloo Station, and proceeded to the Cape with him. They scarcely spoke on the way out, and she was met at the Docks by her mother and brother. She proceeded to her father's house, and remained there ever since. Her husband threatened to shoot her, and she was afraid to return to him.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: Her husband had made repeated attempts to see her, but he had not been threatened with the police. He had not since attempted to molest her. She did not look down upon her husband. He got angry over everything. The trouble was not caused through witness and the plaintiff having different views of the household duties of a wife. She did not object to him saving money. The chief cause of the primary trouble was whether witness was extravagant or not. She could do nothing to please her mother-in-law. Witness never made little of her mother-in-law for her quiet way of living. The defendant never cared for the child. The defendant's people succeeded in making mischief between witness and her husband. She did not tell her mother-in-law that the defendant was penniless when she married him, and that he was only a draper, and in Plein-street at that, and that he was so subservient to his employer that the latter used to put his foot on his neck. It was not the result of a violent quarrel that the defendant told her to procure abortion. If witness should tell anything about his mother out here she was to be shot, and on another occasion he said he would swing for her before he was 40.

John Stewart, accountant, said that the plaintiff was his daughter. The plaintiff had never complained up to the time she left for England. In case plaintiff and defendant were not reconciled on their arrival here witness had a letter ready, and it was handed to the defendant in order that he would understand that the plaintiff would not return to him again. The defendant asked to see the plaintiff in order to settle matters, but witness would not allow it.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: His daughter would never complain. He had noticed that his daughter had been crying on several occasions. The defendant was a quiet sort of man, and it was difficult to have conversation with him. When he wrote to the defendant's mother he stated under provocation that the defendant was an "unmanly cad." He could not let his daughter return to the defendant unconditionally.

Mr. Upington closed his case.

This closed the evidence for the plaintiff.

Chas. Hy. Doran, defendant, denied ever having threatened to shoot his wife. Witness cautioned his wife against her supercilious airs in Sheerness, and the remark he passed about abortion was in the heat of a moment, and was never intended. It was simply on her own grumblings that witness told her that she could go home to her mother. Witness never made any remark about the intimacy with a sanitary inspector, and would not accuse his wife of such a thing. He did not use foul and abusive language towards his wife. If the plaintiff had never written that letter to her father the case would never have occurred. Witness tried to keep the plaintiff within his income, but she travelled beyond that.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He never ordered the plaintiff out of the house. Witness said that except she could carry out the duties of a married woman she might go to her mother and he would give her half his income. She was extravagant notwithstanding the fact that she saved £95 out of his salary in a couple of years. Witness told his mother that the women in the Cape were on a higher level than those in England, and that allowances must be made for her. The passage back to the Cape was certainly a trifle cool. The plaintiff knew London better than he did, and he left her at Liverpool-street Station with the baby and £3 10s. in her possession.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J., said that there was not sufficient ground for granting a decree of judicial separation, and granted a decree of restitution of conjugal rights, the plaintiff to return or receive the defendant on or before October 1, failing which the Court would grant a rule calling on the plaintiff to show cause by the first day of next term why a decree of divorce should not be granted, the plaintiff to have custody of the child, or any child that may be born of the marriage. No order as to costs.

Their lordships concurred.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice, the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.]

LEFFLER V. PHILLIPS. { 1903. Aug. 25th.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., applied for leave to take the evidence of the defendant (Mrs. Phillips) and her son, Arthur Phillips, residing at Kenilworth, on commission in preparation for the trial set down for Friday next. Counsel put in a certificate from Dr. Beck as to the condition of the defendant and her son.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for the respondent, said he could not object to the application so far as Mrs. Phillips was concerned in view of Dr. Beck's certificate, but he did not see any necessity for her son's evidence to be taken on commission.

The Court directed Mrs. Phillips' evidence to be taken on commission, with Mr. Russell as commissioner, costs to be costs in the cause.

WORCESTER MUNICIPALITY AND OTHERS V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., applied to the Court for a day to be fixed for the hearing of this action, set down in the list for Friday next. Counsel said that this would be a very lengthy case, as a good deal of evidence would be heard. It was a case in connection with the supply of water to the railway, and it involved an investigation of the entire relations in that matter back to the year 1824. The Municipality, together with three other plaintiffs, who were erf-holders and holders of rights to water, were claiming to enforce a notice given about a year ago to the Government to cease taking Municipal water, and the Government were contending that they were perpetually justified in taking water.

De Villiers, C.J., said that he did not see how the case could be set down for this term. The new rules of Court had been sent in to the Government, and they had not yet been confirmed, so that it was impossible to fix a day at present. He thought the case should stand over till next term.

BRAUN V. POWRIE. { 1903. Aug. 25th. „ 26th.

Servitude — Remission — Permitting acts inconsistent with servitude.

In an action for an interdict restraining the defendant, the owner of land over which the plaintiff had a duly registered right of road, from placing a fence across the road, the evidence shewed that the defendant had for two or three years made a garden on the strip of land set apart for the road, but the strip of land was fenced off from the rest of the defendant's property, and there was no evidence that the owner of the plaintiff's property knew of the trespass.

Held, that the work done on the strip of land was not of so permanent or substantial a nature as to justify the inference that the plaintiff had relinquished his right of road, and held consequently that the servitude had not been lost by reason of the owner of the dominant tenement having permitted acts inconsistent with the servitude.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, who is a property owner in the Gardens, to recover £100 damages from the defendant, the owner of adjacent property, for wrongfully obstructing a road to which plaintiff claimed a right of way under a servitude.

The declaration alleged that the parties were the registered owners of land adjoining Breda-street in the Gardens, the defendant being the owner of the remaining extent of the original grant. There was registered upon the title deeds of the defendant a servitude of road of a certain width (14 ft. 6 in.), in favour of the plaintiff. The road led from the plaintiff's property on to a public street, and was so surrounded that there was no acess to his property except by this road. In or about April or May, the defendant wrongfully obstructed the said road, and prevented the plaintiff from having access to his property, and refused to remove the obstruction, and plaintiff was still prevented from having access to the property, whereby the plaintiff had sustained damage. The plaintiff claimed an order compelling the defendant to remove the obstruction, and damages in the sum of £100, alternate relief and costs of suit. The defendant's plea admitted ownership of the servitude, but said that the plaintiff and his predecessors had not made use of the servitude for 30 years, and that the plaintiff and his predecessors had allowed trees to grow across the road, so as to make it impossible to use the same, and that the land was fenced off from Breda-street, and used for gardening, and for a poultry run. The defendant contended that the plaintiff had lost the servitude, and in reconvention claimed full ownership and £50 damages. The replication admitted that certain trees had been allowed to grow there, but denied the rest of the allegations.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Buchanan) for plaintiff. Mr. Close (with him Mr. J. E. R. De Villiers) for defendant.

Sir H. Juta said that the defendant's case was that the plaintiff and his predecessors had lost the servitude by non user for a period of 30 years. He submitted that upon the pleadings the onus of proof lay upon the defendant to show that the servitude registered upon the title had been lost.

Mr. Close said he could not object to that contention.

Evidence was then called for the defendant.

Thomas C. Murray, Government land surveyor, said he had made a survey of the property of Mrs. Powrie, of Osborne Lodge, in Breda-street. There was a row of oak trees growing within Mrs. Powrie's ground. In the roadway there were two trees growing, there being a space of ten feet between them. Those trees were in a line with the trees in Mrs. Powrie's ground.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He did not see any pear trees on the other side of the road in dispute.

Mrs. Helen Powrie, the defendant, said she was the owner of Osborne Lodge, Breda-street, having purchased it in 1902 from Mr. Currey. She made an inspection at the time. With regard to the road, she found it fenced with galvanised iron and branches on the Breda-street side. Mr. Bean had a fowl run there, and a fowl-house stood in the roadway. The remaining half of the roadway was occupied by Mr. Walters, of Osborne Lodge, who had potatoes growing there. When she bought the property, she asked Mr. Bean to take away the fowl-house and run, and told him to take away the material. She then fenced the road in with wire-netting on two sides—Mill-street side and Mr. Bean's house side. Across the road on the lot A side, five oak trees were growing. A cart could not have come in. There were twelve rows of barbed wire rising from the ground to the height of a man. It cut off the entrance from the lot A side. The wire did not appear to have been newly put up; in fact, the bark had grown over it. On the Osborne Lodge side of the road, there was a wooden fence, with a gate into Osborne Lodge. At that time the gate was being used by the tenant of Osborne Lodge, Mr. Walters. Mr. Currey told her (witness) when she bought it that she could not build on the roadway. She did not understand what the nature of a servitude was at that time. She went into the premises on the 1st September last year. From that time up to April she used the road. It remained fenced off. There was no traffic over it. Nobody used the ground except themselves. In April last Mr. Braun bought the adjoining property, and he proceeded to cut down three trees on the lot A side, and removed the fence on one side. She showed the plaintiff her diagram, and told him she thought he was wrong. The plaintiff simply swore, and said he would do as he liked. Witness put up the fence again, and the plaintiff then drove through it, and had it pulled up. Witness then had barbed wire put up where the trees had been growing. She claimed the oak trees which had been cut down as her own. A pillar was also knocked down by the plaintiff. She claimed £50 damages.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: She purchased the property from Mr. Currey, of the General Estate and Orphan Chamber, acting for Mr. Anderson. Mr. Currey told her that she could not build on the land in question, and that there was a servitude on it. She thought at the time that the servitude meant that if the Town House wanted the ground for a street or to put lamps there, they could compel her to sell it to them. She did not remember Mr. Currey saying that the owners of the adjoining property had a right-of-way over the land adjoining. Mr. Braun brought building material over the road. She tried to stop him, and stood in front of the horses, and he threatened to drive over her.

Robert Powrie, nephew of the defendant, gave evidence as to the incidents of April last. The trees he judged were about 30 years old.

Frederick Charles Walters, formerly of Osborne Lodge, said that he was living there in 1900. As to the strip of road at the bottom of the ground, there was a gateway opening into it. On the Breda-street side, the road was closed up with a fence. On the Orange Grove side there was a wire across the trees. The road was used as a potato patch and a fowl run.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He had always understood that the road belonged to the owner of Orange Grove. They recognised that they were using it on sufferance.

Holford Bean said he occupied property on the lower side of Mrs. Powrie's place for eight years, from 1895. The road on the Breda-street side at that time was always closed, and also on the Orange Grove side. He occupied nearly half of the roadway with his poultry run.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He was there on sufferance; he was prepared to remove the fowl-house and run any time when requested.

Catherina van Breda said that she had lived in the neighbourhood of the house Osborne Lodge for about 18 or 19 years. She had never seen the roadway open until during this year.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: She remembered Mr. Myburgh occupying that house. She had not noticed the roadway particularly; her observation was simply casual.

Marthinus L. Wessels said he was born at Orange Grove, immediately above Osborne Lodge, in 1853, and lived there until 1860. Witness often used to visit his grandfather, who lived near Osborne Lodge, from 1858 until 1870. In 1872 or 1873 witness's cousins went to live opposite Osborne Lodge. It was when witness was a minor. He frequently visited his cousins—nearly every week. The land from Mill-street up to Osborne Lodge was witness's grandfather's property. There was no roadway, as far as witness knew. On his grandfather's ground, there were oak trees, spars being fixed across from one to another to keep the cattle off the ground. Witness knew of no road, and never saw the ground used as a roadway.

By the Court: Witness could not recollect what the strip of land was used for. He could not say positvely no one ever walked over it, as he did not live there; he only visited the place. The land was blocked at the Breda-street end.

Abraham Felix, a coloured man, who said he was the oldest man on the land, also gave corroborative evidence.

Mr. Close closed his case.

Sir Henry Juta called,

Wm. Arthur Currey, who said he sold the property on behalf of Mr. Anderson to Mrs. Powrie. Witness told her there was a servitude in favour of the owner at the back, although the land was included in the area transferred to her. Witness had seen the land cultivated, and had stopped one person (Bean) from cultivating it, telling him it was a road.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: To the best of witness's recollection, the land was always closed up at the Breda-street end.

Henry A. Bidewell Edwards, land agent, said he had lived in the vicinity in 1880 and in 1886. Witness approached Mr. Myburgh, who owned the property now held by plaintiff, for the purpose of hiring the roadway. Witness rented the ground from Myburgh. Myburgh claimed the ground, and used it as he pleased.

Oswald Christie Phillips, son of a former tenant of Osborne Lodge, said that he lived there between 1887 and 1894. He knew the roadway in dispute. Osborne Lodge was marked off by a 6 ft. fence from the road at that time. He did not remember a gateway from Osborne Lodge to the road. They did not use the road. It was used by the Myburghs. The Myburghs used the road in dispute as their own.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: The fence on the Breda-street side was always crossed during the time they were there. Oaks were growing on the Orange Grove end of the road right across. The Myburghs had a vineyard there, and he understood they used to do their best to keep this place blocked up to prevent thieves breaking through.

By the Court: The Myburghs would have to clamber over the fence to get into the roadway.

Stephanus Papenfus, broker and auctioneer, Cape Town, said he owned Orange Grove and the portion of land now belonging to the plaintiff between 1896 and 1903. He occupied the property till 1901, and he afterwards let it. He knew the road from the vineyard to Breda-street. He had walked over the land whenever he wanted; he was never hindered by any owner of the property now belonging to Mrs. Powrie. He had blocked up one side because he found that his grapes were being stolen. That was on the side of the property occupied by Mr. Bean. He did not let the roadway during his time. He stopped other people from using it.

By the Court: He did not claim the strip as his own property, but he had a right of way over it. There were only two people had a right of way there —Mrs. Anderson and himself. Mr. Bean took French leave, and used the ground while witness was in England.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The fact of you having had a right of way did not enable you to prevent other people from using the road. The strip belongs to Mrs. Powrie's property, if it belongs to anybody, and you and the Myburghs seem to have regarded it as your property.]

Louis Arthur Myburgh, of Myburgh and Thomas, brokers, Cape Town, son of the late Mr. Myburgh, former owner of Orange Grove, said he had walked across the land in question hundreds of times to go from the vineyard to Breda-street. His brothers and friends had frequently used it. He did not remember manure being brought in by that road from Breda-street. They only used to grow mealies on the land. They kept the hedges in repair, except the fence of Osborne Lodge.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: He was speaking of days when, as schoolboys, they used to play on this ground. They had always looked upon the land as their own property.

The plaintiff, Julius Braun, said he bought the property known as the Vineyard from Mrs. Cosay. The only access he had to the public road was over the ground in dispute. He bought the ground for building purposes. He went there with his workmen about April, and they continued to go over the ground for a fortnight, when they were stopped by Mrs. Powrie. He pointed out to her that he had a right of way over the land. The defendant would not have it, otherwise than that the land belonged to her. The defendant put some wire netting across the road from the Breda-street side. He took that down again, and defendant afterwards put it up again. Mrs. Powrie afterwards erected a substantial fence. He had been put back with his building operations through Mrs. Powrie's interference, and had been prevented from taking materials there. He was intending to erect nine houses there and to let them. In any event he would be three months late in the erection of the houses. He estimated the damages he had suffered at £100.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: He had been taking stones on to land a little higher up, by permission of Mr. Cosay, for about a fortnight. He removed two oak trees from the strip of land in dispute. He did not knock a pillar down at the entrance. He denied that he told the cart driver to go over Mrs. Powrie, who was standing in the way.

Christian Peters, gardener, Kenilworth, said he used to be in the service of Mr. Myburgh at Orange Grove. He had mended the fences and the road several times. He had seen his master's sons come over the road many times and play with their school-fellows.

Sir H. Juta closed his case.

Sir H. Juta (for plaintiff): Upon the documents this application should be granted. The road was closed for a time, but that does not give the respondent any rights. I submit that Myburgh's affidavit is much more satisfactory than that of the respondent. No tory than that of the respondent.

Mr. Close (for defendant): The applicants abandoned their right of servitude, and set up a claim as owners. See Edmeades v. Scheepers and Edmeades v. Mostert (1 Juta, 334). This is certainly no case for an interdict, since no clear right has been shown.

Sir H. Juta (in reply): Our right is shown on the title, and the onus of disproving it rests with the respondent. The former owners used this road. It has been argued for the applicant that we have lost our rights by non user, but old inhabitants all testify to the fact of this road having been used continuously. If I have a right of way, and do not take a vehicle over the road, I do not lose my right of way, provided I continue to avail myself of the footpath.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What do you say about the trees?]

The trees never obstructed the use of the road or the sowing of mealies.

Mr. Close (for defendants): The plaintiff has established his claim to a declaration of rights by reason of non user on the part of the persons who claim the servitude. For the preservation of a servitude, it is necessary that it should be preserved per modum servitutis et qua servitus. The Myburghs always regarded this road as a nuisance; in fact, the ground was not used as a road. People went on it to repair fences, but that had nothing to do with a servitude. The so-called road was used once in 1896 for bringing in a manure cart, and a few schoolboys used it and jumped over a fence to get to the road; but such a use by schoolboys does not constitute a user of the servitude. As to the loss of a servitude, see Van der Linden (1-11-4), Voet (8-6-7, 8 and 9) Digest (8-6-22 and 25), Van Leeuwen (Vol. 1, p. 306, Kotzé's Trans.), Vinnius ad Constit. (Tit. 2, Sec. 3, p. 242), Voet (8-6-9) is very explicit as to the way in which a servitude must be exercised. All authorities are agreed that a servitude will be lost by non user unless used qua servitus et secundum modum et tempus. As to loss by adverse acts, see Van der Linden (1-11-4), Grotius (3-37-4), Voet (8-6-5), Digest (8-6-8), Pothier's Digest (loc. cit.), Van Leeuwen (Vol. 1, p. 300, Kotzé's Trans.), Vinnius (Tit. 2, Sec. 3). Acts contrary to a servitude do fall under the rules of prescription, Hunter's Roman Law (p. 422). All that is required for the loss of the servitude is a substantial adverse act continued for a substantial time. Here the evidence shows that the ground was closed up, and that Mrs. Powrie has made out a clear case both on the ground of non user and of consent. I submit she is entitled to a declaration of rights, and to damages for loss of her oaks, and for injury done to her gate pillar.

Mr. Buchanan (for plaintiff) was proceeding to refer to the various deeds of transfer to the respective predecessors in title of the parties, in order to show that the alleged servitude in favour of the defendant had been granted;—when he was stopped by the Court.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is common cause between the parties that in 1861 a servitude was constituted in favour of the plaintiff's property in respect of the defendant's property. The transfer to the defendant's predecessor in title refers to this servitude as being laid down on the diagram, and the diagram which was attached to the previous transfers clearly shows this road in dispute passing through what is now the defendant's property. It therefore lay upon the defendant to prove that this servitude to which the plaintiff is entitled by virtue of his ownership of this land has been lost in one of the ways in which, under our law, servitudes can be lost. The defendant's contention is that it was lost in two ways; first of all by non-user for thirty years, and secondly by the plaintiff or his predecessor in title having allowed acts to be done which are inconsistent with the existence of this servitude. Firstly, in regard to non-user. As I said in giving judgment on the previous application in this case, where there is a right of road, and the person entitled to that right uses it as a foot-path, that is a sufficient assertion of his right to keep alive the servitude. In the present case, it appears that the owners of the plaintiff's property did even more; they seemed to claim this strip of land as their own, and they seemed to ocupy it as their own. They fenced it in, and it does not appear that anyone, until the defendant became the owner, except the plaintiff's predecessor in title, claimed possession and ownership of this strip of land. Now, an important question might arise, whether that would be sufficient to keep alive the servitude. It might fairly be contended that the greater includes the less, that if a person occupies land as being his own property, that would include also occupation for the purpose of a servitude, but that point I do not think need be decided. It raises a question which, so far as I am aware, has never been decided. But this I am prepared to say, that if a person occupies land subject to a servitude as his own it would require very slight evidence of the use of the land for the purposes of the servitude. In the present case the Myburghs not only occupied the land as their own, but on one or two occasions they drove a manure cart through this road from Breda-street to the vineyard. We have the evidence of Mr. Bidewell Edwards that this was positively done in the year 1880, that is nineteen years after the transfer to the defendant had been given, and the servitude recognised afresh. This act therefore of driving his manure cart over this road would be a sufficient interruption of any right which the defendant might claim by reason of non-user. Not only that; there is evidence that Mr. Myburgh himself used this road (that is, the father of the young men who gave their evidence before me), that he used this road, especially on Sundays, and that the sons used this road for the purpose of going from the vineyard on to Breda-street. They were children of the owner. The father is dead now, and we are unable to have his evidence; but there is no reason to suppose that the sons used the road without his consent. Whether the sons went there for the purpose of play, or for some other object, they used this road for the purpose of going from the vineyard to Breda-street. Now, if these had been the only acts by which they asserted their rights, it might have been a doubtful case; but coupling the user of this road for a manure cart, and for the boys going to school from the vineyard to Breda street—coupling these facts with the fact that Mr. Myburgh claimed this piece of land as his own, I think the Court could not possibly hold that there has been such a non-user for the period of thirty years as to amount to a remission of the right to the servitude. In my opinion, therefore, the defendant has not obtained a right to claim that this servitude should be put an end to on the ground that plaintiff's predecessors in title have not for a period of thirty years used the road. Coming next to the second question raised as to whether the plaintiff's predecessors in title have allowed acts to be done inconsistent with the continued existence of the servitude, I think there is really no evidence to justify such a view. The question was fully considered in the case of Edmeades v. Schecpers (1 Juta, 334), but the circumstances of that case were widely different from those in the present case. In that case, for sixteen years the then plaintiff had seen and known that the then defendant had been in occupation of this land, and that he had fenced in the whole of the land, and had actually built upon it. The suit was raised between the parties themselves. After sixteen years it was claimed that the land should be restored to its original uses, namely, for the grazing of a certain number of the plaintiff's cattle. The Court held that it was really too late, and that what had been done debarred the plaintiff from claiming the rights. The Court guarded itself against expressing any opinion as to whether other erf-holders had lost their rights. The Court held that the then plaintiff had lost his rights by reason of what he had done. In the present case it is difficult to see what has been done by the plaintiff to deprive him of his rights, or, rather, what has been done by his predecessors, because he has only been in occupation since March. It is true that there is a small portion of the land which was occupied by Mr. Bean for a fowl run, but this seems to have been done when the then owner—Mr. Papenfus—was away. There was no recognition of the right of Mr. Bean to do this; and there was no recognition by any one of the predecessors in title of the right to put any fence across the road. And what is so important in this case is the fact that there was a high fence, six feet high, which separated the property of the defendant from this piece of land in respect of which a right is claimed. Mrs. Powrie says that when she became owner there was a gateway in this fence, but that would prove nothing, because the owners of the defendant's land would be entitled to come upon this road and use it. The defendant for a few years running used to enter on the strip of land through the gateway and planted potatoes on it. It does not appear that the then owner of the plaintiff's property was aware of this trespass, but even if he had been, his acquiescence would not necessarily have proved any intention to remit his right to a servitude. For that purpose, there should be proof of some more permanent or substantial interference with the right of road than has been proved in the present case. The defence, therefore, in my opinion, fails also upon the second ground. With regard to the claim for damages, I do not think it is a case for damages. There will be no order as to damages, but as to the rest of the claim, the judgment of the Court should be for the plaintiff with costs.

Mr. Buchanan said the question of the costs of the motion had to be decided.

The Chief Justice said the defendant would have to pay these. He had clearly indicated that unless the defendant could produce conclusive proof of actual non-user for the full period, it would be better not to defend the case. Judgment would be entered for plaintiff in terms of prayer "A" of the declaration with costs; judgment for the defendant in reconvention on the claim in reconvention.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

CHAMBERLAIN V. CHAMBERLAIN. { 1903. Aug. 25th.

This was an action brought by Wm. Ernest Chamberlain against his wife for restitution of conjugal rights.

The declaration set forth that the parties were married in Essex, England, in November, 1901. Shortly afterwards they came to South Africa, and on the 26th May, 1903, the defendant wrongfully, unlawfully, and maliciously deserted the plaintiff. Plaintiff claimed restitution of conjugal rights, failing compliance a decree of divorce, and an order declaring the plaintiff entitled to the custody of the child.

Mr. Upington for the plaintiff; the defendant in person.

Wm. Ernest Chamberlain, plaintiff, said that shortly after his marriage he left England for South Africa, and settled with the military at the Paarl. The child was about fifteen months old. In December, 1902, with his wife he started a boarding-house. In March, 1903, one Louis Bishop came to stay at the house, and at the end of April he had to complain to his wife about her intimacy with Bishop. Bishop was ultimately ejected from the house by a constable, and the defendant packed up her luggage, and followed Bishop to an hotel at Lady Grey Bridge. Subsequently, the defendant promised to return, but failed to do so.

Frederick Nicholson gave corroborative evidence of the intimacy between Bishop and the defendant.

The defendant gave evidence to the effect that the plaintiff had been repeatedly cruel to the baby and herself. If the case were postponed she thought the doctor and nurse would testify to the ill-treatment.

The Court granted an order that restitution of conjugal rights be made by the last day of September, failing which cause to be shown on the 12th October.

MOOLMAN v. DE WET. { 1903. Aug. 25th.

Debtor and creditor—Onus of proof — Receipt — Proof of debt from books of creditor's agent.

The defendant, who owed a certain sum of money to plaintiff, alleged that he had paid in full to one L., plaintiff's agent. Though he had told various persons he had proofs of this payment in his possession, he was unable to produce either a receipt or any other documentary evidence at the trial. L., whose account of what took place on occasion of the alleged payment and whose evidence on certain collateral points was confirmed by that of defendant, produced a pocket book containing entries made on the said occasion, showing that there was still an outstanding balance due from defendant to plaintiff.

Held, that as the onus of proving payment of an admitted debt was upon the defendant, which onus he had failed to discharge, judgment must be given for plaintiff for the amount claimed with costs.

This was an action brought by Petrus Johannes Moohlman, farmer and speculator, of Fraserburg, against Petrus de Wet, speculator, of Carnarvon, for the recovery of certain money, the balance arising out of a certain joint transaction between himself and the defendant, and for interest on money due.

The declaration set forth that in September, 1902, plaintiff and defendant agreed to speculate in donkeys, cattle, and sheep, and by reason of the agreement, plaintiff purchased 23 donkeys for £207 12s. The donkeys were delivered to the defendant in October, 1902, and in November he sold them for £231, leaving an amount due to the plaintiff of £209 6s. In settling other accounts, the defendant only paid £151 16s. out of the £209 6s., leaving a balance of £57 10s., and plaintiff claimed this amount, together with £8 8s. 11d., as interest on the other debts and costs of suit.

The plea denied that there was any stipulation as to interest in the previous transactions, and denied that one Louw, the plaintiff's servant, was paid anything short of the £209 6s.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers for plaintiff; Mr. Burton (with him Mr. C. W. de Villiers) for defendant.

Petrus Johannes Moohlman, plaintiff, stated that towards the end of November last year the defendant owed him £209 16s., in respect of certain donkey transactions. There was also owing to him £315, in respect of certain sheep, which debt was incurred before the partnership was entered into. The defendant promised to pay on the third or fifth day after the acknowledgment of debt. He sent his son-in-law to recover the money, together with interest on the promissory note and pasturage, but he returned with only £456 16s. Witness knew that was not the full amount, but he thought the defendant had paid a debt of plaintiff's. Subsequently, he found that De Wet had not paid the auctioneer's account. When the defendant was asked to settle the balance, he said that he had previously done so, but refused to produce the receipts.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: Witness bought the sheep himself, and the auctioneer looked to him for payment. Previously, the defendant had given him £100 in cash for some sheep, and the defendant promised to pay the balance on the third or the fifth day after the sale. The partnership did not prevent the defendant selling the sheep at once. The defendant gave him to understand that the balance would be paid when the sheep were disposed of. The defendant paid another £100 on the 30th September, £650 on the 19th November, and £315 at the end of November, and witness claimed interest on the two latter amounts. He thought the defendant had paid the auctioneer, and that was why no action was taken until April. When the account was brought to him, he said that the defendant ought to have settled the account. De Wet said subsequently that he had paid all he owed.

Johannes Louw stated that when the plaintiff sent him to the defendant to collect the account, he was to get the purchase price of 15 donkeys at £10 each—£315—or an acknowledgment of debt, and half the profit on 23 donkeys. Defendant paid £466 16s., and witness knew that he had not settled the account in full. The defendant was surprised that the plaintiff could charge for interest and grazing money when they were in partnership.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: He was to get a full settlement, but he did not think it necessary to make a note of the details given to him by the plaintiff in his book. He put them down on a piece of paper after verbal instruction had been given by the plaintiff. When the defendant was charged with the amount of £72 12s., he said that witness's entries in the book were incorrect, but he did not remember the defendant asking how he could owe the money when the two donkeys that had strayed away had returned to the plaintiff's farm. The defendant did not pay the full amount of £209 16s. in respect of the donkeys.

Jacobus Stoffberg said that on the 7th April the defendant, plaintiff, and Louw were in his office, where the defendant produced a receipt from Mr. Banardie for £72 12s. The defendant said there was a discrepancy in Louw's account, and that he had taken the latter's receipt for the money. Subsequently the defendant said that Louw did not give a receipt for the money.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: The defendant did not say that he lost the receipt. The plaintiff asked him where his books were, but the defendant kept none. The defendant repudiated the pocket-book entry of Louw's, and firmly asserted that he had paid the full amount to the latter.

Mr. De Villiers closed his case.

Petrus de Wet, defendant, said that he entered into partnership with the plaintiff in respect of the purchase of donkeys last September. About the same time he paid the plaintiff £100 on account for certain sheep, and he never made any definite arrangement about paying the balance, beyond promising that it would be met when the sheep were sold. Louw showed him a list of the accounts from the plaintiff on a piece of paper. Witness paid £209 6s., but would not pay any interest or grazing money. Louw went away satisfied.

Jacobus Bruwer said that in February last he was in Carnarvon, when he met Banardie, who sent him to Moolman for an account, but the latter said that he owed Banardie no money. The account was for donkeys that plaintiff bought from Stoffberg. In Stoffberg's office, the defendant said that Louw's book was false. Louw said that he had received the profit, and not the capital.

Mr. Van Zyl said that he explained to Mr. Stoffberg that the defendant had not got a receipt in the true sense of the word, and that all his papers had been torn up.

Mr. Burton closed his case.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts:

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiff alleges that there was due to him upon a number of transactions and upon accounts between him and the defendant, a balance of £524 6s. in November last, and he admits that towards the end of that month the defendant paid him the sum of £466 16s., leaving a balance due of £57 10s. The defendant, in his plea, admits the correctness of the accounts as they stood in November, and says that he did then owe the plaintiff £524 6s., but he says towards the end of November he paid the whole amount of that balance to Louw, who received it on behalf of the plaintiff. Now, the question between the parties is whether, when Louw received payment from the defendant, he received the sum of £524 6s., or £466 16s. In transactions of this kind and payments of such large amounts passing between men of business as the plaintiff and the defendant undoubtedly are, you would expect that production would be made of the best evidence of payment and the best evidence would, of course, be the receipt given by the plaintiff to the defendant. Such receipt has not been produced, and I think it is common cause between the parties that such receipt in a formal shape was never given. Now, in the absence of that receipt, which would be the best proof, other proof might be adduced by the defendant of payments made by him, and the question arises whether any documents in any shape passed between the parties, which would support the defendant in his case. The defendant says that when Louw arrived at the farm, it was necessary for them to enter into a calculation to find out exactly what was due, and the statement of account so made or arrived at between the two of them was put upon some rough scraps of paper, and left in possession of the defendant. These rough scraps have not been produced. The defendant says, some little while since he destroyed all his documents, and these rough scraps might have been destroyed amongst other documents. Now, the defendant finds himself, therefore, in this unfortunate position, that he has got no documentary evidence to support him. On the other hand, we have the statement of Louw, which largely agrees with that of the defendant, that when he arrived on the farm they had a discussion as to the defendant's indebtedness, that they entered into a calculation to arrive at the amount that was due, and that these statements were put upon paper, but he stated that he had in his possession at the time a note-book, in which he himself entered the items, and the result arrived at, and that he did so for the purpose of giving an account to his principal, Mr. Moohlman, of the moneys received by him. Now, that seems to me a very natural course to adopt by Louw, under the circumstances. He has produced this account, and though it does not seem to be a very well-kept book, it seems to contain other transactions which he has thought fit from time to time to enter, and I see no reason to believe that the statement entered by him in this book is a false and a fabricated one. I am disposed to accept his statement, because it tallies with what the defendant himself says. Mr. De Wet says when they were discussing these statements he brought it to the notice of Louw that two of the donkeys had strayed away, and no charge should be made against him, and we find in this book they were consequently taken off the capital amount of the price of the donkeys, as the account stood between the defendant and the plaintiff. We also find that the profit which had been calculated in the total was taken off with respect to these donkeys. So far this statement, as made by Louw, agrees with what Mr. De Wet himself says. Louw says he had been instructed to make some allowance for the cost of certain donkeys in case he should find payment had been made in respect of them to Mr. Stoffberg, and when, upon inquiry, he had found out that the payment had been made by a man named Banardie, he did not call upon Mr. De Wet to bring into the account the price of these donkeys. Here, again, we find that these donkeys are omitted from the account, and independently of them, the result is arrived at which shows, according to Louw's statement, that the sum only of £466 16s. was paid. We have, therefore, a pretty fair statement of an account which supports Louw's evidence as to the amount of money paid by him to the defendant, and, on the defendant's side, we have no account. Now, it seems to me that the whole of the defendant's evidence was based upon an impression he had that he had settled the account in some form with Louw. On this occasion he could not have been aware of the exact sum that was paid, and when he was asked by Mr. Moolman to prove the payment by producing the receipt, he told Mr. Moolman that he was not in the habit of showing his receipts to anyone. Well, that was a most extraordinary answer for a debtor to give to a creditor, and if that was said, we must come to the conclusion that he had in his possession some proof in a documentary shape which he could have produced. When the defendant meets Mr. Stoffberg, he takes up the same position that he had in his possession proof, and that he would put it before the Court when the time arrived. He was very naturally pressed afterwards to produce the evidence, or the case would proceed. Then we find De Wet saying he never had any documents at all, and later, when his attorney comes upon the scene, the attorney gets information from the defendant which was conveyed to the plaintiff, and amounts to this: that he had had documents in his possession in reference to this transaction, but that he destroyed them. Under all the circumstances, I think, considering that the burden of proving this payment lay on the defendant, his evidence has not been of such a clear and satisfactory description, that we can accept it as proof of payment, without what is generally regarded as the best evidence—the production of receipts. In the absence of such receipts, we think that Mr. De Wet has failed in discharging the onus of proving that he made these payments, and consequently there still remains due to the plaintiff the sum of £57 10s., for which judgment must be given. There is a further claim for interest due upon certain moneys which were owing from the defendant to the plaintiff, upon an acknowledgment of debt. On the face of that acknowledgment, no date is fixed for the payment. The plaintiff has said that some promise was given that the payment would be made within three or five days after the acknowledgment was given, but, upon the whole, we think that there is no clear proof of any such promise having been made, and that there was some indefinite offer on the part of Mr. De Wet to pay at such time as he should be able. Under the circumstances, there being no fixed date from which any interest may run, and no agreement that interest should be paid, that part of the claim must be disallowed. Judgment will therefore be entered for the plaintiff for the sum of £57 10s. with costs.

Kotzé, J., concurred.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

FIRST DIVISION.

LYONS V. CUSHING. { 1903. Aug. 26th.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., said that he appeared for the plaintiff in this case, and the defendant was in default. The plaintiff sued the defendant for the transfer of certain shares held by him in a certain syndicate. Some time ago an interdict was granted, restraining the transfer of these shares pending an action to be brought. He was instructed that all the affidavits were now in Court, showing that there had been proper service, but no plea had been filed. The demand was a liquidated demand for certain shares. He asked for an order for the transfer of the shares.

Order granted accordingly.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZÉ.]

BARR V. BARR. { 1903. Aug. 26th.

This was an action brought by Annie Barr against her husband for divorce, on the ground of his adultery.

The declaration set out that the parties were married at Durban in December, 1895. There were two children of the marriage. Between March and July, 1902, the defendant had committed adultery with divers persons.

Mr. Upington for plaintiff; defendant in default.

Annie Barr, plaintiff, said that in 1897 she and her husband came to Port Elizabeth, and subsequently the defendant went to Aliwal North. In 1898 the defendant got two years for forgery, and in 1900 he joined the Cape Town Volunteers, and was sent to Tulbagh. She would, if their lordships granted the decree, send the children home to her parents in Scotland.

Arnold Dempers, member of the District Mounted Police, said that during the war he was stationed at Tulbagh. He knew Corporal Barr, who was also stationed there. In February, 1902, he went into a fort occupied by the defendant, and found him on intimate terms with a coloured girl.

Decree granted, plaintiff to have custody of the children.

FICK V. FICK.

This was an action brought by Stephanus Daniel Fick, against his wife, Susanna

Fick (born Knox), for restitution of conjugal rights, custody of the children of the marriage, and forfeiture of all benefits accruing therefrom.

The declaration set out that the parties were married at Hermanuspetrusfontein in December, 1897. There were three children of the marriage. In January, 1903, the defendant wrongfully, unlawfully, and maliciously deserted the plaintiff, and refused to return to him. Plaintiff prayed for restitution of conjugal rights, custody of the children, and forfeiture of the benefits of the marriage.

Mr. C. W. De Villiers for plaintiff; defendant in default.

Stephanus Daniel Fick, plaintiff, said that after living on a farm for five years, he went to Hermanuspetrusfontein, because his wife did not like farm life. In September and October last he was away, and on his return he heard certain rumours about his wife to which he paid no attention. Later, the rumours were repeated, and he noticed that his wife became quarrelsome. When taxed with intimacy with a man named Deacon, she denied it but the servants corroborated the charge. Subsequently, the defendant went to her mother at Caledon on a three week's visit, and had not since returned. Witness had visited Caledon, but the defendant refused to return.

Rule granted, the defendant to return to the plaintiff by the 30th September, and to show cause by the first day of next term why a decree of divorce should not be granted, the plaintiff to have custody of the children.

ISAACSON V. WALSH AND WALSH. { 1903. Aug. 26th. Sept. 2nd. Oct. 19th.

Breach of Contract—Damages.

This was an action for damages, brought by Albert Isaacson, of Cape Town, against Messrs. Walsh and Walsh, of Caledon, for breach of contract.

The declaration set forth that on the 2nd December, 1901, an agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants, whereby the former agreed to give his services as masseur for a period of three years in consideration of a payment of £45 a month, and an equal division of the earnings after they reached £700. About July, 1902, the defendants broke the said contract, and by reason of the breach plaintiff had lost his salary, and claimed damages in the sum of £3,154, together with interest a tempore morae and costs of suit.

The plea admitted the formal allegations in the declaration and set out that the company took over the liabilities and obligations of the defendants, and the plaintiff had full knowledge thereof, and in June it was agreed that the plaintiff should transfer his services to the company. The plaintiff, in August, 1902, wrongfully and unlawfully refused to carry out his duties, or to continue in his employment.

Mr. Wilkinson for the plaintiff. Mr. Upington (with him Mr. J. E. R. De Villiers) for the defendant.

Albert Isaacson, plaintiff, said that he had been a masseur for a considerable number of years. Previous to 1901 he had been employed at the Caledon Baths. On the 2nd December a contract, which he signed, was presented to him by Messrs. Walsh. On the 8th December another masseur arrived, and witness had an interview with the defendants, on the 28th December, with reference to a division of the work. The defendants said that Mrs. Halls would distribute the work, and witness pointed out that it was agreed that witness was to be the head of the massage department, and that he was to divide the work. Nearly all the new patients were sent to the other masseur, and witness could not possibly come up to the £700. He continued his services up to the 7th July, 1902, when he got his holidays. The company took over in July, and in answer to plaintiff's attorney the company's attorney wrote that the contract would be carried out as if the defendants were the sole owners, but, at the same time, they did not see what claim plaintiff had against the defendants. After a deal of correspondence, when witness was on his holidays, he was finally told to remove his furniture. He estimated his loss at between £400 and £500.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He had three previous contracts with the defendants. He had received notice from the defendants at the expiration of a previous contract, and Mr. G. Walsh asked him to remain. In the previous contract he had £600 a year, and profits after a certain figure was reached. He had heard that the place was going to be floated. He denied that Mr. John Walsh told him that he was going to float the company. Witness consented to give his services to the company on the same conditions. The agreement as to the distribution of work, in the contracts he submitted to the company. Before the other masseur was dismissed he was prepared to transfer his services to the company on the same conditions; but he would have insisted on an agreement as to distribution of the work. He was given a holiday in July for one month, but he did not return at the expiration of that time to the baths. On the 2nd September he had an interview with the directors, and the result was that he should submit certain proposals in writing. He made it clear that the conditions would be different with the company since the other masseur had been dismissed. He never said anything about continuing on the same salary if another man was engaged. He started on his own account in Muizenberg in November, and at present he was carrying on business in Cape Town. It might be that the company had made more than Walsh and Walsh, but while he admitted that he would have made more profit, it was necessary to have specific conditions since the other masseur was dismissed. There was an agreement between the defendants and himself with regard to the distribution of the work, and he believed he mentioned the stipulation to the directors.

Re-examined by Mr. Wilkinson: During the latter part of his services with Walsh he did not get half the work, and that was what he wanted from the company. He really wanted the distribution of the work defined in the contract.

By Maasdorp, J.: When he left Muizenberg, he had no more patients; he had finished them.

[Maasdorp, J.: Do you mean you had cured them, or——?]

Ellen Isaacson, wife of the plaintiff, said that she helped her husband in his business. Since the plaintiff left the Caledon Baths, he had spent some £400 over what he had earned.

Cross-examined by Mr. De Villiers: She could not say how much money was spent.

Mr. Wilkinson closed his case.

Mr. Upington called the defendant

John George Walsh, one of the partners in the former ownership of the Caledon Baths, who said that when the plaintiff's previous agreement was terminated, he asked to be retained, and a new contract was entered into. It was agreed that the earnings by both masseurs over the specified amount should be lumped together and divided. When the company was being formed, the plaintiff had no objection to go over when witness agreed to the provision of accommodation at the baths, and that no other masseur should be engaged so long as his wife was able to do the work. There was never any question as to the distribution of that work. It was arranged that the contract should be taken over by the company, and they were prepared to continue the plaintiff in exactly the same position as before, and the real hitch occurred through the plaintiff wanting a great increase of salary. The company were in a bad fix when the plaintiff did not return, and they were most anxious to retain him upon the old terms.

Cross-examined by Mr. Wilkinson: The plaintiff would have made more money under the company, as they were unlikely to engage any other masseur. Many more patients went to the other masseur than to the plaintiff, notwithstanding the efforts of witness. Witness thought the plaintiff should have one-half the commission of the earnings. The plaintiff consented entirely to the transfer of the contract. The first intimation that witness had that the plaintiff was dissatisfied was on the receipt of the lawyer's letter. He felt that he should have had the plaintiff's consent to the contract before the flotation was launched.

Wm. J. Walsh, partner in the defendant firm, said that the letter which was lost from the plaintiff set out that he was willing to continue his services with the company, and specified that Mrs. Isaacson would look after the remainder of the massage work, and that no one else would be engaged.

Cross-examined by Mr. Wilkinson: He could only remember the general purport of the letter, and he could not say how many conditions were contained in the letter.

Francis le Sueur, acting secretary of the Caledon Baths in September last, said he remembered the plaintiff meeting the directors in that month. He did not remember the plaintiff making any mention of the condition as to the half-profits. The plaintiff was asked to send in definite conditions.

Cross-examined by Mr. Wilkinson: He did not remember everything that took place at the meeting.

John Greenstay, resident secretary of the Caledon Baths, stated that in August the baths were much in need of a masseur. It would have been to the advantage of the company to have the plaintiff and his wife during August and September at the same terms as those under the defendants.

Vilhelm Clegg, a director of the Caledon Baths, said that he was present when the plaintiff met the directors. There was no mention as to the distribution of work, and he did not remember the plaintiff stipulating that if a second masseur were engaged his profits should be reckoned on half the earnings. The directors were prepared to carry on the contract the plaintiff had with the defendant. There would have been no difficulty in erecting a house for the plaintiff. The plaintiff put different terms before the meeting, which were not entertained.

Mr. Upington closed his case.

Postea (October 19th).

Counsel argued on the facts of the case.

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiff alleges in his declaration that on the 2nd of December, 1901, he entered into a written contract with the defendants, whereby he and his wife agreed to give their services as masseurs at the Caledon Mineral Baths Sanatorium for the term of three years from the 1st day of December, 1901, to the 30th day of November, 1904, at a monthly payment of the sum of £45. The contract contains other terms and conditions, which it is unnecessary to specify here. The plaintiff and his wife entered upon their duties and did their work under the agreement until the end of July, 1902, when, it is stated in the declaration, the defendants broke their contract with the plaintiffs and refused to retain him and his wife in their service for the remainder of the term. The plaintiff states that he suffered damages in consequence in the sum of £3,154, for which he prays judgment. The defendants plead that the plaintiff in June, 1902, agreed that in case the defendants transferred their business to an incorporated company, the formation of which was then contemplated, he and his wife would transfer their services to the company upon the same terms and conditions upon which they had served the defendants, and release the defendants from their obligations under the contract. They say a company called the Caledon Baths, Limited, was thereafter formed, which took over the business on the first day of August, 1902, and offered to retain the services of the plaintiff and his wife in terms of the written contract, but the plaintiff refused to carry out his duties and obligations thereunder. The Court has to decide in the first place whether the agreement set forth in the plea was concluded between the parties. The plaintiff says he had a conversation with J. G. Walsh, in which he was asked to consent to the contract being taken over by the company, and he told Walsh he was willing to give his services to the company upon certain conditions, which were not contained in the contract. Nothing was then definitely decided, and Mr. Walsh requested the plaintiff to give his consent in writing. J. Walsh admits that in May or June, 1902, he got a letter from the plaintiff, saying that he was prepared to sign any deed required by the defendants, but he put in a condition requiring the two points mentioned to be clearly stated. Those points were the conditions proposed by plaintiff, which did not appear in the contract. It is clear, therefore, that the consent given by the plaintiff was conditional. Mr. Walsh never communicated to the plaintiff his acceptance of the conditions, and in consequence no agreement was concluded, whereby the plaintiff was bound to release the defendants, and transfer his services to the company. Although Mr. Walsh admits that the consent given by the plaintiff was conditional, the defendants insist in their plea, and in their correspondence through their attorneys that the plaintiff shall enter into the service of the company under the original agreement of the 2nd of December, 1901. Upon this issue between the parties, I came to the conclusion that the defendants must fail. The defendants having disposed of their business to the company in August, 1902, were not in a position to retain the services of the plaintiff and his wife under their agreement, and the result is that they have broken their contract, and are liable to the plaintiff for any damages he can prove he has sustained in consequence. The plaintiff was not bound to go over into the service of the company, but it is quite clear that the company was prepared and offered to retain his services on the same conditions as he served the defendants. It also appears that there was nothing in the proposed relationship between the plaintiff and the company which was personally objectionable to the plaintiff, because he was prepared to continue the work with them upon more advantageous conditions. The question therefore arises whether, under these circumstances, the plaintiff has shown that any actual damage was suffered by him through breach of contract on the part of the defendants. Upon the point of damages, the case of Brace v. Calder (2 Q.B.D., 1895, p. 253) was cited at the bar. It appeared that in that case the plaintiff had entered under agreement into the service of four partners of a firm. Before the expiration of the term of his service, two of the partners retired from the firm, but the remaining two were willing to retain his services. He, however, brought an action for damages for breach of contract. The Court, by a majority, held that the breach of contract had been proved, and Lopes, L.J., said: "In estimating the damages it must be taken into consideration that the continuing partners were willing to keep him on in their service till the end of the year, at the same salary as before; but he declined to serve them, and therefore it was his own fault that he suffered any loss. Consequently the damages resulting from the breach of contract would be nominal." Lord Esher said: "Assuming that there was such a breach of contract, I think it is obvious that in estimating the damages for it, the possibility of the plaintiff's getting other employment equally good for the remainder of the two years must be taken into account. In this case it appears that he could have got such employment, and therefore the damages are only nominal." In my opinion, these very sound principles are entirely applicable to the present case. I come to the conclusion that the plaintiff succeeded in proving the breach of contract, but that he is entitled to only nominal damages. Judgment will be given for the plaintiff for £5, with costs.

Kotzé, J., said he was of the same opinion. It seemed to him that the plaintiff's contention that a breach of contract has taken place on the part of the defendant was a correct one. As to the question of damages, seeing that the company agreed to take over the plaintiff's services on the like terms, it followed that he had not sustained substantial damages. Consequently, he agreed that, so far as damages were concerned, the plaintiff was only entitled to £5 by way of nominal damages, with costs.

Plaintiff's attorneys: C. W. Slaughter.

Defendant's attorneys: Van Zyl and Buissinne.

TRIAL CAUSES.

SAUNDERS V. SAUNDERS. { 1903. Aug. 27th.

This was an action brought by Helen Lucy Margaret Saunders, of Johannesburg, against her husband, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, a decree of divorce. Mr. Benjamin appeared for the applicant, and the defendant was in default.

Chas. W. H. Smith, clerk in charge of marriage records, Colonial Office, produced a copy of the certificate of marriage.

The plaintiff, Helen Lucy Margaret Saunders, said she was married to the defendant at Kalk Bay on the 1st March, 1888. She was born at Queen's Town, and was brought up by her grandfather, partly there and partly at Graham's Town. Her father was then living at Kimberley, but subsequently he went to Barberton, where she joined him about 1887. She met her husband at Barberton, but her father said he did not care about her marrying, and sent her to Cape Town. She came down here, and stayed with Captain Jackson. Saunders followed her, and they were married at Kalk Bay by special licence. Her father consented, on the understanding that he would have nothing more to do with her. They had thought of living in the Colony. Defendant's father was General Saunders. Defendant was living on remittances, but the remittances ceased after the marriage. Defendant had no other means. They went to Johannesburg. Defendant did not work, and they had no money. He was about five years at Johannesburg. Defendant went to Rhodesia for about nine months, and had employment for a time as manager of the Native Depot, under Dr. Jameson. Defendant then came to Cape Town, where witness had been living, and he took her with him to Kimberley, where he got employment for about two months. Witness was taken ill, and ordered to have a sea voyage. She went to England, but defendant did not send her any money, and when she asked him for remittances, he said he had no money at all. Subsequently defendant came over to England, while witness was in Canada. While in Canada, she had a letter from him saying that he had no money, but he hoped to make some money. She saw him in London on returning from Canada. The defendant told her that he had no home and no money. There were three children of the marriage.

By the Court: She did not know the defendant's whereabouts. She had been working for the past five years.

She was emloyed as a typist during the war, and was now keeping a boarding-house in Johannesburg. She carried on tea-rooms in Canada. Her husband had been in this country for about twenty-five years.

A decree of restitution was granted, the defendant to return to or receive the plaintiff on or before the 15th January, 1904, failing which, a rule nisi calling on him to show cause on the 1st February why a decree of divorce should not be granted; personal service to be effected if possible, failing which, publication in the same manner as before.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

MENDELSOHN V. MOSES. { 1903. Aug. 27th.

Mr. Alexander moved for the rule nisi to be made absolute. Further assets, said counsel, had been found at Kimberley, and he applied for a rule that these assets should be similarly attached. The amount sued for was £30 16s. 7d. and costs.

Replying to the Chief Justice,

Mr. Alexander said that he had no information as to the amount already attached except that it was insufficient to cover the principal and the costs.

De Villiers, C.J. said that the rule would be made absolute as asked, but the other part of the application must stand over pending fuller information. It would be open for counsel to apply further to a judge in chambers.

REWN V. REWN.

This was an application in respect of a suit for the return of certain cattle in the defendant's possession, the property of his brother, the plaintiff. It appeared, however, that the plaintiff had since been killed in a railway accident, and the matter would, therefore, have to be hung up until an executor was appointed, and for that reason Mr. Buchanan (for plaintiff's estate), applied for the case to stand over sine die.

Mr. Alexander, for the defendant, asked what was the direction of the Court with regard to costs.

The Chief Justice said he did not think they could decide the question of costs at the present stage.

VAN DER HORST V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. Van Zyl applied for a date to be fixed for the trial by jury of an action brought by the plaintiff against the Colonial Government for £5,000, damages alleged to have been sustained by him in a railway accident.

Mr. Schreiner (with him Mr. Howel Jones) said he appeared for the Government. The matter arose out of an explosion of dynamite at some place beyond Tulbagh through a passenger having dropped the dynamite. The plaintiff alleged that the explosion was due to the negligence of the Government.

The case was set down for trial on the 4th November, costs to be costs in the cause.

Ex parte MARTIN.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for an order authorising the cancellation of certain mortgage bonds. It appeared that the bonds had been duly discharged.

Order granted.

Ex parte VAN DER BYL.

Mr. M. de Villiers moved for an attachment ad fundandam jurisdictionem in respect of certain two pieces of quit-rent land situated in the division of Hay, which had been specially hypothecated to the applicant for £800 sterling. Counsel said that no interest had been paid by the respondent (J. Boisson), who, it was stated, left the Colony shortly before the war, and was now residing in German West Africa.

Order granted, petitioner being given leave to sue by edictal citation, returnable on the first day of next term, personal service to be effected, if possible, failing which one publication in "Ons Land."

GRAHAM V. GRAHAM.

Mr. Benjamin moved on behalf of the petitioner for leave to sue her husband by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rigths, failing which a decree of divorce. The petition stated that the parties were married at Knysna, and had resided together there until some time ago, when the defendant lost his appointment, and went away with the intention of seeking employment. Petitioner had had no communication from the defendant since the 15th June, 1902, and although she had made diligent inquiries she had been unable to ascertain his present whereabouts. She had become entitled to a legacy from the estate of her paternal grandparents. She applied for leave to sue by edictal citation, and for an order authorising the Master to pay £150 from the money standing to her credit to enable her to defray the costs of the action and maintain herself and children until the same was tried.

Leave to sue granted, rule to be returnable on the last day of next term, personal service to be effected if possible, failing which one publication in each of the Cape Town daily newspapers. An order was also granted authorising the Master to pay £150 to the applicant.

Ex parte JANSEN.

Mr. Benjamin moved for an order authorising the registration of the transfer of a property at the corner of Castle and Burg-streets, occupied by W. A. Richards and Sons. The petitioner held the power of attorney of George Pauling, who was the late owner. The property was formerly purchased for £12,000, and had now been sold for £32,000. The Registrar of Deeds objected to pass transfer on the ground that the power of attorney did not sufficiently describe the property. The purchase price had actually been paid to Mr. Pauling.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte BRINK AND ANOTHER.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for leave to sell certain property at Oudtshoorn, in an estate of which petitioners were executors testamentary, to the Colonial Government for £1,000. It appeared that a minor was interested in the estate.

The Master's report was as follows:—

"It seems to me that it would be in the interests of the minor if the proposed sale were allowed to go through. I therefore beg to recommend that your lordships may be pleased to grant an order confirming the sale of the property on either of the following conditions:—

(a) That the balance of the said purchase money, after the deduction of the costs of this application, be deposited with one of the Local Trust Companies to credit of the said minor subject to the life usufruct of the first-named petitioner. Or,

(b) That the petitioners be empowered to apply the balance of the said purchase money, after deduction of the costs of this application, to the purchase of other property, and the erection of buildings thereon, and to deposit the balance, if any, with one of the Local Trust Companies to credit of the said minor, subject to the life usufruct of the first-named petitioner.

Order granted in terms of clause (b) of the Master's Report.

Ex parte BENJAMIN WHEELER AND FRANK WHEELER.

This was an application for leave to sell certain movable property by public auction under the following circumstances.

Messrs. Wheeler were sued by Mr. Sass for damages for the performance by the Nance O'Neil Company, of which Mr. McKee Rankin was manager, of the play "Magda," in respect to which Mr. Sass claimed the sole right to produce in the Colony. Mr. Rankin guaranteed Messrs. Wheeler against all costs and expenses in connection with the action. While the action was pending, Mr. Rankin was about to leave the jurisdiction of the Court, and Messrs. Wheeler applied to have him arrested until he gave security. The Court then ordered that Messrs. Wheeler might retain the sum of £200, which they had in their possession belonging to Mr. Rankin. Subsequently, Mr. Rankin interviewed the applicants, and deposited with them certain jewellery as security for payment of that amount of money. The action had now been settled between the Wheelers and Sass, and it was for the purpose of paying to Sass the sum agreed upon (£75) and their (Messrs. Wheeler's) costs in the matter that the applicant wished to realise this jewellery. Attached to the petition was a letter, dated February 27, 1902, from Mr. Rankin to Messrs. Van Zyl and Buissinne, the applicants' attorneys, in which he stated: "I hand over to you jewellery valued by Mr. Myers, jeweller, at £240, which I authorise you to hold as security for payment. If I fail to pay this amount to you by December 31, 1902, this will be your authority to realise the diamonds enclosed, and to pay the proceeds into court in accordance with the order given. I need hardly add that if this Sass matter is settled, and the Wheelers, and I come to an amicable arrangement, there will be no necessity to sell the jewellery." Mr. Rankin was liable altogether for £160. Counsel mentioned that Mr. Rankin's daughter, who was in South Africa, was anxious to purchase this jewellery.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It is desirable that the applicant's daughter should have the jewellery. Has she made any offer?]

Mr. Upington (for the applicant) said she had not to his knowledge.

The case was ordered to stand over for information on this point.

Later in the day Mr. Upington said Mr. Rankin's daughter had offered to pay the amount of the claim if the jewellery were handed over to her. She had, however, left for England.

The case was ordered to stand over.

Ex parte MARAIS.

Mr. Benjamin moved for leave to transfer certain property bought by petitioner, the executor in the estate of the late Wilhelm Jacobus Marais, at public auction. It was deposed on affidavit that the sale was well attended, and that the price was a good one.

Granted.

Ex parte ACKERMAN.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved for an order authorising the cancellation of a certain mortgage bond.

Granted.

BUFFALO SUPPLY AND COLD STORAGE COMPANY V. TETLEY AND FLEMING.

Mr. Benjamin applied on behalf of the Buffalo Company, the defendants in the action, for removal of bar, leave to plead, and postponement of trial.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., appeared for the respondents.

It appeared that there was a sum of £20,800 claimed by Tetley and Fleming. Of this £20,000 was admitted to be due, but the £800 was in dispute.

Mr. Schreiner consented to the removal of bar, providing judgment were given for £20,000. The defendants could then defend the claim for the balance.

Mr. Benjamin said that the company was in liquidation, but was quite solvent. It had been absorbed by another company, and it was expected that the amount, which would be paid by this other company, would be about £167,000. At present, however, there was no money in the hands of the liquidators, and he (Mr. Benjamin) would therefore apply for a stay of execution if judgment were given for the £20,093, admitted to be due.

De Villiers, C.J.: The Court will order that the bar be removed, and the defendant allowed to plead, and the trial be postponed, on condition that judgment be entered for plaintiffs for £20,093 7s. 3d., with costs, without prejudice to the plaintiffs' right to recover the balance of the amount claimed by them. As to a stay of execution, I think that that matter should be left to the plaintiffs. I should think it would be desirable in their own interests for plaintiffs to stay execution, but by staying execution the Court would be depriving them of judgment. Costs will stand over.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

JAGGER AND CO. AND WHITE AND CO. V. HERMAN BLOMSON.

Mr. Upington, for the applicants, moved that the defendant's estate be finally adjudicated as insolvent.

Order granted.

STERNER V. MOROM. { 1903. Aug. 27th. Sept. 3rd.

Builder's right of retention—Spoliation.

Applicant having been clandestinely deprived of possession of a house in which he, as builder, has performed certain work, and which he claimed the right to retain until he was paid his costs and charges. The Court ordered the owner to restore possession, pending proceedings by him to recover possession.

This was an application by Jacob Sterner, contractor, Wynberg, against James Allan Morom, also of Wynberg, for an interdict with respect to certain premises known as Broomsgrove House, Main-road, Wynberg.

The applicant seeks the recovery of a right of lien. The applicant made certain repairs and renovations to the property, under a contract with one Dr. Gillanders, who subsequently became insolvent. At the meeting of creditors, it was resolved that the property should be restored to the present respondent, who had sold it to Dr. Gillanders for £400. Acting upon that, Morom obtained entrance to this house. The applicant's contention was that the respondent had got possession contrary to law of a property on which he (Sterner) had a lien.

The affidavit of Alphonse de Beer stated that he held the applicant's power of attorney, Sterner being away in Europe. In November, 1902, the applicant performed services as a builder, and supplied certain material at the said premises. On the 22nd May, 1903, the estate of Gillanders was sequestrated as insolvent, and the deponent filed a proof of debt for £208, as balance of account for work and labour done, and building materials supplied. The key was in the hands of Sterner, who claimed to have a preferent lien. Subsequently correspondence took place between deponent and the secretary of the Board of Executors, who was trustee in the estate of Gillanders. Morom demanded that deponent should hand over the key of the premises, but deponent declined, and he subsequently found that respondent or his representatives had effected entrance, and declared an intention to hold the premises against all-comers.

The affidavits of the respondent and others stated that on the 12th August it was found that a window-pane had been broken, and respondent sent in one Wallworth, who got through the window and opened the door. Respondent went in, and placed a representative of his on the premises, and on the same day his daughter, Mrs. Vincent, removed into the building, and was still living there. Respondent said that the applicant's claim was not against him, but against the insolvent estate of Gillanders. Respondent's daughter had seen a man named Eastman on the premises. She accused him of having broken into the premises, but he denied that.

The replying affidavits of De Beer and Eastman stated that the respondent demanded the key on the 8th August from De Beer, who, however, declined to give up the key unless the claims of Sterner were satisfied. Respondent then informed him that one of the windows had been broken. De Beer sent Eastman to repair the window. Eastman went at 8 a.m., entered by the front door, and took measurements, but on returning at 11 a.m., he found that the front door had been barred. On going to the back door, he found several pieces of broken glass and a fractured window. He effected the repairs and left the house. He denied that he broke any pane of glass for the purpose of entering the premises.

Mr. Close (for applicant): We clearly had a lien on this property. See Act 5 of 1861, section 8. We were in quiet possession.

Mr. Upington (for respondent): Your lordships suggested that I should look for some authorities on the question of the right to cancel a contract on the ground of non-payment. I have not succeeded in finding any cases on this question, but there are authorities referring to læsio enormis. On this, see Pothier on Contracts (Cushing's Translation), p. 236, Sec. 372). My contention is, that the recission of a contract of sale on the ground of non-payment by the purchaser stands on the same footing as læsio enormis. If anything, the case for recission for non-payment is stronger. The fact that recognition of læsio enormis has been abolished by statute does not cut away the ground from the analogy I base thereon. If a purchaser has not paid the purchase price, he is allowed to pay it and take the property.

[Maasdorp, J.: But if the purchaser has not paid, has not the vendor the jus retentionis?]

The purchaser can still get necessary and useful expenses, but the purchaser cannot transfer his right of lien to a third person.

[Maasdorp, J.: But in this case have they not given up their pledge?]

Our contention is, that the heir had a jus in rem over the property. According to Pothier, the vendor re-enters on the estate discharged from all obligations.

[Kotzé, J.: Even a mala fide possessor can set up a claim for improvements.]

No doubt such mala fide possessor is entitled to be recompensed for his improvements, but he must show that the improvements have resulted in some benefit to the applicants. He has not shown that he has improved the property to the value of one single halfpenny. He does not say he has improved it, nor does he base his case on having done so. Whether we consider Stenting as a mala fide possessor, or as having a lien on the property as against Dr. Gillanders, he must show how he has improved the property.

[Kotzé, J.: What right had you to take possession of the house?]

It is true we went in by a back window, but a man may go into his own house in any way he pleases. We entered the house bona fide, and there is no question of spoliation here. The basis of my case is, that the applicant comes into Court claiming a real right to the property, as against Dr. Gillanders, in virtue of his lien. He does not claim a lien as a possessor, whether bona fide or mala fide, but as a builder; but to this he has no right unless he is prepared to show that Gillanders acted as his agent. A builder cannot claim both against the person with whom he has contracted and also against the owner, for improvements. He has elected to proceed against Gillander's estate, and hence he cannot now shift his ground and come against us. I submit that applicant's lien as a builder is inoperative against us.

Postea (September 3).

Maasdorp, J.: It appears that the respondent in this matter sold the house in question to a Mr. Gillanders, and after the sale, he gave possession to the purchaser, but no transfer of the property took place. When Mr. Gillanders obtained possession, he employed the applicant to effect certain repairs and alterations in the house. The work was undertaken by the applicant, and a considerable amount of work was done, in the shape of repairs and alterations, and also improvements, and there is now due to the applicant for the work done by him the sum of £280 6s. While the work was proceeding, the estate of Gillanders was surrendered, and the trustee came to some arrangement with the respondent for the cancellation of the sale of this property. The applicant at that time was still in possession of the house, and still retained the key. He had been put in possession, and the key had been handed to him by the purchaser, and he was expected to retain possession and keep the key until he had finished the work he had undertaken to do. After the sequestration of the estate, the respondent requested the applicant to give up possession of the property, but he failed to do so. Thereupon, he declares that the respondent clandestinely obtained possession of the property by getting through the window at the back of the house, and succeeding in obtaining possession of certain keys inside the house, he opened the house, and put someone in charge of it for himself. Now, at that time a claim had been set up by the builder to a right to retain possession of the property until he should have been paid for his work. That was a bona fide claim, and under all the circumstances, there is some prima facie grounds for his claim, perhaps not to the full extent to which it is here stated, but, in all probability, to some portion of the expense to which he was put, in so far as he may have benefited the owner himself. It may be that the applicant is in law entitled to a retention of this property until the full payment for all work done by him, and the charges to which he was put. It may be that he is only entitled to retain the property until he is paid by the owner for such improvements as were necessary and useful to the owner himself. Now, these are questions which will have to be decided hereafter, and we do not now undertake to decide them. We only now come to the conclusion that there was a bona fide claim set up by the applicant for the retention of this property, and that there is prima facie ground for his claim. Under these circumstances, being in quiet possession at the time, he was entitled to retain such possession until he was legally ejected. The law upon the subject was referred to, as it appears upon our Statute. Where it is provided in Act 5 of 1861, section 8, sub-section 5, that builders shall lose right of tacit hypothecation, but it is provided that nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to deprive any person of any right he may now by law possess to retain any property whatsoever which shall be in his actual possession until his costs and charges incurred thereon shall have been paid. Here there is a right of retention reserved to the builder of the property for his costs and charges. Now it is quite possible that it may be held that, under the circumstances, he is not entitled to all the costs and charges as against the owner, and we do not decide that question now. But he occupies a far stronger position when he proves to the Court he has been at considerable expense to perform work in that house much of which may ultimately appear to have been useful and necessary. Under all the circumstances, the Court will hold that, being in quiet possession, and having been disturbed in his possession clandestinely by the respondent in this case, that the respondent shall restore possession to him, pending proceedings by the respondent to recover possession. The application will therefore be granted in that form, with costs.

Kotzé, J., concurred.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice, the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C. K.C.M.G., LL.D.]

WEPENER V. WEPENER AND RENSBURG. 1903. Aug. 28th

This was an action for divorce brought by Jacob Erasmus Wepener, of the district of Aliwal North, against his wife, Esther Petronella Wepener, on the gound of hr adultery with one Johannes van Rensburg, residing in the district of Elliot, against whom damages and costs of suit were claimed. Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers appeared for the plaintiff, and the suit was undefended.

Chas. W. H. Smith, clerk in charge of marriage registers, produced the register of the marriage.

The evidence of the petitioner, taken on commission, stated that in 1895 he left his home to visit some friends, and his wife went to another portion of the same farm to reside with her father. On his return he went for her, but she declined to accompany him. For some time past she had been living with the co-defendant, and was still living with him in adultery. Recently his father-in-law had had him arrested on a false charge of attempting suicide, which had cost him £35 to defend, and his wife had also contracted debts against him to the amount of £20.

An affidavit by the co-defendant admitted that he was living with the first-named defendant, that they had been cohabiting for the past five years, and that she had given birth to four children, of whom he was the father, three being still alive.

Decree of divorce granted, with judgment for £100 damages against the second-named defendant, who was also ordered to pay the costs of suit.

SAMPSON V. SAMPSON.

This was an action for divorce, brought by Nicholas Sampson, a coloured man, of Wynberg, against his wife Caroline Sampson (born Bailey), for divorce on the ground of adultery with one John Cloete.

Mr. Close apeared for the plaintiff, and the suit was undefended.

Charles W. H. Smith, clerk in charge of the marriage registers, Colonial Office, produced copy of the certificate of the marriage.

Nicholas Sampson, the plaintiff, said he was married to the defendant, Caroline Bailey, in December, 1886, at Port Elizabeth, and he lived there till 1899. They then removed to Wynberg until 1901, when they were visited by a man named John Cloete, who taught his daughter to play the harmonium. Witness had quarrels with his wife about her going out late in the evening with Cloete. He left her, and came to Cape Town. Cloete went to live with his wife in the same house, and she had given birth to a child, of whom witness was not father.

James Arthur Burgess said he knew the parties when they lived together at Wynberg. John Cloete was now living with the defendant, and they occupied one room. The defendant had given birth to a child, of whom she said John Cloete was the father. Witness was boarding at the house.

Decree of divorce granted.

VENTER V. VENTER AND ANOTHER.

This was a suit instituted by Daniel Nicholas Venter, labourer, district of Prince Albert, against his wife, for divorce, on the ground of her adultery with one Du Plessis. Mr. Wilkinson was for the plaintiff, and the suit was undefended.

Chas. W. H. Smith, clerk in charge of the marriage registers at the Colonial Office, produced a copy of the certificate of marriage.

The plaintiff said he was married to the defendant at Prince Albert on the 16th December, 1895. They first lived in the district of Prince Albert. About three or four months before the war witness went to Bloemfontein to take a situation in the Locomotive Department, leaving his wife with her mother at Oudtshoorn. When the war broke out he was called out on commando; he was a year on commando, and was made a prisoner of war, and kept for 22 months. He afterwards went to Holland to undergo an operation. He returned to the Colony in November last. He did not see his wife from the time he left her before the war until he found her at Worcester in July last. She was living with Du Plessis, the co-defendant. She had a child about three months old. She told witness that it was Du Plessis's child. He had received a letter from her, in which she expresed her regret for what had occurred, and pointed out that he must think over it, and remember how long he was absent from her before the war broke out, and that she received no report as to where he was. He should remember that if he had been with her this would not have happened. He could have her summoned for divorce, and she was willing to pay half the costs. She would be his sister, and always stand by and help him. Witness (continuing his evidence) said he wrote to his wife while in the Free State, and sent her money. There were two children of the marriage, and witness asked for custody of both.

Decree of divorce granted, the plaintiff to have custody of the children of the marriage, and the second defendant to pay the costs.

CARSON V. CARSON.

This was an action brought by Helen Carson, of Sea Point, against her husband, now residing in Kimberley, for restitution of conjugal rights, on the ground of malicious desertion, failing which a decree of divorce. Mr. Upington was for the petitioner. The defendant was unrepresented.

The plaintiff Helen Carson, said she was married to the defendant in 1887 at the Roman Catholic Chapel, Berkeley-road, Dublin. They remained in Ireland until 1894, when they came out to this colony, with the intention of settling here. They stayed together in Cape Town for ten months, when the defendant left her, in order to go to Mafeking. He subsequently proceeded to Kimberley. Since 1895 he had not contributed towards her support, and she had had no communications from him. She had supported herself, first, by taking situations in business houses, and afterwards by carrying on a boarding-house. Counsel read a letter received by plaintiff's attorneys from the defendant, in which he said he had no intention of returning to his wife, or providing her with a home. Witness added that defendant was employed at De Beers, in Kimberley, as a guard.

Decree of restitution granted, defendant to return to or receive the plaintiff on or before the 30th September, failing which, to show cause on the first day of next term why a decree of divorce should not be granted.

Postea (October 15): The rule was made absolute.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

COLEY V. DE VILLIERS. { 1903. Aug. 28th.

Prospective lease—Abandonment—Cession of rights by lessee.

On November 3rd, 1900, defendant entered into an agreement with one M., whereby he gave to M. the sole right of prospecting on certain land for certain minerals and precious stones for a term of three years, M. to have the power of ceding his rights on certain conditions. In April, 1901, M. ceded his rights to the plaintiff, but the stipulated conditions were not fulfilled till June, 1903, or thereafter. Defendant thereupon refused to recognize M.'s right of cession or to acknowledge plaintiff as the concessionary, alleging that M. had abandoned his rights previous to June, 1903. In the absence of evidence of abandonment by M. or of acceptance of such abandonment by defendant or of any neglect on M.'s part to perform all his duties under the contract, save as to the payment of rent. The Court held that by such neglect he had not abandoned his rights as a concessionary, that defendant was not justified in refusing to recognise the cession to plaintiff and to allow him to prospect, and that consequently plaintiff was entitled to a declaration of rights and to an extension of five months beyond the time allowed by the original contract.

This was an action brought by Osborne Richard Coley, of Cape Town, against J. N. de Villiers, of Stellenbosch, for a declaration of rights, in respect of the defendant's farm, which had been ceded to the plaintiff by the original lessee on the 20th April, 1901.

The declaration set forth that in November, 1900, the defendant and one Arthur H. Charles Musters entered into an agreement, by which the defendant, as the registered owner of the property, gave Musters the sole right for a period of three years to prospect for iron, copper, tin, other mineral materials, and precious stones on his farm. It was provided that the owner should have the use of his homestead and a certain area ,and a preferent right as to water. The concessionaire had the right to purchase the property within the said period for the sum of £8,000, and in consideration, he had to pay the rental of £1, £2, and £3 per month during the three years. The three years expire in November, 1903. It was lawful for the concessionaire to terminate the contract within fifteen months, provided he intimated his intention, and reinstated all the disturbances of soil. Subject to certain conditions, the owner could not transfer his land during the three years. On April 20, 1901, A. H. C. Musters transferred all his rights to the plaintiff, and on June 15, 1903, the plaintiff tendered to pay the defendant the rent, £72, being the amount stipulated in the said agreement. On June 19, 1903, the defendant refused to recognise the rights of the plaintiff, and refused to allow Mr. Bennett, an engineer, whom he had deputed to look over the property, to come on the farm. Plaintiff claimed an order compelling the defendant to declare the agreement not only during the period of three years, but also during such extended period as the Court might decree the plaintiff entitled to, by reason of the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully cancelling the agreement, and also to restrain him from interfering with the plaintiff's servant.

The plea admitted the agreement between Musters and the defendant, but the defendant had no knowledge of the concession to the plaintiff. The tender of £72, by way of rent, was considered unsatisfactory in terms of the agreement, and the refusal to allow Bennet on the farm was not wrongful and unlawful. Prior to the 15th June, 1903, neither Musters nor the plaintiff had been to the farm, nor was any rent paid. No intimation of the said transfer was given to the defendant. Prior to the 15th June, 1903, the plaintiff had abandoned his rights, and allowed the agreement to lapse. Acting under the belief that the contract had lapsed, the defendant in May sold the farm to a third party, but the transfer had not yet been given, and the defendant would be seriously prejudiced if the sale were not carried into effect.

The replication was general.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. J. de Villiers) for plaintiff; Mr. Burton (with him Mr. Van Zyl) for defendant.

Osborne Richard Coley said he held a cession from Mr. Musters of his right under the agreement. The cession was verbally made on the 20th April, 1901. The cession was subsequently confirmed in writing, and witness made financial advances to develop the property, and he had never abandoned his claim. Musters, as far as he knew, paid no rent, and neither did witness. The farm was close to Saxonberg, where tin had been discovered, and although witness first prospected for coal, he resorted to tin in June last, when he tendered the rent of £72. It was understood that if he succeeded in getting anything out of the property, one-half should go to witness, and the other to Muster's wife and child. In June, 1903, he wanted Mr. Bennett, an engineer, to inspect the property, and consequent on the defendant's refusal, he had lost that opportunity, and he was able to do nothing since June last.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: Musters told him he had paid no rent, but he did not say that he had never been to the place, although he clearly understood he had done no work. He got the cession in April, 1901, and he made no intimation to the owner for two years. He had endeavoured to raise capital, although he had never been there, nor had he sent anyone. He had, however, heard there was a likelihood of coal being discovered there. He never attempted to finance the owner with his rent. He knew nothing of De Villiers having sold his property to the Frank Cushing Syndicate in June. He did not notice that the prospectus covered that particular property. He had read in June that there was a likelihood of tin being discovered. It was not after the sale to the Cushing Syndicate that he wrote the letter. Musters neither had the time nor the inclination to work the property; but at the same time, he was in pecuniary difficulties towards the end of 1901.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Before he wrote the letter, he had consulted his attorneys, and as soon as he heard of the sale, he got the interdict on the transfer.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Jan Nicholas de Villiers said that on the 4th November, 1900, he drew up the agreement with Musters. Beyond £3, he never got any rent. Musters never came near the place, nor did he send anyone to prospect. In September, 1901, he saw Musters at Kenilworth races, and he said on account of the war he did not succeed in his intentions. He never saw Musters again, and he did not know the plaintiff at all; in fact, he thought the whole thing was dead. Musters never said a word about having consigned his rights to anyone else. The Frank Cushing Syndicate bought the property on the 27th May, 1903, and on the 15th June he first heard of the plaintiff.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He never went to Walker's office for the rent, and he had never made any demand on any person. When he met Musters at the races, witness said, "What about the company?" He entered into a written contract with the Cushing Syndicate where it was detained in the office, and he thought he could manage to get the document. Cushing himself asked him to sell the farm, and witness signed the contract before the interdict was granted.

Harry Thomas Standen, defendant's attorney, said that the first he knew of the sale was in May, when the defendant and one of the directors of the Frank Cushing Syndicate called at his office, and on the 27th May, at a meeting, the preliminaries were arranged.

By Mr. Schreiner: He never saw the document drawn up by Mr. Cushing and the defendant.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for the plaintiff): The case of Thomas v. Carr (13 C.T.R., 526) shows that the mere neglect to pay rent is not sufficient to terminate a lease. This lease is a specific contract, and does not give the defendant the right to object arbitrarily to a cessionary if the cessionary undertook to pay the arrears of rent and to fulfil all obligations under the lease. All we have to do is to prove the cession. Mostert simply says that owing to the war he had not succeeded in floating a company, but that there was no abandonment of his right as to the time to which he was entitled by way of extension. See De Beers Mines v. McCarthy (17 S.C.R., 439).

Mr. Burton (for defendant): If the Court is against me on the main question I cannot object to a reasonable extension of time. If, however, we look to the pleadings, I would point out that after the lease to Mostert in November, 1900, we hear nothing from him till June 15, 1903. By that time the defendant had sold the property to a third person. Up to that time there was no contractural relationship between Mostert and the defendant. Until paragraph 5 of the lease applied there could be no such relationship between the plaintiff and the defendant. That could only arise after notice had been given in terms of paragraph 5. The defendant was led by Mostert's conduct to believe that he had abandoned all his rights. Clause 3 give the concessionaire the right to terminate the lease should he fail to find minerals within 15 months. No doubt Coley may have had rights against Mostert in respect of the cession, but he had none against the defendant, because he had not notified the defendant of his intention to fulfil his obligations under the lease.

[Maasdorp, J.: Both parties must consent to the abandonment of a contract.]

A person may abandon by his conduct. Here Mostert did not use his rights and did not pay his rent; but I do not wish to build on this point. The defendant treated the contract as dead. He asked for no rent, and clearly showed that he regarded the contract as abandoned. Briefly, my points are: (1) That up to June, 1903, there was no contractual relation between plaintiff and defendant, and (2) that Mostert, by his own conduct, had abandoned his rights.

Mr. Schreiner was not called upon in reply.

Maasdorp, J.: It appears that on the 3rd November, 1900, an agreement was entered into between the defendant and one Musters, in which the defendant granted to Musters the sole right to prospect for iron and lead and also for precious stones, upon certain land for three consecutive years. In the ordinary course, therefore, this agreement would have expired on the 3rd November of this year. Under this agreement the option is given to Musters, upon his giving notice before the expiry of three years, to purchase the sole right of digging for these minerals for an in definite period. Under clause 5 there is provision made for the cession of the rights under this contract. It is there provided that "the owner shall not be bound to recognise the validity of any assignment or cession on the part of the concessionaire of his rights under these presents, until there shall have been lodged with him an undertaking in writing signed by the assignee or cessionary binding and obliging himself to henceforth fulfil towards him all the obligations theretofore incumbent on the assignor or cedent, and until all rent due to him up to the date of the intimation of such assignment or cession shall have been paid." The plaintiff alleged that he entered into an agreement with Musters on the 20th April, 1901, by which the rights of Musters under the contract were ceded to him, and this agreement which they then entered into was reduced to writing on the 25th July, 1901. However, no intimation was given to the defendant that this cession had taken place until the 15th June, 1903, and De Villiers, upon receiving intimation, repudiated the right under the cession and refused to recognise the plaintiff as the concessionary. It is alleged in the declaration, and admitted by the defendant now, although it was rather questioned in the plea, that all the requirements which it rested upon the concessionary to perform under section 5 of the contract have been performed, that he has lodged an undertaking whereby he takes upon himself all the obligations of the contract, and has tendered to pay all the rent. If, therefore, nothing else is proved, the concessionary would now be entitled to all the rights under the contract and to judgment in this case. But it is alleged by the defendant that this contract was abandoned by the plaintiff before June 15, 1903, and that, consequently, after such abandonment, he cannot now insist upon the contract being performed. The evidence, as put before the Court, upon which this abandonment is averred, is of a very meagre description. As to what passed between the parties, which could convey any intention in this respect on the part of Musters, we have only evidence of a casual conversation which took place between Musters and the defendant at the racecourse. There the defendant, in the year 1901, was evidently under the impression that Musters was still entitled to carry out the condition of this agreement, and he asked him how it was that nothing had yet been done by him.

Musters then told him he had not succeeded in his intentions. His intentions were, under the rights he had under this contract, to float a company, but up to that time he had not succeeded. Well, clearly, nothing was said then from which the Court can infer that Musters had abandoned the contract, and that that abandonment had been accepted by De Villiers; because clearly the abandonment must be mutual, that is, one party abandons, and the other must in some way give his assent to the abandonment. Up to that time nothing had been done which amounted to an abandonment in the eyes of the defendant himself. As a matter of fact, when that conversation took place, there had been already a contract for the cession to Coley, but of course that contract could not be binding upon the defendant until the conditions of section 5 had been performed. That took place only in June. The abandonment, according to the plea, is said to be an abandonment, not by Musters, but by Coley. We have therefore now to consider whether anything was done or said by Coley which amounted to an abandonment of his rights under the contract, and whether such abandonment was accepted by the defendant. Now, it has not been shown that it was the duty of the plaintiff to perform certain work as prospector, the neglect of which would indicate abandonment, or that it was the duty of the plaintiff to perform certain conditions of the contract at certain periods, the neglect of which might have amounted to an abandonment. The only neglect on his part materially affecting the defendant was his neglect to pay rent. Now, that matter has been so fully considered lately in its bearing on the matter of the termination of a contract that it is not necessary to go into it now, but it has been clearly established that neglect to pay rent for any long period does not of itself operate as a forfeiture of the rights of the lessee, where he subsequently tenders payment of the rent. I come to the conclusion that such neglect also does not operate as proof of an abandonment of the rights of the parties under the agreement. There is one other clause in the contract which I should like to refer to as bearing upon this case, and that is the third clause, which provides: "It shall be lawful for the said concessionaire to terminate these presents at any time prior to the expiry of the first fifteen months of the said term of three years in case, after a fair endeavour on his part to find payable minerals, the same have not been found, provided (1) he notifies such intention to terminate, in writing, (2) reinstates all disturbances of the soil. (3) pays his rental up to date of termination, and also pays to the said owner the sum of five pounds sterling." Here we have a clear intention on the part of the defendant under the contract that he would hold Musters bound to this contract unless he gave him notice within a certain time that he desired to terminate the contract. There was no indication of any such intention on the part of Musters himself to terminate this contract. I therefore think it was the duty of the defendant, before he under took to deal with this property, to have ascertained clearly what actually was the intention of Musters or anyone who held a cession, and, having failed to do so, and having dealt with the property without having so ascertained the wishes of the other party to the contract, he has been guilty of breach of this contract. It appears that the defendant, after repudiating the cession, refused to allow the plaintiff to go upon the property under the contract in June, and that consequently from that time plaintiff has been prevented from prospecting. Mr. Burton admits that, if it is now found that the plaintiff's rights under the contract did not terminate until the 3rd November of this year, the plaintiff, having been prevented from prospecting from this period, should now be granted an extension of time equivalent to the period during which he was prevented from carrying on his work upon the property. Under the circumstances, I think the plaintiff is entitled to a declaration of rights in terms of clause "A" of his prayer, and that he is further entitled to an extension of time under the contract to the 1st January next.

Kotzé, J.: I am of the same opinion. I do not find any evidence in this case of abandonment. It is quite true that the Court could presume abandonment from the act of one or other of the parties, but it cannot be said that Coley has really abandoned his rights, and that is really the sole defence.

The Court entered judgment for the plaintiff in terms of prayer "A," the de fendant to pay costs, including the costs in respect of the interdict.

KNOESEN v. THERON. { 1903. Aug. 28th.

Slander—Defamatory words.

Where words may have an innocent or a defamatory meaning, the Magistrate was wrong in allowing an exception that the words were not defamatory. He should try the case on its merits and determine whether under the circumstances the words were defamatory.

This was an appeal against a decision of the Resident Magistrate of Kokstad, in which an exception to an action for slander was upheld.

The exception was taken that the words used were not defamatory, and were incapable of any injurious meaning, and the Magistrate upheld that exception. The plaintiff, Maria Johanna Knoesen, instituted an action for £500 damages for slander. In July, 1901, the defendant, while riding to the town of Kokstad, said of the plaintiff to one Zietsman that she was really a married woman, and that he was in the church when she was married to a man named Matthews, and that one Jimmy Knoesen was a son of the marriage, which had been in force for seventeen years. The plaintiff had suffered damages to the extent of £500. The defendant contended that the plaintiff was a duly married woman, and that no exception could be taken to the words.

The Magistrate's reasons for judgment were that the words were not defamatory, and in no way exposed the plaintiff to hatred, ridicule, or contempt.

Mr. Buchanan (for the appellant): I submit (1) that a man who repeats defamatory words cannot shelter himself under the plea that he has only repeated what he has heard. (2) That in this case we must take for granted that the appellant is a spinster. Then if the words complained of are untrue they are slanderous. In Rudd v. De Vos (2 Sheil, 383) it was held that certain words were not actionable. In that case it was held that the words used did not bear out the innuendo: but in this case the words taken in their plain English meaning are slanderous, and the appellant should not stand or fall by the innuendo. The Magistrate says that the words used would not bring the plaintiff into ridicule or contempt, but he should have gone further if the words were calculated to injure her in her good name. The Magistrate argues that marriage is an honourable state, but so is spinsterhood. She had given out that she was a spinster, and to have it said that she was a married woman and a mother was certainly injurious. The words amount to an accusation of not having told the truth about herself. They may have injured her prospects of marriage, and so have caused her damage: they may also have injured her in social intercourse. Again, it was said that she had been separated from her husband (one Matthews) for 17 years. The fact that Matthews had sent her money would seem to have implied that the separation was her fault, and to imply that was certainly injurious.

Mr. Benjamin (for respondent): The test applied by the Magistrate was quite correct. Were the words used capable of bringing the appellant into hatred, disrepute, or contempt?

[Maasdorp, J.: On the pleadings she is said to be unmarried. Is it not slanderous to say of any unmarried woman that she has had a child?]

Yes, but we must take either the original words or the innuendo: neither imply defamation. It is not defamatory to say that a woman is married.

[Maasdorp, J.: If a woman passes herself off as single, and you say she is married, is not that defamatory?]

I submit not. There is no innuendo that she has been guilty of unchastity: it is only said that she is a married woman and the mother of a child.

[Maasdorp, J.: Suppose a man says "I saw that woman, who professes to be unmarried, married in church," would not that be defamatory if it were untrue?]

No, such a statement would not expose her to hatred, ridicule, or contempt. She was not accused of having led an improper life. A false statement about a person is not necessarily defamatory.

It might have been defamatory to have said that certain persons had called the lady "Miss Knoesen," instead of "Mrs. Matthews."

[Mr. Buchanan: It is injurious to charge a man with paternity.]

[Maasdorp, J.: But here it is said that she was married.]

Mr. Benjamin cited Odgers on Libel and Slander (p. 119, 3rd Edit.) as to innuendo.

[Kotzé, J.: According to our law, if the words used are not slanderous in themselves, and no innuendo is laid, there can be no action for defamation.]

[Maasdorp, J.: The innuendo is that the respondent said the appellant was a married woman, whereas she is a spinster.]

The innuendo is so vaguely set forth that we really do not know of what slander we are accused.

[Kotzé, J.: Is not the meaning of the innuendo this: "That she being a spinster and holding herself out as one, was the mother of a child?]

No. If immorality was said to be alleged against her, why was not that clearly set out in the innuendo?

Mr. Buchanan (in reply): Counsel for the respondent has argued as if the bystanders did not know that Miss Knoesen was a spinster. It would be very anomalous if a person could bring his action for slander to title in order to defend his property, and yet could not bring an action to defend his (or her) character.

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiff, who describes herself as a spinster, fully aged 21 years, sues the defendant in an action for slander, alleging that he said of her that he was astonished that they designated her as Miss Knoesen, when she was really a married woman, and had married a man named Matthews, that he was in the church when the marriage took place, that Matthews, up to some years ago, had sent her money, that it was 17 years since Matthews last met her, and that Jimmy Knoesen was born of the marriage. Then it is said by innuendo that the general meaning of these words is that the plaintiff is the mother of Jimmy Knoesen, and that the words were understood in that sense by those who heard them, whereas the plaintiff is a spinster, and not the mother of the said Jimmy Knoesen. Exception was taken to this summons, on the ground that the words used were not defamatory or actionable, and also that they would not bear the construction put upon them in the innuendo. The Magistrate, in deciding that exception, said that in no sense are the words defamatory, as they in no way exposed the plaintiff to hatred, ridicule, or contempt. Now, it seems to me that the Magistrate was wrong in simply taking the words as they stand without the surrounding circumstances, as alleged in the summons, because the effect of the surrounding circumstances when the words were used would materially affect the meaning that must be attached to the words. Of course, there is nothing injurious in merely stating about a lady that she is married and has children. Of course, that is an honourable position for a lady to occupy, if it is true; but words that may have an apparently innocent meaning, may, under certain circumstances, be very injurious and defamatory. Now, as it is alleged in the summons that this lady is a spinster, and from the very words that are used by the defendant, I cannot but come to the conclusion that he intended to convey at the time that she held herself out as an unmarried lady, and while she was holding herself out as an unmarried lady, she, so far from being a virgin, was the mother of a child. I think no more injurious or scandalous words could be used in reference to an unmarried woman, than that she is the mother of a child; but the other words which were used at the time, in which he stated that she was a married woman, may ultimately show that he was acting honestly, and that he did not intend maliciously and falsely to injure her. What the Magistrate will have to decide when he tries the case upon its merits is, whether these very words were used in such a way, and so understood by the bystanders, as to convey the meaning that the plaintiff was a married woman, or that she had been guilty of immorality. Under all the circumstances, though the words might have an innocent meaning, they might have a very injurious meaning. The exception will be dismissed, and the matter will be referred back to the Magistrate to try the case upon its merits, the respondent to pay the costs of the appeal.

NDUBE V. HOLMES. { 1903. Aug. 28th.

Action against messenger of the Magistrate's Court — Interpleader suit.

Where property seized in execution is claimed by a third party, and no steps are taken to have the claim determined by way of interpleader suit, the claimant may sue the messenger for the recovery of the property.

This was an appeal against a decision of the R.M. of Nqamakwe, in which the appellant sued the respondent unsuccessfully for the return of a certain mare.

The plaintiff sued the defendant as messenger of the Court for the return of the mare, or its value. The mare was seized in execution of a judgment in another case, and plaintiff alleged that he had purchased that mare, which since had three foals, and claimed a return thereof. The messenger's agent found the previous owner of the horse had deserted his residence, and from information he received, he proceeded to the kraal of John Ndube, and duly attached the mare. He then proceeded to other kraals, and attached the young horses. Plaintiff sued for the return of the horse, or its value, and after evidence had been given judgment was given for the defendant, with costs. The Magistrate, in his reasons, said there was no evidence against the defendant to show he did not act in a bona fide manner. The manner in which the plaintiff and his witnesses gave their evidence led the Court to believe there was no sale of the horse to the plaintiff.

Mr. Gardiner for appellant. Mr. Benjamin for respondent.

Counsel, having been heard in argument on the facts,

Maasdorp, J.: It appeared an action was brought by one Govu against Gecelo for the delivery of a horse, said to be bought by Qovu from Gecelo, or its value the sum of £50 damages. The Magistrate, in trying the case, found that the horse had been sold by Gecelo to Govu, and consequently gave judgment for the plaintiff in that case, not for the delivery of the horse, but for the payment of the sum of £50. A writ of execution was then issued to obtain satisfaction of this judgment against the property of Gecelo, and the deputy-messenger, acting for the the present defendant, seized the mare now in dispute as the property of Gecelo. The mare was seized by him at the kraal of a man named John Ndube, and it is now claimed by the plaintiff in the present suit as his property. The plaintiff based his claim to the horse upon a sale of the horse by this man Gecelo to himself. It appears from the evidence given by the witnesses for the plaintiff that the mare was really the property of a man called Manzini, who was the father of Gecelo. During the absence of Manzini, Gecelo seems to have acted for his father, having been sent by his father to fetch the whole of his family to where the father was. There was amongst other properties this mare, which Gecelo sold on behalf of Manzini to Josiah Ndube. Now, there is abundance of evidence that this really took place. The evidence which was given by the witnesses for the plaintiff in the case is corroborated in the main point by one witness for the defence. If the statements of these witnesses are believed, then it is clearly proved that Gecelo, acting for his father, sold this horse to the plaintiff. But the Magistrate says that the circumstances of the case and the manner in which the plaintiff and his witnesses gave evidence led the Court to believe that there was no sale of the horse to the plaintiff. The question, therefore, arises, whether there is any evidence to rebut the evidence given by the plaintiff's witnesses. Mr. Benjamin has been unable to point out a statement made by a single witness for the defence, or for the plaintiff, which throws any doubt upon the evidence of the witnesses for the plaintiff. The evidence is therefore all one way in support of the alleged sale, and there is none at all against the sale. Now, it seems to me, the magistrate considered that when he found in the first suit that this horse had been sold by Gecelo to Govu, in the face of that finding it was impossible for him to come to the conclusion that that horse was also sold to Josiah Ndube. But I think he was wrong there. He may have been perfectly right in finding that there had been a sale by Gecelo to Govu, but that is not inconsistent with the sale of the horse by Gecelo to another person, who purchased it bona fide. If Josiah, without knowledge of the sale by Gecelo to Govu, had purchased this horse, and accepted delivery, the property would vest in him, and, therefore, it would not be inconsistent that there was also a sale to Josiah upon which the plaintiff is entitled to claim this property. When the Magistrate makes a finding upon a question of fact, the Court would hesitate before it would interfere with such a finding, and it is generally on the ground that the Magistrate, having the witnesses before him, would be able to judge of their credibility; but I don't think the question of credibility arises here. The point was raised that the proper course to be adopted in this case would have been to proceed by means of an inter-pleader, in which case the property would have remained in the hands of the Messenger, while the parties contested the claim. But in this case an inter-pleader suit was not instituted. The Messenger retained this property in spite of a demand for its delivery, and I think, upon the authority which has been cited by Mr. Gardiner, the Messenger has now to justify his position by showing that in the execution of the writ he seized the property of the defendant in the suit in which the writ was executed. It seems to me that, under all the circumstances of the case, the plaintiff has proved that the property belongs to him, and he is entitled to recover it. The appeal must therefore be allowed, and judgment will be given for the appellant for the delivery of this horse or the payment of £20 and costs in this Court and the Court below.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

ADMISSIONS. { 1903. Aug. 31st.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved for the admission of Louis Bertie Jacobson as an attorney and notary.

Application granted and oath administered.

Mr. Benjamin moved for the admission of George Greyham Palmer as an attorney and notary.

Application granted, oath to be taken before the Registrar of the Eastern Districts' Court at Graham's Town.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

WOOLF V. RUDNICK.

Mr. Russell moved for a decree of civil imprisonment on an unsatisfied judgment of this Court for £225 15s. 6d. and taxed costs, £25 15s. 10d.

Mr. Alexander, for the defendant, read the latter's affidavit, which was to the effect that he lived in Longmarket-street, was a foreman carpenter, and earned £5 a week. He had to support a wife and seven children, and practically all his earnings were absorbed by the maintenance of himself and family. He offered to pay £2 a month.

Mr. Russell: I am instructed not to consent to that, because it would take ten years to pay off the debt.

The defendant was called, and he stated that he had no other source of income than his wages, that he paid £5 10s. a month rent, and that £2 a month was the utmost he could afford to pay.

Cross-examined by Mr. Russell: He had sold a house at Woodstock, but he only made about £50 profit.

By the Court: That money had gone in bringing out three of his children from Europe. There was a bond on the property.

Decree of civil imprisonment granted, to be suspended on payment of £4 a month, first payment to be made on the 15th September, with leave to the plaintiff to apply for an increased contribution.

WIENER AND CO. V. DAVIDSON AND COHEN.

Mr. Nightingale moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

LUNTZ V. SCHOEMAN.

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence on a good-for for £37 10s., and a promissory note for £375.

Order granted.

HARDY V. WILKES.

Mr. Russell moved for provisional sentence on a bill of exchange for £150.

Defendant's agent said he had filed affidavits, but he had not employed counsel, as he had no funds left.

An affidavit by the defendant's attorney, J. A. Robertson, stated that the defendant was not indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of £150, or any part thereof, and that the plaintiff had admitted to deponent that defendant was not indebted to him. He added that Wilkes was abroad, and he believed would return to this colony in January or February next.

An affidavit by the plaintiff stated that he was induced by the defendant to give up a good business connection at Claremont, to take up some billet under the Cold Storage. He had given Wilkes £60. He denied several of the allegations in the affidavit of Robertson.

Robertson's replying affidavit stated that certain agreements were entered into between the plaintiff and defendant for the importation of cattle from the Argentine, but that, through the Proclamation issued by the Government on the outbreak of disease, it was impossible to carry out the agreement. He contended that plaintiff had wrongfully discounted the bill of exchange sued upon. Proceedings had previously been commenced by the plaintiff against the defendant. The summons, it appeared, was allowed to lapse.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is the consideration for this bill of exchange?]

Mr. Russell: As far as I can make out, it was an advance of £60 by the plaintiff to the defendant, and for inducing him to leave his employment.

Defendant's agent said it was their desire to pay the £60, though they did not admit the legality of it. If the contract had been carried out the plaintiff would have been entitled to £500 for his £60. The sum of £60 had nothing to do with the bill of exchange, but it was arranged that it should be sent to England to be discounted in case the first shipment of cattle did not realise sufficient.

De Villiers, C.J.: The application for provisional sentence will be refused, and plaintiff must go into the principal case, costs to be costs in the cause. The plaintiff may have a claim for £60 against the defendant, but plaintiff had no right to present the bill of exchange, and, besides, the defendant is not here. The former summons was withdrawn while he was here, but as soon as he left there was a fresh summons issued. He has no property here. I have no doubt the parties will be able to come to some terms, as the defendant's agent holds three bills signed by the defendant.

CUNNINGHAM AND ANOTHER V. JACKSON. 1902. Aug. 31st.

Mr. Russell moved for the provisional order for the sequestration of the defendant's estate to be made final.

Order granted.

ESTATE MARSH V. KOHNE.

Mr. Russell moved for provisional sentence on three mortage bonds as follow: £1,000, with interest from the 1st July, 1901; £800, with interest from the 1st October, 1901; and £1,800, less £800 paid on account, with interest on the sum of £1,800 from the 25th July, 1902, to the 25th January, 1903, and on £1,000 from the 26th January, 1903. Plaintiff also asked for provisional sentence for 12s. premium of insurance, and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

ESTATE SILBERBAUER V. WILDSCHUT.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for provisional sentence for two sums of £36 11s. and £1,150, with interest and costs of suit.

Order granted.

MEYER V. DU TOIT.

Mr. Russell moved for provisional sentence upon a certain acknowledgment of debt for £15, and also for judgment under Rule 329d for £15 15s. rent.

Order granted.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

DITCHFIELD V. STERNER. { 1903. Aug. 31st.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for judgment under Rule 329d for £22 10s. for sanitary fixtures provided and fixed by the plaintiff at defendant's instance and request, with interest a tempore morae and costs.

Order granted.

POTGIETER V. BATTESON.

Mr. Burton moved for judgment under Rule 319 in terms of plaintiff's declaration for transfer of a certain farm to the plaintiff from the defendant, plaintiff tendering to take over the mortgage bond thereon.

Order granted.

SMITH V. IBERTSON.

Mr. Nightingale moved for pudgment under Rule 329d for £220, purchase price of certain land, with interest and costs, transfer being tendered on the summons.

Order granted.

MCCRINDLE V. MORRIS.

Mr. Nightingale moved for judgment under Rule 329d for £155, balance of purchase price of certain land, with interest at 6 per cent. from the 1st June, transfer being tendered on the summons.

Order granted.

NYMAN V. RABIE.

Mr. Buchanan moved for judgment under Rule 329d for £72 rent due by the defendant to the plaintiff.

Order granted.

SPILHAUS V. TAPPE BROS.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved for judgment under Rule 329d for £132 11s. 3d., goods sold and delivered, less £25 paid on account, with interest a tempore morae, and costs of suit.

Order granted.

ROBERTSON V. MOSS.

Mr. Burton moved for judgment in terms of the report of the referee (Mr. Maynard Nash). The matter, said counsel, was referred to Mr. Maynard Nash to ascertain the state of affairs in connection with the partnership, and Mr. Nash had now handed in his report, which showed that, after deducting £1.000 which he was instructed to deduct, there was due to the plaintiff a sum of £387 13s. 7d. He applied for judgment for this amount, for costs of the action, costs of an application for the appointment of an interim receiver (which had been ordered to stand over pending the result of the action), and for costs of the present motion.

Sir H. Juta (with him Mr. Alexander), who appeared for the defendant, said that with regard to the application for the appointment of an interim receiver, the Court refused the application, and the costs were ordered to stand over. He could not see any reason which appeared from the action why the plaintiff should be allowed these costs, because there was no allegation that the defendant was doing away with the assets, so as to require the appointment of a receiver.

De Villiers, C.J., said that as a partnership had been established between the parties, judgment must be given for the plaintiff for £387 13s. 7d., with costs of this action and the previous motion.

FRANK V. BLACK.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £59 12s., goods sold and delivered.

Order granted.

REHABILITATION.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the rehabilitation of Jacobus Johannes Hooper.

The matter was ordered to stand over, in order that a balance-sheet might be filed.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

REYNOLDS V. NEW CAPE CENTRAL RAILWAY, LTD. 1903. Aug. 31st.

Mr. Benjamin applied on behalf of the New Cape Central Railway, Ltd., defendants in the action, for the appointment of a commission to take the evidence of a certain witness—one John Coburn.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., appeared to oppose.

It was stated on affidavit that on the 22nd August application was made to the Court for the appointment of a commissioner. No order was made, but the Court mentioned that the application might be renewed if it were found impossible for Coburn to be present at the trial, which was set down for the 8th September. Coburn was a divisional engineer in the employ of the Central South African Railways, and resided at Thaba 'Nchu, Orange River Colony. It was stated that if he came to Cape Town, it would involve a week's absence from the work over which he had control. The Government were anxious to have this work completed, and Coburn's absence for a week would cause delay in various ways.

After hearing counsel in argument,

De Villiers, C.J.: The defendant could, of course, subpœna his witness, and the Court could enforce the attendance of the witness, but this seems to be a case in which there are real difficulties in the way of this witness coming here, and I think it would be for the convenience of both parties that this commission should issue. The Court will, therefore, authorise the examination of this witness before a commissioner, and will appoint the Resident Magistrate of Thaba 'Nchu as commissioner to take the evidence. This order will apparently necessitate the postponement of the case. The next term will be earlier than usual, and there will be no very great delay in setting it down for next term.

Costs were ordered to stand over.

ESTATE ANTHONISSEN V. NATIONAL MUTUAL LIFE ASSOCIATION OF AUSTRALASIA.

Granted.

Ex parte HULLEY AND OTHERS.

Mr. Close moved for leave to pass transfer of certain property in which certain minor beneficiaries were interested. The Master recommended that the prayer of the petition be granted.

Leave was granted as prayed.

Ex parte McDANIELL.

Mr. Bisset moved for leave to transfer certain property, under circumstances, the nature of which sufficiently appears from the Master's report. The report reads as follows:

"The petitioner, in her capacity as executrix testamentary of the above-mentioned estate, has sold to her son, J. S. McDaniell, for the sum of £1,650, farm No. 342, situate in the division of East London, which forms part of the assets of the joint estate of herself and her deceased husband, and now prays that she may be authorised to pass transfer thereof to her said son. She further proposes to divide the whole of such purchase price between her eight children now living and the issue of one of her daughters, who died since her late husband's death. The price seems to be a fair one, and so far as the sale itself is concerned, should, I think, be confirmed. In view of the terms of the will, however, and more especially in regard to the following clause which appears therein, viz.:

"'And at the demise of the survivor of us, then the said joint estate shall be divided equally amongst our aforesaid children which may then be living and the lawful issue and other descendants which may then be living of such of our said children as shall happen to die in our or either of our lifetime; such issue or other descendants to take, nevertheless, only the same share or portion as his or her respective father or mother or other ancestor would have been entitled to if living; and the said joint estate shall thereupon be delivered and paid over to our said children and their issue aforesaid, subject to the payment of the just debts of the said estate.'

"I feel doubtful—the survivor having adiated—as to whether such proposed distribution could now be made, or whether such distribution is only to take place at the death of the petitioner.

"1. Should your Lordships hold that the distribution may now be carried into effect, then I beg to recommend the following:

"That the sale be confirmed, and that the petitioner be authorised to pass transfer of the said farm to her son, James McDaniell, and that the purchase price be distributed on the basis set forth in the petition: the portions accruing to the minors to be paid into the Guardians' Fund.

"2. In the event of your lordships holding that the distribution is only to be made at the death of the petitioner, then I beg to recommend:

"That the sale be confirmed, and that the petitioner be authorised to pass transfer of the said farm to her son, James McDaniell, and that the purchase money be deposited with one of the local trust companies, subject to the life usufruct of the petitioner, and the conditions of the will."

An order was granted in terms of the alternative recommendation of the Master, the proceeds of sale to be deposited with a Trust Company, to be approved of by the Master.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZÉ.]

TRIAL CAUSES.

ASHMAN v. ASHMAN. { 1903. Aug. 31st.

This was an action for restitution of conjugal rights, brought by Sophia Margaret Ashman against her husband.

The declaration set forth that the parties were married in community of property in May, 1892. There were four minor children of the marriage. On the 19th April, 1903, the defendant maliciously deserted the plaintiff, who now claimed an order for restitution of conjugal rights, and failing compliance therewith, a decree of divorce, division of the joint estate, custody of the children, and a reasonable sum for maintenance, with costs of suit.

In an alternative claim, the plaintiff expressed her willingness to accept payment of the sum of £500, cession of her life policy of £500, and certain household furniture.

[Mr. Buchanan for plaintiff; defendant in default.]

Rule granted, the defendant to return to or receive plaintiff on or before the 30th September, or show cause on the first day of next term why a decree of divorce should not be granted, custody of the minor children to the defendant, division of the property, payment of £2 per month as maintenance for each of the children until they attained the age of sixteen years, with costs of suit, or judgment in terms of the alternate claim.

WRIGHT AND DONALD v. WESSELS. { 1903. Aug. 31st Sept. 3rd.

This was an action for the recovery of the sum of £56 15s. 11d., being the balance of an account for work and labour done and goods sold and delivered.

The declaration set out that the plaintiffs were engineers in Cape Town, and the defendant a brickmaker, residing at D'Urban-road. The defendant was justly indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of £56 15s. 11d. for work and labour done, material supplied, and moneys disbursed during February and March, 1903. The defendant refused to pay the said sum or any portion of it.

The plea admitted the formal allegations, but set out that in January last the plaintiffs were employed to superintend and carry out the erection of certain machinery, for the purpose of brickmaking, and a certain fan on the Fairfield Estate, and give the services of such workmen as might be necessary to carry out the work in a proper and skilful manner. The plaintiffs accepted the said employment, but they had failed to carry out the work in a workman-like manner, and in consequence of the manner the plaintiffs carried out the work, the defendant was forced to have the work undone and reconstructed. The value of plaintiffs' work did not exceed the sum of £50, which had been paid by the defendant.

For a claim in reconvention, the plaintiff stated that he was prevented from carrying on a profitable business, and sustained damages to the extent of £500.

The replication denied that the plaintiffs undertook to superintend the erection of the machinery in a good and workman-like manner, or that they were in any way liable.

[Mr. Upington for plaintiffs; Mr. M. de Villiers for defendant.]

Walter Wm. Wright, engineer, partner in the plaintiff firm, said that in January, 1903, he entered into an arrangement with the defendant as regarded the labour, but there was nothing arranged with regard to the erection of the machinery. Plaintiff agreed to supply a skilled mechanic and a helper, and the defendant asked him to tender for the erection of certain machinery. Witness had not got control of the mechanic and helper. After Mr. Little had been working for three weeks, he was stopped, and witness had an interview with the defendant, who asked him to send in a tender for the balance of the work. A tender was sent in, but witness heard nothing further about it. Certain work was done at the shop, with a view to the tender. After accounts had been forwarded, the defendant wrote on the 12th April that the account contained some abnormal charges, and witness went and saw the defendant next day. He paid £25 on account, and seemed satisfied. There had been no complaint about the work until the defendant was threatened with proceedings to recover the money. Witness did not in any way supervise the erection of the fan which was complained of, and the material was of the best quality. The labour and material was supplied as they appeared on the account.

Cross-examined by Mr. De Villiers: He had put up brickmaking machinery before. The defendant did not explain anything about machinery. The defendant did not lay particular stress on the erection of the fan, but it was possible witness said that he understood all about the fan. The defendant, witness believed, stopped Little proceeding with the work.

By Kotzé, J.: He could not say why Little was stopped working by the defendant.

Trevor Little, fitter in the C.G.R., at Salt River, said that he was a mechanical engineer, and that in February and March last he was with the plaintiff firm. On January 28 he went out to the defendant's place, and remained there until February 20. The fan was unpacked and in sections, when he arrived. He superintended the removal of the fan to the spot where it was to be erected. He did not bolt the fan together, but, temporarily, he connected the fan to see if all the parts were there. He left before it was taken to pieces again. The defendant gave him to understand that he would not be required again.

Cross-examined by Mr. De Villiers: The defendant, he believed, told him to put the fan up temporarily. He could not possibly believe that the defendant thought that the fan was permanently erected, and proceeded to erect a house over it. It was unnecessary to tell anyone that the fan was only temporarily erected. The foundations were not constructed at witness's instructions.

Re-examined by Mr. Upington: He took no more responsibility than merely seeing the parts put together.

George Halliwell, mechanical engineer in the plaintiff's firm, said that in March he went down to the defendant's place. The defendant asked him if he had come down to put the fan up, and showed witness the sections lying about. The fan had been removed from the siding. The brick and mud foundations had been erected for the fan. Witness bolted together the various parts of the fan, and noticed in a day or so that the foundations had sunk under the weight. The defendant, with six or seven boys, worked on the fan. When witness left there was about a month's work on the fan, and when he (defendant) stopped him from working he said he would build a wall round it, and send for witness again. The defendant himself erected the fan.

Cross-examined by Mr. De Villiers: Any engineer would know that the fan had only been temporarily fixed up. Witness placed the iron bars underneath to raise the fan up. He intended running in the water in like manner. When the shaft was placed in a wrong position it was on Wessel's instructions.

Re-examined by Mr. Upington: When he left, the work was incomplete.

Mr. Upington closed his case.

Petrus Johannes D. Wessels, the defendant, said he was a brickmaker, and had imported brickmaking machinery. Witness went to Messrs. Wright and Donald, and asked for a price to put up the machinery, mentioning the fan particularly, as it was a new thing, and very important. Witness did not know much about machinery. Witness asked Wright for an estimate, and the latter suggested that they should go to the place and see the machinery. They did so, and afterwards Wright said he could not quote a lump sum, but would charge witness for material, and for labour at a daily rate. It was not understood that witness should direct the work. Little and another man subsequently came out. Witness supplied the material, and the unskilled labour, employing sometimes eight men. Witness had no control over the work. He told his men to take instructions from Little. Witness was not satisfied with the work, and went and complained to Wright, who told him that Little was going away, and that he would send up another man. The foundations had then been made. Wright then said something about quoting a lump sum for the rest of the work. Another man came in place of Little, and inserted certain pieces of iron under the work. Witness did not understand that this was only temporarily. Witness understood that Little was sent there to give witness skilled advice and assistance. The fan was put up while Little's successor was there. Witness built a house over the fan. Witness got Mr. Webster to come and see the work. Afterwards he wrote to England for advice, and got information as to how the work should really have been done. He subsequently saw Mr. Merryfield, and became absolutely satisfied as to the defects in the construction of both the pan and the fan. The work had to be undone and the whole gone over again in a proper way. Little was there when the foundations of the pan were finished, and directed how the work was to be done. He was not there when the foundations for the fan were completed. It had cost £65 to do the whole work properly. Witness had paid more than plaintiff's work was worth to him. Witness had a large business, and the loss owing to being deprived of the use of the machinery was very heavy; it was about £2,000. His assessment of £500 was very modest. Witness was charged with three poles at £5 each; he could have bought the lot for £1. This item appeared in one of the accounts, but was not now in the case. When witness wrote in May, saying he was prepared to pay if a proper account were submitted, he was not aware of the full deficiencies in the work. The defect in the fan was due to it being placed according to the instructions of the skilled expert, Mr. Little.

Cross-examined: There was work to be done on the fan when Halliwell left. The agreement with Wright and Donald was that they were to erect the pan, the fan, and other machinery. Witness had never seen a fan like his in this country. He had not had any machinery erected before, except an engine and boiler. Witness did not ask Wright and Donald to finish the work, because he thought they were not doing it properly. When witness paid a sum on account in April he said nothing about the work being wrong; he did not then know it was wrong. Witness only intended to pay £25, but Wright asked for more, representing that he had a court case coming on.

Re-examined: The work was not completed yet. £65 had already been spent. The difficulty was that there was no connection between the fan and the kiln.

By the Court: Halliwell gave witness to understand that the work on the pan was finished, excepting to make a connection, which would only take a day.

Harry Barnes said he was instructed by Mr. Little to do the brickwork for the foundations of the pan and the fan. He received no instructions from Mr. Wessels, who told him to work according to Mr. Little's instructions. Mr. Wright gave him certain instructions with regard to the fan.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He was told that he could build anything on the outside, but he must build with brick and cement in the middle to carry the weight. In his opinion the foundations had not sunk. Mr. Little told him to leave seven-eighths of an inch for packing in order to lift the pan up to the old shaft. Mr. Wessels told him to take his instructions from Donald and Wright or any of their representatives. That was after Mr. Little had gone. It was not true that he was instructed to make the foundations of brick and stone right through.

Robert Henry Merryfield, mechanical engineer, said he had inspected the pan for Mr. Wessels at Fairfield. He found that the pan had been put together wrongly. The pan had been so erected as to defeat the maker's object. If the pan had been worked as it had been erected it would have been dangerous not only to the machinery, but also to the men who were managing it. The fan was also improperly erected, in fact, built "inside out." The whole fan had to be shifted about twelve feet. All the work was practically of no use at all, and the structures had to be re-built.

Cross examined by Mr. Upington: He had had considerable experience of brickmaking machinery in England. This machinery had been re-erected on his instructions. He was confident that the fan would work now. The pieces of iron that he found in the machinery were not, he believed, intended to be temporary packing. Those pieces of iron were placed between planed surfaces, which ought to have been working together.

Abraham Webster said that in April last he went to see the fan at the request of Wessels. He tested it, and found it defective. The machinery of the pan was also placed wrongly. Witness undertook to put the pan right for £15.

Mr. De Villiers closed his case.

Postea (September 3).

Mr. Upington (for plaintiffs), said he thought the first point to be decided was whether the mechanical engineer who was to supervise the work must be looked upon as the servant of the plaintiff or of the defendant. He submitted that all the plaintiffs were to do was to supply a mechanic of ordinary skill, not an expert in brickmaking machinery or the novel form of fan that was erected for the defendant. All that the plaintiffs undertook was to supply labour, a skilled mechanic, and a helper at so much per day. Assuming that he was negligent, counsel contended that he was not the servant of the plaintiffs, but of the defendant, who paid the man, though, of course, not directly. The defendant had the power of dismissing the man and indicating the work to which he was to address himself.

Mr. M. de Villiers (for defendant) contended that the defendant's agreement had been fully proved. The plaintiffs were supplying expert advice and assistance to Mr. Wessels to have this machinery properly erected. He urged that the onus probandi rested upon the plaintiffs to show to what extent their work had benefited the defendant. He contended that the defendant was entitled to damages for failure to properly erect the machinery.

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiffs in this case claim from the defendant the sum of £56 15s. 11d., as the balance on an account for work and labour done, material supplied, and goods sold and delivered, and also moneys disbursed. It appears that the whole of the account amounted to £106 15s. 11d., but payments were made upon account, which reduced this account to £56 15s. 11d. The items under this account consist of work which was rendered by the plaintiffs through their servants in the erection of certain machinery upon the ground of the defendant and of items which represent material supplied out of the shop and articles manufactured there at the request of the defendant by the plaintiffs. Now, it seems to me that it has been proved that the work was done upon the ground under an agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant, by which the plaintiffs were to supply the defendant with the services of a skilled mechanic and an assistant, for whose services they would be entitled to charge at a certain rate per hour. The mechanics proceeded to the defendant's place and set about erecting certain machinery, which was to be used in the brick kiln. This machinery consisted of what is called a pan and a fan. The plaintiffs' workmen were busy at this work for some considerable time, and at the time they left it appears the pan had been fixed upon its foundation, and instructions had been given to the plaintiffs' servants as to the foundations that were to be put up and the manner in which the fan was to be constructed. At that stage of the proceedings the defendant dispensed with the services of these mechanics. By the agreement, I am of opinion that the work was to be done, not by the job as a complete work, but was to be done from day to day as the defendant required the services of these men. Consequently, we must take it that when he dispensed with their services they were only responsible for the work up to the stage at which it had then arrived. Up to that stage they should be paid for their services if their services were of any use to the defendant, but for any work that was to be effected beyond that the plaintiffs would not be responsible. When the plaintiffs contracted to supply skilled labour—the skilled labour of a mechanic and his assistant—I think they guaranteed that the services which they themselves were going to charge for would be the services of skilled men, who would properly construct the machinery they took in hand. It seems to me that the mechanics failed to effect that purpose. When they left the works I am satisfied that both the fan and the pan had been improperly constructed. The pan had been wrongly adjusted, and the result of the mistakes made by the plaintiffs' servants was that the work had to be undone again, and virtually done from the very commencement. The foundation that was left upon which the pan was replaced was really the foundation built by the defendant himself. It was found that the manner in which the fan had been constructed under the direction of the plaintiffs' servants was such that it was wholly useless for the purpose for which it was intended, and there also the work had to be entirely undone, and defendant was put to great expense to reconstruct it. Now, it seems to me that when the plaintiffs' claim for services rendered by these men in the construction of this work, they must prove that the work was properly done, and if it appears that the work was wholly useless to the defendant, they would not be entitled to claim, I come to the conclusion that upon the result of the evidence it would seem that the work was really useless, and that the machinery had to be reconstructed, and the foundation, as far as the fan was concerned, had to be rebuilt, and upon that ground the plaintiffs are not entitled to claim for these services. The defendant, however, contends that because in the reconstruction of this work he had expended more than the £50 claimed in respect of it, he is entitled now to the excess; but he has put in no claim in reconvention for moneys expended by him, and consequently such a claim cannot now be made. If he had set up a claim in reconvention, that claim would have been considered, but at present it cannot be considered, because it has not been made. The conclusion, therefore, that I come to is this—that, as far as the £56 is concerned which is claimed for work done in the shops and other material supplied, upon the evidence the plaintiffs are entitled to recover that sum. It is entirely a separate claim from that for work done in respect to the brick-kilns upon the ground. The plaintiff is therefore entitled under his account to the £56 for materials supplied from his shop, and the work done in his shop. But we find that in respect to that claim a sum that may be appropriated to the payment of that claim, amounting to £50, has already been paid, and consequently there remains a balance due to the plaintiffs of £6 15s. 11d. There is a claim made in reconvention by the defendant, in which he claims £500 for damages suffered by him through loss of the profits which he might have derived from brick-making if the brick-kilns had been completed by the plaintiff's servants. Now, I may mention that I do not find that there was any contract between the parties that the brick-kilns should actually be completed by the plaintiff's servants: consequently there is no contract by the plaintiff that he would hand over the completed brick-kiln to the defendant at a certain time, after which time he might be regarded in default; but, besides that, I may generally state that damages of that character are altogether too remote to be claimed in a case of this description. Judgment will therefore be given for the plaintiff for £6 15s. 11d. on the claim in convention, with costs, and judgment will be given for the defendant in reconvention on the claim in reconvention.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D) and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZÉ.]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

HERBERT v. CLAREMONT MUNICIPALITY. { 1903. Sept. 1st.

Municipal regulations—Municipal engineer — Building regulations.

On motion for an order compelling the engineer of M. Municipality to issue a certificate of completion of the applicant's building, it appeared that his architect had submitted certain plans to the Municipality, shewing the floor line to be 12 inches above the level of L. road, and that the plans had been approved of, but that the floor line of the house, as built, was on a level with L. road.

Held, in the absence of any proof of approval of the divergence, the applicant was not entitled to succeed.

This was an application upon notice of motion brought by John Alexander Wm. Herbert, as owner of property at Claremont, against the Claremont Municipality, for an order to compel the respondents to issue a certificate of completion in respect of a certain building in the vicinity of Lansdowne-road.

The applicant's affidavit stated that in August, 1902, he submitted plans, sections, schedules, and specifications for a building comprising a shop and dwelling-house, to be erected within the Municipality of Claremont, which said plans, sections, and so forth were passed. The schedule set forth that the floor levels must be 12 inches above the centre of the nearest street, but the nearest street to the said building was a certain unnamed street. Applicant subsequently wanted to alter the situation of the proposed building by erecting it nearer to the said street. The Municipal Engineer's attention was called to the matter. The Engineer said this could not be done, as the street in question was a recognised road, and that petitioner was to work from it. On the 9th February, 1903, notice was given to the Municipal Clerk that the foundations of the building were completed, and an inspection by the Municipal Engineer was asked for. The engineer inspected the foundations, and had no fault to find, and deponent heard nothing further until the roof was nearly completed, when objection was made by the Municipality on the ground that the floor levels were not twelve inches above the crown of Lansdowne-road. Applicant said that the level of the floors was about 22 inches above the centre of the unnamed street, and in his view this street should form the basis for the levels of the property.

There were supporting affidavits by applicant's father, Wm. John Herbert, builder, and of a mason employed on the building.

The answering affidavits of the clerk, engineer, and other officers of the Claremont Council were to the effect that the Council's position was that the floors of applicant's property were about level with Lansdowne-road, that Lansdowne-road, and not the unnamed street, was the standard road shown on the schedule, and that the plans provided that the floor levels should be 12 inches above the crown of Lansdowne-road, in compliance with regulation ii., cap. 9, of the Muncipal Bye-laws. The clerk had been unable to find in the records at the Council's office any notice from Mr. Herbert inviting inspection of the foundations. The Council declined to allow a certificate of completion to be issued until the buildings had been erected in accordance with the plans submitted to them, as for drainage and other purposes it was of importance that the level should be adhered to. The applicant had no excuse for proceeding with the erection of the buildings in contravention of the plans and schedules passed by the Council. The engineer denied that he had told the applicant to take the unnamed street as the basis for the floor levels.

The replying affidavits of applicant and his father, Wm. John Herbert, stated that had it not been for the repair of Lansdowne-road, and the raising of the crown of the said road, the floor levels would have been nine inches higher than the crown. It was also stated that in order to comply with the notice received from the Council it would have been necessary to take out the doors and window frames, take off the roof, and raise the walls.

Mr. Benjamin (for the applicant): Apparently the applicant went on building in ignorance of the fact that his plans had been returned to the architect.

Mr. McGregor (for the respondent): We will sanction the building if the floors are raised to 12 inches above the road level.

Mr. Benjamin: I do not know whether the floors can be raised. As the doors and windows are already in, it would be very inconvenient to raise them. The building schedule of the Municipality does not agree with the regulations. The one says that the floors must be one foot above the nearest street; the other simply says one foot above the street. The side street in this case is the nearest street, and the question is whether the regulations or the building schedule should prevail.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is there any real conflict between them?]

The architect was misled by the engineer, who told him to work from the side road.

[De Villiers, C. J.: No, he was particularly told to work not from that road, but from the road.]

[Kotzé, J.: The regulations say that you must work from the level of the main road.]

I admit that we have not complied with the regulations, but we acted in good faith and without contumacy. The floors are two feet above the level of the circumjacent land, though they are only two inches above the crown of the Lansdowne-road. The building is perfectly healthy, and the Municipality would not be prejudiced by sanctioning it. See Dada v. Municipality of Mafeking (12, C.T.R., 373). The respondents' engineer misled the applicant, and the respondents are thereby estopped from going back on their own decision.

Mr. McGregor (for the respondents) was not called upon.

De Villiers, C. J., put it to respondent's counsel whether if the floors were raised the Council would take a liberal view in the application of their bye-laws as to the height of the rooms?

Mr. McGregor, after a pause, said that he had consulted with his attorneys, and they were prepared to give an undertaking that if petitioner would raise the floor 12 inches, respondents would not insist upon the rest of the main building being raised.

Mr. Benjamin said he was unable to obtain any definite guidance on the point from his attorneys. He did not know whether there would be any architectural difficulties in the way of raising the floors. Proceeding, he said that the applicant was led to believe by the engineer that the unnamed street was a recognised road, and that he must work from it. The applicant had made a bona fide mistake, and it was due to conversations that he had had with the Municipal Engineer. There seemed to be very little prejudice to the Municipality in allowing this building to be occupied as it was, because, although the floor levels might not be above the Lansdowne-road, they were 24 inches above the circumjacent land.

[De Villiers, C. J.: This is an application for an order compelling the Claremont Municipality to instruct its Municipal Engineer to issue a certificate of completion of a certain building. Such an order cannot be made unless the Court is satisfied that the certificate has been improperly or illegally withheld by the engineer, and in the present case there is really no evidence to show that the engineer acted improperly or illegally. The building regulations provide that all plans submitted to the Council for approval shall show the line and width of the road (if any) which it is proposed to face, and the line of any adjoining property, and the heights of foundations above the centre of the said road. The road which this property was to face was the Lansdowne-road. The architect employed by the applicant himself showed that the floor line of the house was to be twelve inches above the Lansdowne-road. Clearly, therefore, the applicant is bound to have the floor line of his house 12 inches above the Lansdowne-road. He relies, however, upon the schedules in which the level is given "above the nearest road." Well, in one sense, the other road, that unnamed road, may be nearer, because at one point it is slightly nearer than the Lansdowne-road, but at another point it is much farther, and if you take the average distance, then Lansdowne-road is the nearest road, so that, even taking the schedules, it is not clear that the applicant is right. But taking the regulations, which I think we ought to take, with the plan, then it is undoubted that Lansdowne-road is the nearest road, and that there was an undertaking on behalf of the applicant to have his floor-line 12 inches above the Lansdowne-road. But then, it is said, that on one occasion there was some application to come nearer to the unnamed road, and that then the applicant was told that he should work from that unnamed road. Well, it does not follow from that conversation that there was any authorisation to place the floor line 12 inches above that road, seeing that, according to the regulations and according to the plans, this floor-line was to be 12 inches above Lansdowne-road. It is possible that if the whole question is tried by action, the plaintiff may succeed, but upon the affidavits, I do not think he is entitled to succeed; but at the same time I would suggest to the respondent Council to consider whether now, under all the circumstances, they might not allow this building to stand. It seems to me that it would be somewhat hard for the applicant if he were compelled to raise all his doors, all his windows, even if it is not necessary to raise the roof. It would put the applicant to much inconvenience, and certainly great expense, and it would be well for the Council to consider whether now, having asserted their rights, they might not be justified in overlooking the applicant having his floor-line below where it should be put, and allowing matters to stand where they are. If that suggestion is adopted, then we may hear nothing more about the case, and the applicant then will not have any need to bring an action. Upon the affidavits now before the Court, I am of opinion that the application should be refused, with costs.

DR. WILLIAMS' MEDICINE CO. v. TOTHILL. { 1903. Sept. 1st.

Trade mark Registration—Imitation.

In 1893, the applicant registered a trade-mark for pills in the following terms: "Dr. Williams' pink pills for pale people," and no application was afterwards made to expunge the mark from the register. In 1903, the respondent sold pills, in wrappers and boxes, of a different colour from applicant's, but with the label "Dr. Wilson's pink pills for anæmic people."

Held, that as the similarity was calculated to deceive intending purchasers of the applicant's pills, he was entitled to an interdict restraining the sale.

This was an application for an interdict restraining the respondent from selling or exposing for sale certain pills sold in boxes bearing the words, "Dr. Wilson's pink pills for anæmic people," on the ground that there was an infringement of the registered trade mark of the applicant's in respect to the pills registered as "Dr. Williams' pink pills for pale people."

In an affidavit filed by the plaintiff company's South African manager, points of similarity between the two packages were referred to. The pills were made up in boxes of similar size and shape.

The respondent denied that there was any infringement. The pills, in respect of which complaint was made, were sent to respondent by Messrs. Lorimer and Co., wholesale and export druggists, of London. The pills appeared in the catalogue of that firm.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for the applicant): Our trade-mark was registered in 1893, and therefore arguments drawn from Act 12 of 1895 to show that the word "pink" is not registerable cannot apply. Our Act No. 23 of 1877 followed the English Act of 1873, and our Act No. 12 of 1895 follows the English Act of 1888. We complain that the respondent advertises "pink pills," which is the name by which our medicine is known. It is a case of colourable imitation. See Lever Bros. v. Nannucci (10 C.T.R., 660).

[De Villiers, C.J.: But in that case the designs were very smiliar.]

Yes, but here they use our trade-mark duly registered under Act 22 of 1877, and to that trade-mark we have an exclusive right as long as it remains on the register. See Lever Bros. v. Nannucci (10 C.T.R., 660).

Mr. Wilkinson (for the respondent): The question is whether in this case any deception has been practised on the public. As to the word "pink," nobody can have a monopoly in that.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then what is the essential part of the trade-mark?]

We must take the whole trade-mark together. It is impossible to say that one part is more essential than another.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The description of the goods and also the names "Williams" and "Wilson" are very similar.]

It is not as though the respondent in advertising had made extensive use of the colour of pink. No doubt the names "Williams" and "Wilson" are very similar, but that is not Wilson's fault. We must take a trade-mark as a whole, and here the whole get up of the pills is different. As to Williams' trade-mark having been registered under Act 22 of 1877, the whole question is: Does section 6 of that Act make these words "pink" and "pills" registerable. In previous trade-mark cases, as in the Sunlight Soap case, the labels used were very similar. If the resemblance in the get up of the goods is not close enough to deceive a customer, how can there be any deception? Here the get up of the two articles is quite different and the applicant's pills are not known simply as "pink pills," but as "Dr. Williams' pink pills." We must look to the whole design, or the respondent might be forbidden to use even the words "pills" and "doctor."

Mr. Schreiner (in reply): The respondent's case has been argued as though disclaimer were recognised under the Act of 1877, but that Act does not make any provision for disclaimers. We do not say that Wilson may not sell pills, but that he may not sell "pink pills for anæmic people." Williams, and not Wilson, thought out the collocation of these words. As to colour, that in itself has nothing to do with a trade-mark. See Kerly on Trade-marks (p. 379).

De Villiers, C.J.: In 1893 the applicant registered his trade-mark in due form in this colony in the following terms, "Dr. Williams' pink pills for pale people," "great blood builder, nerve tonic," and so on. The registration took place under the Trade Marks Registrations Acts of 1877 and 1891, and no proceeding has ever been taken to expunge the mark from the register. It is certainly not a mark which could be registered as such under the Act of 1895, and the question is not now raised whether it could properly be registered under the previous Acts. The Court must therefore assume that it was properly registered. The respondent is a chemist in Cape Town, and has been selling pills with the mark "Dr. Wilson's pink pills for anæmic people." The colour of the wrappers is different, but the colour of the pills is the same. The appellant now seeks to restrain the respondent from continuing the sale, and the question to be determined is whether the similarity in name is calculated to deceive intending purchasers of the applicant's pills. The names of the two doctors are not identical, but there is just sufficient similarity to impose upon persons who, having heard of the virtues of Dr. Williams' "pink pills," are thus led into purchasing Dr. Wilson's "pink pills." It is true that the former pills are recommended for "pale people," while the latter are said to be "for anæmic people," but this slight difference would not be sufficient to remove the wrong impression caused by the similarity in other respects. Dr. Wilson is entitled to use his own name on his pill boxes, but he had so many other descriptive adjectives to select from that there was really no necessity for calling his pills "pink pills," being the name already registered as the applicant's trade-mark. The application must be granted, with costs.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and a Jury.]

BARNARD V. MOOLMAN. { 1903. Sept. 1st. " 2nd.

Slander.

This was an action brought by Cornelius Barnard, a Field-cornet, of Carnarvon, against Willem Moolman, of the same district, to recover £1,000 damages for slander.

The declaration set out that on the 11th March, 1903, at Vaalputs, in the district of Carnarvon, the defendant, at a public auction, and in the hearing of a large number of people, said of the plaintiff: "Friends and all people present here, I would advise you to have as little as possible to do with Mr. Frank Barnard (meaning the plaintiff), as he is a d—— scoundrel. He has fraudulently brought up horses belonging to me in his own name before the Commission (meaning thereby that the plaintiff had fraudulently claimed compensation in his own name before a certain Commission appointed to inquire into war losses for horses belonging to defendant), and if it were not for his parents and parents-in-law, for whom I have so much respect, I would have had him thrown into gaol. To show you what I think of him: the man who bought this place (meaning Joseph Fourie) asked me to become surety for him together with him (meaning the plaintiff), but I refused, as I won't have anything to do with such a d—— scoundrel. He is not satisfied with swindling the public, but he swindles the Government, because he is going to bring a big claim before the Commission, and I can prove that he did not lose a hundred sheep (meaning thereby the plaintiff was going to make a fraudulent claim before the aforesaid Commission for more sheep than he had actually lost)." And the defendant further, at the same place and in the hearing of the said people, wrongfully, unlawfully, and with intent to injure, said of the plaintiff: "Yes, you will now go to court with your lot of d—— Hottentots, who will swear just as you wish them to, since no decent man will ever be a witness in a case of yours," the defendant meaning thereby that the plaintiff would proceed to law with the suborned testimony of a lot of Hottentots, and that the persons who had given evidence in a recent case in the Supreme Court between the parties were Hottentots, whose testimony had been suborned by the plaintiff, who had committed perjury at the request of the plaintiff, who had also committed perjury. By reason of the premises, the plaintiff had suffered in his good name and reputation, and had otherwise suffered loss and damage to the extent of £1,000, which the plaintiff claimed as damages.

The defendant, in his plea, admitted that he spoke the following words to the plaintiff: "Now you cannot prove that I am a rogue, and I now say you are a rogue, and I will prove it to you. In the first place, we purchased the sheep on joint speculation, and you sold them as agreed, and you informed me that we made nothing on them, and that it was, as you stated, a 'dead loss,' but now I discovered from Mr. James de Witt, the purchaser of the sheep, that I should have got about £130. After I have trapped you, you are willing to pay. Then I discovered that you claim some horses, my own bona fide property, in your claim and on your name before the War Losses Compensation Commission. Your own father told me, who asked me to keep the matter quiet. To make your claims large, you do such things. And had it not been for the respect I have for your parents and parents-in-law, I should have had you lodged in gaol. The Boers did not slaughter more than 100 of your sheep at Kleinvlei. You not only cheat the public, but also the Government. Just now a man who had purchased a farm came to me and asked me to stand security for him along with another man. I then asked him who that other man was, and he said Barnard, and I at once refused, and the reason why I refused I shall now state—it was because I did not trust you." The defendant said that the words were used under the influence of great anger, caused by the provocation of the plaintiff, who first approached the defendant and slandered him, and that he used the words without malice. By reason of the following words, used by the plaintiff, "You are a rogue. I shall prove in a court of law the thefts you have committed," the defendant claimed in reconvention £1,000 damages, and £93 4s. in respect of the balance of a certain joint transaction in a sheep speculation.

Mr. Upington (with him Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers) for plaintiff. Mr. Burton (with him Mr. van Zyl) for the defendant.

Mr. Upington then called the plaintiff,

Cornelius Barnard, Field-cornet for the district of Carnarvon, who stated that for some time he had carried on speculations in sheep. In October, 1901, he entered into an agreement with the defendant, and in September, 1902, he had a settlement with his partner. On the 11th March this year he was present at a sale at Vaalputs, in the district of Carnarvon. In the morning he saw the defendant, who was claiming a wagon from the estate. In consequence of a conversation with one Fourie earlier in the morning, he went up to the defendant and asked him what he (defendant) had against him. The defendant got greatly excited, and accused witness of several dishonest transactions. The defendant said that witness had claimed for two of his horses before the War Losses Commission. Witness said, "If I am so dishonest, why don't you bring me up?" and the defendant said that only for his parents he would have put him in gaol. The people then congregated, and the defendant, addressing them as "Gentlemen and friends," advised them to have as little as possible to do with the plaintiff, as he was a d—— rascal, and that he was not satisfied with robbing the public, but that he was also robbing the Government. The defendant further said that, to show those present what he (the defendant) thought of him, he refused to stand surety for him, and that he would have nothing to do with such a rogue. Witness replied that he would make him prove it in a court of law, and the defendant then said to the people that witness would bring a lot of d—— Hottentots to the court, and make them swear as he liked. Witness had suffered severe damages on account of these malicious statements, and people had said that, unless he would prove otherwise, they would sever their connection with him. In October, 1901, he entered into a sheep transaction with the defendant, who was to supply half the purchase money and take half the profits. Witness entirely financed the transaction, and bought some 2,300 sheep, of which the witness himself purchased 1,100, and the remainder was in a joint transaction. The sheep were for Mr. Haupt, but the military would not give a pass to take the sheep to the station, and they remained on his farm until December. He was removing his sheep to another farm when a Boer arrested him, and kept him six days. Subsequently, when Moolman and witness were about dividing the sheep, a Boer patrol came up and told the defendant that De la Rey had crossed the Orange River, and everything would be confiscated. Witness agreed with the defendant to remove the sheep to another farm, and on counting the sheep there, it was found that there were only 2,258 or 2,260. Witness moved to another farm, and agreed with the owner, Mr. De Witt, that the latter should pick the best of the sheep and sell them in the market for a sovereign each. Boer commandoes were all over the place, and witness got Mr. De Witt to dispose of the remainder of the sheep for £894 14s. When he bought the sheep, the average price paid was 18s. In September, 1902, he saw the defendant, and they came to a settlement. Witness told the defendant there was a loss, which was occasioned by the expenses. The price of sheep had gone down on account of the restrictions by martial law. On the afternoon of the 11th of March he did not provoke Moolman in any way. The claims for sheep and horses of the Government were made in perfect good faith.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: It was agreed with the defendant that he should come into the partnership in a previous transaction. He could not get Van Rooyen's sheep, because he was a Jingo, and he got Moolman's influence to purchase these and other sheep. He had previously purchased Lyall's sheep, and it was agreed that the defendant should make them a joint transaction. Moolman gave him power of attorney to borrow £600, but he could not produce any documents, as the Boers had destroyed everything. Witness wanted De Witt to take the whole of the sheep, but the latter would only take the good sheep. The flock bought from Lyall was every bit as good as the twelve hundred bought in the joint transaction, and De Witt bought most of the former. On the morning of the 11th March, the defendant laughed, when witness said: "I have a bone to pick with you." They had a drink, and the picking of the bone was shelved until the afternoon. When the sale was over the defendant said that witness had cheated him in the sheep transaction, but witness did not say that he would pay him back. Witness did not call the defendant a "schelm" first. When the reference was made about Hottentot witnesses, the case of White and Barnard was heard at the Supreme Court. He would give Haupt as one man who had threatened to sever his connection if witness did not disprove the allegations of the defendant.

Re-examined by Mr. Upington: The White case was the only one that he had ever had before the Supreme Court. The defendant had never withdrawn his allegations.

Carl Johannes van Zyl, attorney-at-law, notary public, and justice of the peace at Carnarvon, said that he knew both plaintiff and the defendant. Witness issued a pass to the plaintiff to purchase sheep, and in October an order was issued cancelling all passes to deal in sheep, except with the Cold Storage. Witness was auctioneer at the sale on the 1st March at Carnarvon, and remembered the defendant claiming a wagon from the estate. When the sale was over he noticed the plaintiff and the defendant approaching a group of people, and then heard the defendant in a loud voice open the conversation by some reference to the horses before the War Losses Commission. Witness then corroborated the plaintiff as to the remarks that were passed by the defendant, and added that he was almost demanding an explanation himself about the reference to the Hottentot witnesses, as he was the attorney in the case.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: He had given a faultless repetition of the declaration, and he was the plaintiff's attorney.

James de Witt, speculator, residing at Victoria West, said he was present at the auction sale, and remembered the defendant having a quarrel about a wagon. At another time he remembered the defendant asking him about the sheep. The defendant said that Barnard had only paid him fifteen shillings for the sheep, and witness said, "Then Frank Barnard has swindled you." The defendant, in the afternoon, told the plaintiff that he had fraudulently given up his (defendant's) horses to the military, and on being questioned by the plaintiff the defendant replied that only for his parents he would have put him in gaol. The defendant then warned the people against the plaintiff, and when the latter said that he would make him prove the allegations, the defendant replied, "You can take your Hottentots and make them swear just as you wish. No decent fellow will have anything to do with your case." He remembered Barnard coming to his farm with one flock in January, 1902. Witness purchased 1,225 of them, and gave the plaintiff a sovereign each for them. Of the whole number nearly half were Bastard sheep. Witness also sold the balance of the sheep for £894 18s. in April.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: Of the 1,225 sheep he bought from the plaintiff half were Bastard sheep, and he had taken all the fat sheep. At the quarrel witness only came up after it had been in progress some time. The defendant was in a great rage, and shouted loudly.

Berthold Nussbaun, partner in the firm of Haupt and Co., of Carnarvon, said that in 1901 the firm were purchasing sheep on a large scale, and were paying direct to the farmers and speculators at from seventeen to twenty shillings each. Barnard got an order to buy 2,000 sheep, but, owing to an order from the military, the order was never fulfilled. After that regulation sheep fell in value. Witness was present at the sale at Vaalputs on the 11th March, and heard the defendant accuse the plaintiff of dishonesty in connection with a sheep transaction. The defendant further said that only for the plaintiff's parents he would have had him put in gaol, and then proceeded to make the accusation about the horses, and warn the people against him. Witness understood from the remark about Hottentot witnesses that the plaintiff had bribed his witnesses to commit perjury. The firm could not do business with Barnard if the allegations were true.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: He told the plaintiff afterwards in his office that he would have to clear himself of the charges. He thought it a great pity that the plaintiff and the defendant, who were both his friends, should bring the quarrel to court.

Willem Minnaar, contractor, said he was present at the auction sale, and corroborated the evidence as to some of the words made use of by the defendant to the plaintiff.

Albert van Rossik said he remembered the defendant making the charges against the plaintiff, and at the time he identified the statements which the plaintiff's attorney had in the letter of demand.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: He remembered the plaintiff saying, "It's not me that's a 'schelm'; it's you."

Johannes van Heerden said he recollected the plaintiff arriving at his farm in January, 1902, with two lots of sheep. The price of sheep fell in March.

Peter Smeer said that when Barnard proved the claim before the Commission, the Commissioner said that the plaintiff had said that the horses were the defendant's.

Peter Jacobus de Wet, of Carnarvon, gave further corroborative evidence as to the nature of the remarks passed by the defendant to the plaintiff.

Plaintiff (recalled) said he had two herds, which he supplied from October until the beginning of January. Witness spent close on to £100 on herding. This included forage, veld hire, charges on exchange, and so on. The detailed statement produced was as accurate as possible.

Mr. Upington then closed his case.

Mr. Burton called

Wilhelm Petrus Jacobus Moolman, the defendant, who said that in 1901 he entered into a transaction to buy sheep from plaintiff. Barnard came to him and told him there was a good chance of making money on sheep. Witness went with Barnard and bought the sheep belonging to his (witness's) brother. Barnard took the sheep, saying he would look after them on his farm. Subsequently they bought other lots of sheep, witness giving promissory notes. The sheep arrived at witness's place. There were 1,040 sheep. Witness sent them to Barnard's place, where the 165 first purchased already were. Witness knew of no transaction between Lyon and Barnard. Witness had nothing to do with the 700 sheep bought from Lyon. Witness confined his dealings to the sheep with condition to be sold in eight days. The 1,205 sheep cost £951 odd. The sheep were grazing on witness's place from November, Barnard's shepherd looking after them. Witness knew nothing of the sheep bought from Lyon being on his farm. Witness sent Barnard to his (witness's) uncle for money. Barnard returned, and said witness's uncle only had £300, but that he had borrowed a further £200. Witness sent word to the sellers that the money was there for them. All were paid excepting two, who were owed £234. This amount was paid by witness afterwards. Barnard came to witness and suggested that there was a good chance of selling the sheep at Carnarvon. Witness agreed to their being taken away. Witness saw some of Lyon's sheep being taken, and questioned Barnard about it, but the latter said he was only taking these sheep to the village. In September witness saw Barnard at Van Wyk's Vlei, and asked him what had become of the sheep. Barnard said it was a matter of loss; that no profit had been made. Witness took his word. In the same month they had a reckoning up, Barnard giving witness a cheque. The settlement was on the basis that no profit had been made on the sheep. In December witness saw De Wet, and found out that the sheep had been sold at £1 per head. Barnard never gave witness an account for expenses in connection with the sheep. The witness gave evidence as to what occurred at the auction sale. There had been a dispute as to the price of a wagon, after which witness got on his cart with Visser, preparatory to leaving. Barnard made some observation, and witness got off the cart. There was a conversation, in the course of which witness used the words stated in the plea. Witness was very much enraged. Witness would have said nothing had Barnard not called him from his cart.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: Witness did not know what Barnard referred to when he asked: "What have you and your wife got against me?" Witness did not take a particular interest in the case of White and Barnard. Witness did not know whether his wife had spoken to any of the witnesses in that case, and was working against Barnard. Witness refused to stand security for him. Barnard and witness had been friends. Witness did not know that Bernard had done him any good turns during martial law; he did not know that Barnard had saved him from being arrested. Witness considered now that Barnard had not acted fairly towards him in respect to the sheep. He thought Barnard had no right to claim for the horses before the Commission. Witness did not use the words set out in the declaration. He was very angry at the time, and could not remember exactly what he said in his anger. Witness intended to convey in the words he used that Barnard had no right to bring up the horse in his claim. He did not say Barnard was a d—— scoundrel, or that he was swindling the public and Government.

Mr. Upington: I want to put this to you, Mr. Moolman; are you now charging Mr. Barnard with fraud?

Witness: As far as I know, I don't think he acted fairly with me.

In further cross-examination, witness said he received a cheque from the plaintiff on the 7th September for £27 10s., but he did not receive one for £55 then.

By the Court: The cheque for £55 was paid to him for a wagon; he remembered that now.

Witness, replying further to Mr. Upington, said Barnard, sen., told him at the door of the Commission that the horses were being brought up in his son's name.

Re-examined by Mr. Burton: Barnard had not withdrawn what he had said about witness.

Jacobus Nicholas Moolman, farmer, residing in the Carnarvon district, said that he remembered the plaintiff coming in October or November, 1901, to the defendant's farm to purchase sheep. The plaintiff said there was a good chance of making some money, but that he had not sufficient money. The plaintiff and the defendant entered into an agreement to share the profits, and they then bought 165 Cape sheep from witness. The plaintiff drove the sheep over to his own farm. Next morning plaintiff and defendant went out to purchase sheep, and returned a few days later with a good marketable flock of sheep. Witness counted over 1,000 sheep. He was present at the sale at Vaalputs on the 11th March, and was driving on with the defendant when Barnard came after them and called his brother from the cart. Barnard asked the defendant what he and his wife had against him, and the latter replied that he had found out from James de Witt that the sheep had been sold at a profit. The plaintiff called the defendant a rogue, and the latter then said, "You call me a rogue, and I will now call you a rogue." When Barnard threatened the court, the defendant said, "All right, but don't bring your Hottentot witnesses with you."

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: The plaintiff came up to his brother and dragged him by the jacket. The defendant and plaintiff walked away some distance from the crowd. His brother did not address the people standing round. He did not hear the conversation as given by the witnesses for the plaintiff.

Jan Bulman said the sheep were in two lots at Humansdorp, and he took charge of one lot. The lot under his charge were in good condition. Subsequently they were put into one lot, and he judged by the appearance of the sheep that De Witt had taken a number of Barnard's. The poor sheep remained behind in the kraal.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He told his master that the sheep had been mixed up.

Daniel Visser said he was present at the sale at Vaalputs, and remembered the plaintiff call the defendant from his cart. He heard the plaintiff say to the defendant, "You are a schelm."

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He did not hear the defendant address the people. The plaintiff did not catch the defendant by the coat.

Andries Petrus Voss said the first thing he heard was Barnard calling Moolman a "schelm." Moolman then said, "I cali you a schelm, because you did me out of the profits on the sheep." When the question of the court came up, the defendant said the plaintiff could bring his clump of Hottentots with him.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He heard the plaintiff say, "There are witnesses here," and then the defendant called the plaintiff a d—— scoundrel, and advised the people to have as little as possible to do with him. After charging him with dishonesty over the sheep and horse claims, the defendant added that only for his people he would have had the plaintiff thrown into gaol. He did not address the people, and it must have been the plaintiff he advised to have nothing to do with Mr. Barnard.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts, his Lordship summed up, and the jury returned after a short consultation with a verdict for the plaintiff for £200 damages with costs. Judgment was entered accordingly.

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

MUNRO V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT. { 1903. Sept. 2nd.

This was an action for damages arising out of a railway collision at Elsie's River Halt, on the 11th October, 1902, brought by James Henry Munro, commercial traveller, Cape Town, against the Colonial Government, from whom £1,000 was claimed. Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Upington), was for the plaintiff, and the defendants were represented by Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Howel Jones). The case had been set down for trial before a jury.

Sir H. Juta said that a settlement had been arrived at between the parties, and, in order that it should appear that it was a jury trial, they asked his lordship to allow judgment to be entered now. The parties had agreed upon judgment for the plaintiff for £350 and costs.

Mr. Schreiner said he consented to judgment being entered without empanelling a jury.

Kotze, J. (to Sir H. Juta): When you say £350 damages and costs, how about the expenses of the jury?

Sir H. Juta: That is all included.

Kotze, J.: Now comes this difficulty: How are we to know which nine of the jury are to be paid? I thought counsel might suggest a way out of the difficulty. I think perhaps we had better go through the form of calling nine jurymen.

The necessary nine were accordingly called in order that the matter of expenses should be determined, and were then discharged.

Judgment was entered for the plaintiff for £350 and costs.

IN CHAMBERS.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.].

Ex parte JENKYNS.

Mr. Alexander moved for an order for the arrest of George A. Parker, pending the production of security for an action to be instituted by the petitioner for the recovery of £200 on a promissory note. The petitioner had reason to believe that he would shortly be leaving Cape Town to proceed to England.

Order granted as prayed, the respondent to be set at liberty on giving security to the amount of £250, action to be brought by petitioner forthwith.

Ex parte MULLER AND OTHERS.

Mr. McGregor moved for an order confirming the sale of certain property. It appeared that the petitioners were interested in the estate of the late Cornelius Johannes Andries Muller, who had left a piece of perpetual quitrent land called Buffelsfontein, in the division of Mossel Bay. The land consisted of about 330 morgen, and for Divisional Council purposes was valued at £400. There were a considerable number of heirs interested, and, in view of the cost of giving transfer to the various beneficiaries and the small extent of the ground, it had been thought best that the ground should be sold by public auction and the proceeds distributed to the parties. The land had been offered by public auction, and had been sold, subject to the confirmation of the Court, for £507. Petitioners now prayed for an order authorising the executor dative to pass transfer to the purchasers and administer the proceeds of the sale and distribute the same to the heirs.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte MOODIE.

Mr. McGregor moved for leave to sell certain property in the estate of the late Cornelius Johannes Andries Muller. It appeared that the petitioner was the executor dative of the estate mentioned in the previous application, and that it had been found that the estate also comprised a fourth share in the remainder of the land Buffelsfontein, about 38 morgen. The application was made on the ground of the very large expense which would be involved in transferring a small piece of land to a very large number of heirs.

Order granted as prayed, subject to the consent of the heirs being obtained.

STRYDOM V. THE MASTER.

Mr. Gardiner moved for an order directing the Master to issue a certificate in terms of section 1 of Act 12 of 1856. The petition stated that he was the surviving spouse, and that he was married in community. There were surviving three major children and one minor. In June last petitioner, having arranged to contract a second marriage, proceeded to Oudtshoorn, but on the day before the marriage was to take place he was informed by telegraph by his agent that the Master refused to grant a certificate until the landed property of the joint estate bequeathed to the minor children had been secured against wrongful alienation. As a consequence, the marriage had been postponed from time to time, and could not yet take place. Several objections had been raised by the Registrar with regard to the deeds in the estate.

The Acting Master presented the following report: "In view of the facts set forth in the application, I beg to submit that your lordships may be pleased to grant an order authorising the Master to issue the certificate applied for, provided the applicant has a record made in the Deeds Office of the minors' vested interests in the landed property, specially bequeathed; such record to be completed forthwith in regard to the landed property already transferred to him, the said applicant in the meantime to give an undertaking to have such record made on the three title deeds by the Surveyor-General, and also in regard to such landed property which has still to be transferred to him."

[De Villiers, C.J.: It seems very hard on the man that he should be delayed in this fashion.]

The Acting Master said that he had not caused the delay; the matter lay rather with the Registrar.

[De Villiers, C.J.: However, it seems that between the Master and the Registrar, he cannot get married.]

Order granted in terms of the Master's report.

Ex parte STUART.

Mr. McGregor moved for an order removing one Francis Gerhard Myburgh from executorship of the estate of the late Gerhard Myburgh and his spouse, Atella Myburgh. The petitioner stated that the said Francis Gerhard Myburgh left Cape Town in July, 1902, for the Orange River Colony, and that some little time afterwards, a letter was received from him in Natal, in which he said that he contemplated going into the territory known as Zululand, and that his movements were uncertain, but that he would telegraph when he was returning. Since then, nothing had been heard of or from the said Francis Gerhard Myburgh. The estate of which he was executor consisted of property of considerable value, farms in the Orange River Colony and landed property requiring constant attention. The estates were threatened with an action at law in respect to boundaries, and there was no one to represent the said estates. Petitioner prayed for an order for the removal of the said Francis Gerhard Myburgh from the post of executor, and to authorise the Master to appoint Frederick St. Martin Myburgh and Lewis Arthur Myburgh, together with the South African Association of Cape Town, as executors of the estate, or otherwise grant an order directing the Master of the Court to call a meeting of next-of-kin, and of the creditors, at which an executor could be appointed. Petitioner also applied for the removal of the name of Francis Gerhard Myburgh as trustee, under a notarial deed, and the substitution of others.

Order granted, removing Francis Gerhard Myburgh from the post of executor testamentary, and directing the Master to call a meeting for the appointment of an executor dative, Gerhard Myburgh to be appointed trustee in the room of Francis Gerhard Myburgh.

REX v. CERTAIN NATIVES. { 1903. Sept. 3rd.

Vagrancy Act, 1879—Native location.

Squatters trespassing upon land set apart as a native location cannot be convicted of a contravention of the 9th section of the Vagrancy Act of 1879, until after, having been directed by order of the Resident Magistrate, to remove from the land, they have disobeyed such order.

De Villiers, C.J.: A case came before me in which certain natives were charged before the Special Justice of the Peace at Vosburg with residing in the Municipal Location without the necessary permission of the Municipal authorities. I requested the Special Justice to mention this Municipal regulation, and the exact terms, and the answer is, "I erroneously stated the Municipal regulations. It should have been Vagrancy, section 9, Act 23 of 1879," and referring to that section, I find that it provides that all squatters trespassing upon native locations may be directed to remove therefrom, and that it is only in case they disobey such order that they can be dealt with and punished under the Act. In the present case they were never directed to remove from the land, but only because they lived there, they are charged under the section. The Special Justice of the Peace was therefore clearly wrong. There ought, first, to have been an order for their removal, and upon their disobeying that order, they could have been charged. The conviction must therefore be quashed.

Application granted and oath administered.

APPEALS.

HENDERSON AND ANOTHER v. HANEKOM. { 1903. Sept. 4th. „ 11th

Assignment of lease — Mineral lease—Agricultural lease.

The defendant, being the owner of a farm, entered into a contract with L., giving him the sole and exclusive right to prospect for and win minerals and precious stones for a period of five years, with a right of renewing the contract for eighteen further periods of five years. L. assigned all his right, title and interest in the contract to the plaintiffs, who gave notice of such assignment to the defendant.

Held, on appeal from the High Court of Griqualand, that L. could legally transfer his rights to the plaintiffs, so as to give them a right of action against the defendant.

De Vries v. Alexander (Foord's Rep. 43) distinguished.

This was an appeal from a judgment given by the High Court of Griqualand in an action brought by John Crosbie Aitken Henderson and the G.K. Syndicate, Ltd., against Jurgens Johannes Hanekom, for a declaration of rights in a certain contract entered into between the defendant and one John Joseph O'Leary, who had ceded his rights to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs to the action prayed for: (1) A declaration that the said contract has been duly transferred to, and is now vested in them, and that they are entitled thereto, and to exercise all the rights, powers, and privileges thereby granted, but subject as in condition 2 thereby provided; (2) an order that the defendant do duly abide by and carry out such contract; (3) general relief; (4) costs. On the trial coming on before the Judge-President of the High Court of Griqualand (Mr. Justice Laurence), an exception was taken that the declaration disclosed no good cause of action against the defendant, and that the plaintiffs were not the proper persons to sue in this action as appeared from the contract annexed. The exception was allowed with costs, the Judge-President stating that, "in view of the nature and terms of the contract, in the absence of any allegation of the defendant's consent to the alleged cession, the declaration fails to disclose a good cause of action."

The declaration was in the following terms;

1. The first plaintiff is a director of companies living in London. The remaining plaintiffs are a company with limited liability duly registered in the Transvaal Colony and having its head office at Johannesburg.

The defendant is a farmer living at the farm Stilverlaat in the district of Hay in this colony.

2. On or about the 23rd day of October, 1896, the defendant, who was the then registered owner of the said farm, entered into a contract (hereinafter called "the said contract") with one John Joseph O'Leary.

3. By the said contract it is (inter alia) provided that the said John Joseph O'Leary should have the right for five years from the 23rd October, 1896, to prospect, dig, quarry, and explore for, work, win, take out, and carry away, and for his own account to sell or dispose of, all minerals, metals, and precious stones of whatsoever kind or nature in or under the said farm upon the conditions therein contained.

The plaintiffs refer particularly to condition numbered 2 in the said contract, which is as follows:

"2. That after the expiration of the said period of five years, the said John Joseph O'Leary shall have the right to renew this contract for eighteen further periods of five years, each upon the same terms and conditions and subject to the same rentals as are herein contained, upon giving notice to the said Jurgens Johannes Hanekom, his heirs, executors, or assigns, of his intention so to renew this lease at any time before the expiration of the then current period of five years."

4. On or about the 30th day of October, 1896, the said John Joseph O'Leary, as he was entitled to do, by an instrument in writing duly ceded, assigned, transferred, and made over to the first plaintiff, and one Leopold Kessler all his—the said John Joseph O'Leary's—right, title, interest, property, claim and demand in and under the said contract.

5. On or about the 20th day of August, 1898, the said Leopold Kessler, as he was entitled to do, duly ceded to the remaining plaintiffs, other than the first, viz., to the said G.K. Syndicate, Ltd., all his right, title, and interest in, to, and under the said contract.

6. Notice that the said contract had been duly assigned to and vested in the plaintiffs was duly given to the defendant.

7. Prior to the expiration on the 22nd day of October, 1901, of the first quinquennial period under the said contract, the plaintiffs, as they were entitled to do under the said second condition thereof, gave notice to the defendant of their intention to renew the same for a second period of five years.

8. At the date of such notice, the defendant still was, and to the present time has continued to be, the duly registered owner of the said farm.

9. The said second period of five years under the said contract is still current, all rent due under the said contract has been duly tendered or paid in terms thereof, and the same is still in full force and effect, and has been duly transferred to the plaintiffs in the manner hereinbefore set forth, and they are the proper parties to sue in this action.

10. The defendant, though frequently requested by the plaintiffs to allow them to exercise the rights granted by him under the said contract, refuses to carry out the said contract and allow them to do so, and alleges that the same was not transferable, and that the plaintiffs are not entitled thereto.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Benjamin), was for the appellants; and Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Buchanan), was for the respondent.

Mr. Schreiner, in opening, stated that this action raised a point which had never been specifically decided in this court, and that was as to whether the contract in dispute was a right in personam or a right in rem.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for the appellants): in the case of Wright and Co. v Colonial Government (8, Juta, 267), there was a large number of concessionaires, but that case is not exactly in point. The question here is, would O'Leary's executors have a right to come in in case he did not attain the age of 96? I submit that if this contract is held to be a lease, the common law has been modified by certain Placaats. Sande on Restraints (chap. 9), in which he treats of what actions may be ceded, and what may not, shows that the tendency of legislation is to change rights in rem into rights in personam. If O'Leary's rights were not purely personal, they would devolve on his successor. Ever since 1880 we have admitted this Placaat of 1580 (see Groot Placaat Book, p. 2,550). The point has been raised, what is the exact nature of a mining lease? We may assume that this lease in question is an ordinary lease of land. But can a lease of minerals be regarded as a lease of land? I should say it cannot. The case of De Vries v. Alexander (Foord. 43) is clearly distinguishable from this case. The placaat was not dealing with mining leases, but with farm leases. The case of De Vries v. Alexander has never been extended. The case of Green v. Griffiths (4, Juta, 346) does not apply to the present case. See also Parkin v. Lippert and Parkin (12, S.C.R., 179). Were it not for the placaat urban and rural tenements would stand on exactly the same footing, as they do in common law, and hence should the Court hold that these mining leases are sui generis, it will put them on a common law footing.

[Maasdorp, J.: But may not O'Leary's liability have come to an end?]

No; the creditors could come on the executors, and might even go so far as to attach the lease, which is very valuable. O'Leary was a man of means, but it does not follow that he could put a man of straw in his place. See Van der Byl and Co. v. Findlay and Another (9, Juta, 178). The Court below relies very strongly on Coronel and Others v. Ward and Wessels (1, Sheil, 159), and Imroth v. Ward (8, Juta, 257). There there was a question of a prospecting licence, but that is not our case; our lease is not a prospecting lease, but a mining lease. His lordship in the Court below seems to have confused a sub-lease with an assignment. On the lease of mines see Hunter's Scots' Law (Vol. 1, p. 247; 4th Edit.).

[De Villiers, C.J.: The question is whether the rights which might apply to a prospecting licence would also apply to a mining licence.]

The whole contract as to erecting machinery, etc., shows that delectus personae has nothing to do with this case, because so many persons are interested: See Rankin on delectus (p. 172; Library Edition). Our law very closely resembles the Scots' law, and according to that, if a right be granted for 19 or 21 years, there is nothing to show that it cannot be assigned. See also the recent Transvaal case of Liebenberg (Tr., Rep., 1902, p. 65). In England such a case would be regarded as a question of licence. Bainbridge on Mines

(p 280), and Campbell v. Wardlaw (8, Ap. C., 641). Also, as to mineral leases, McSwinney's Law of Mines (p. 183), and Green's Roman Law (p. 143). This mining right is a right in rem, and if I wish to debar a man from assigning his rights I must express that in my contract with him.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (for respondent): If there ever was a case in which delectus personæ came in, surely this is one. Here is a farmer carrying on his operations, and allowing a man to come on his land and prospect; there would have been constant friction between these men unless there had been delectus personæ. In most contracts delectus personæ occurs to a greater or less extent; for instance, in a building contract, for that is a personal contract.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If the work is done what does it matter who does it?] There is as much difference between one builder and another as between one gardener and another. Then, how can a contract be assignable which gives sole and exclusive rights? See Imroth v. Ward (8, Juta, 257). In that case the Court attached a certain meaning to the words "sole and exclusive right." Now, if a persona grata obtains certain rights and then hands them over to a company what becomes of the delectus personae. Then, again, whenever they speak of Hanikom they speak of "his heirs, executors, and assigns," showing that the arrangement entered into with him was intended to be lasting and permanent.

[Kotzé, J.: What about the executors?]

I would say that under this contract the executors have no rights. Then under section 14 the right to water refers the question as to how much water may be necessary to the personal opinion of O'Leary. Section 16 gives him a personal servitude, viz., to graze horses on the farm. Section 17 gives him another personal servitude of right of way. This case is not so much a question of law as of the terms of the written contract of lease. On that we take our stand, and it is not necessary to go beyond it. Surely the language of a written contract must mean something. In the Transvaal it has been held that a mining licence is not a lease; but, if this is a lease, it cannot be assigned, since, being a place for urban purposes, it is a lease of an urban tenement. Swarts v. Landmark (2, Juta, 5). This right is either a lease or a personal right. There is no question of any praedial servitude, so I do not see what the placaaten have to do with the matter.

Mr. Schreiner (in reply): As to the assignment of contracts, see Leake on Contracts (p. 998, 3rd Edit.). We are not considering a question of obligations, but of rights. As to the assignment of rights, see Uitenhage Municipality v. Colonial Government (9, Juta, 375). Common law gives us the right to assign, and there is nothing to show that this right has been in any way restricted. As to the water, there is nothing to show that, provided Hanikom got as much as he wanted, he cared who got the rest.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (September 11th).

De Villiers, C. J.: This is an appeal against a decision of the High Court of Griqualand to the effect that the plaintiffs, to whom one O'Leary ceded his rights under a certain contract between him and the defendant, had acquired no right of action by virtue of such cession. The contract provided that O'Leary should have the sole and exclusive right, during a period of five years, to prospect, dig, quarry, and explore for, work, win, take out, and carry away and dispose of all minerals, metals, and precious stones found in or under the farm Stilverlaat, the property of the defendant. The consideration for the rights thus granted was the payment by O'Leary to the defendant, his heirs, executors, or assigns, of £75 per annum, payable in advance. A right was given to O'Leary, after the expiration of the period of five years, to renew the contract for 18 further periods of five years "upon the same terms and subject to the same rentals," as are stated in the contract, upon giving notion of O'Leary's intention, "so to renew this lease." A right was further given to O'Leary to erect buildings and machinery, and to use water not required for farming purposes, but the defendant, his heirs, and executors, and assigns were to retain in their entirety the surface and agricultural rights of the farm.

The general rule of our law undoubtedly is that rights under a contract can be validly ceded, and the only question to be determined is whether a contract such as the one now under consideration forms an exception to the general rule. The position taken on behalf of the defendant is that the contract is one of locatio-conductio, but that the lease is of such a nature that the lessee could neither sublet nor assign his rights thereunder. Under the Roman law there would have been no doubt whatever as to his right to sublet what he had himself hired from the defendant. The rule stated in the Code (4, 65, 6) that, in the absence of any special agreement, no one is prohibited from letting to another a thing which he has himself hired, has always been accepted as an authoritative statement of the law on the point. Groenewegen, in his note in the passage, merely refers the reader to Grotius (3, 19, 10), who adopts the rule as part of the law of the Netherlands, but adds that it does not hold good with respect to the letting of work, and labour, nor in regard to houses in municipalities whose bye-laws prohibit such sub-letting without the consent of tht owner. In the case of De Vries v. Alexander (Foord's Rep., p. 43), this Court had occasion fully to consider the question whether a further exception had been introduced into the Dutch law in the case of agricultural leases, and the question was answered in the affirmative on the authority of Voet and other writers. Two further exceptions are mentioned by Voet (19, 2, 5), namely, where the condition in life of the proposed sub-lessee was such as to justify a reasonable apprehension that he would injure the thing let by applying it to different purposes from those to which the original lessee would have applied it, and where, in the case of buildings, the lessor is prepared, on receiving notice of the intended sub-lease, to retain the thing and pay the same rent as the sub-lessee had undertaken to pay. In regard to the first of these exceptions it does not appear to be in any way unreasonable, but the point does not arise for decision in the present case, because there is no allegation in the pleadings that the plaintiffs are in any way likely to prove undesirable tenants. In regard to the second of these exceptions the right claimed by the lessor bore some analogy to the right of retraction enjoyed by a debtor, in case of the cession of the debt, to discharge himself by paying to the cessionary the amount which the latter had himself paid for it. This right has been held in the case of Seavill v. Colley (9 Juta, 39) no longer to exist in this colony, and the reasons for holding that the one rule had been abrogated, would be equally potent in favour of the abrogation of the other. However anxious the Court may be to maintain the Roman-Dutch law in all its integrity, there must, in the ordinary course, be a progressive development of the law keeping pace with modern requirements. In no department of law has this development been more marked than in the practice relating to leases, especially of mineral rights. Whilst under the Dutch practice assignments were almost unknown, such assignments are now more usual than sub-leases, especially where the leases are taken over by joint stock companies. It would be impossible to apply in all their strictness the ancient rules regulating the sub-letting of property to modern assignments of leases, and it would certainly be a startling doctrine to hold at the present day that, where a lessee under an assignable lease transfers his rights to a company against which no valid objection exists the lessor might claim that the assignment shall be made to himself instead. The Court has been referred to an able and interesting judgment of Wessels, J., in the case of Rolfes v. Zwcigenhaft (Transvaal Supreme Court), in support of the view that there was a tendency in the Dutch law against the sub-letting of either praedia rustica or praedia urbana, unless the owner approved of the sub-lessee. This view, however, seems to be somewhat inconsistent with the judgment of the former High Court of the Transvaal, which held that the tendency was in favour of sub-letting, and decided that, even in the case of praedia rustica, there was a right to sub-let or assign (Eckard v. Nolte). The only authorities relied upon in support of the alleged tendency against subletting are passages in which it is stated that the owner could take over the lease himself if he did not approve of the sub-lessee, but an exception of this nature, even if it were generally admitted, hardly seems to establish such a tendency as would now justify the Court in holding that a lease other than an agricultural lease cannot be assigned without the consent of the lessor. The question, moreover, in the recent Transvaal case was not whether the lessee could assign, but whether, having assigned, he remained liable for the rent to the lessor. This question was decided in the affirmative, and it is impossible to ignore the cogency of the reasoning in favour of the decision. I am not sure, however, that the judgment attached sufficient weight to the change in form of modern leases from those which were in use under the Dutch law, or to the difference between ancient sub-leases and modern assignments. The judgment appears to confine the doctrine that a lessee's obligations cannot be assigned without the consent of the lessor to the case of short leases, but if the reasoning is correct, it ought equally, if not a fortiori, to apply to long leases. As pointed out by Voet (19, 2, 1), the juridical nature of the right created by the contract cannot depend upon the length of time during which the right is to subsist. It is true that in the case of long leases registration is required, but this requirement was introduced for the protection of the lessor's creditors and of intending purchasers of the land, and not on account of any inherent difference between long and short leases. In the case of Parkin v. Lippert (12 Juta, 179), this Court considered the question whether the insolvency of a lessee terminates the lease, if before the date of sequestration there had been a complete assignment of the lease; but my remarks on the point were merely dicta, seeing that it was found that the lessee had sublet the land, and not assigned the lease. The dicta in that case, as well as in De Pass v. Colonial Government (4 Juta, 383), certainly went very far in upholding the complete alienability of leasehold property, whether the lease be of long or of short duration, but it is an entire mistake to suppose that, in the opinion of the Court, a lessee might escape liability for the rent by transferring his rights to a pauper. There is nothing in either judgment to support the view that the lessor is bound to accept an assignee to whom reasonable objections exist. It is only in case of his raising no valid objection to the proposed assignee that he could, in any case, be held bound by a transfer of the lessee's obligations to the assignee. In my humble judgment, however, the length of the lease can have no bearing on the question whether or not a complete delegation has been effected.

In the present case the lease is for five years, but the lessee has the right of renewing the contract for eighteen further periods of five years. At the option, therefore, of the lessee, the lease might continue for ninety-five years. This circumstance certainly affords an argument in favour of the view that the benefit of the lease was not intended to be confined to O'Leary personally. On the other hand, the mention of the heirs, executors, and assigns of the lessor, and not of the lessee, affords an argument in favour of the opposite view. These arguments certainly counterbalance each other, and the case must be decided without reference to them. The decisions of the learned judge in the Court below was mainly founded upon a judgment of this Court in Coronel v. Ward and Wessels (1 Sheil, 157), where it was held that the cessionary of certain prospecting rights leased to a prospector and his assigns acquired a right of action against the lessor. The fact that assigns were mentioned was regarded as conclusive in favour of the assignability of the contract, and it was, therefore, unnecessary to inquire what the rights of the cessionary would have been if the contract had been silent as to assigns. It is to be regretted that the judgment was so brief or that it was too briefly reported, for, as it stands, it is somewhat misleading. A careful reading of it, however, satisfies me that it was not intended to decide that if assigns had not been mentioned the contract would not have been assignable. The second case relied upon by the learned judge is that of Imroth v. Ward (8 S.C., 257), where a remark was made by myself during the argument that it would make a material difference to the lessor whether one person only prospected or whether a large number of sub-concessionaries came upon the ground. The rights of the lessor, however, were not in question, and the remark was made in reference to counsel's argument that the owner could not complain of their coming on the ground. The lessee in that case had ceded a fourth of his rights to the plaintiff on condition that he (the lessee) should develop and work the mine at his own expense, and it was held that the plaintiff, who derived all his rights from the lessee, had no authority, in the face of the condition, to go upon the farm and prospect for himself. The rights of the owner were left untouched by the decision, and the remark which fell from the bench for the purpose of testing the soundness of counsel's argument, was certainly not intended to decide a question not then before the Court.

For the reasons which I have already stated, I am of opinion that the rights of O'Leary under the contract now in question could be legally ceded to the plaintiffs. The land, it is true, was a praedium rusticum, but there was no letting of the land for agricultural or pastoral purposes, and it is not alleged that there exists any reasonable apprehension of the plaintiffs abusing the rights ceded to them. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed, with costs in this Court, and the exception must be overruled, with costs in the Court below.

My brother Maasdorp concurs with this judgment.

Kotzé, J.: The point we are called upon to decide is whether an exception taken in the Court below, that the declaration discloses no cause of action, was rightly upheld. The plaintiffs, as cessionaries of what may be called a mining lease, a species of contract which since the discovery of minerals in South Africa has become one of daily practice, instituted an action for the purpose of having it declared by the High Court at Kimberley that they are entitled to the rights conferred by that contract upon one O'Leary, from whom they have obtained a cession of those rights. The lease was granted by Hanekom, as owner of the farm Stilverlaat, to O'Leary, on 23rd October, 1896, for a period of five years, and after the expiration of the said period of five years O'Leary shall have the right to renew this contract for eighteen further periods of five years each, "upon the same terms and conditions, and subject to the same rentals as are herein contained, upon giving notice to the said Johannes Hanekom, his heirs, executors, and assigns, of his intention so to renew this lease at any time before the expiration of the then current period of five years." The contract gives O'Leary the right to prospect, dig, quarry, work, win, and for his own account sell or dispose of all minerals and precious stones, of whatever kind or nature, found in or under the farm Stilverlaat. The case, therefore, raises an important and interesting question as to the lessee's right to cede or assign such a mining lease. There can be no doubt as to the rule of the Roman-Dutch law on the subject, which is correctly stated by the learned Judge-President in the following words: "Speaking generally, whatever may be the case as to contractual liabilities, under our law contractual rights are capable of assignment or cession, unless there is something either in the nature of the contract, or in the terms of the agreement, excluding or negativing such capability." The only further qualification in the case of a cession of a lease is that mentioned by Voet (19, 2, 5), viz., where it can be shown that the cessionary or the sub-lessee is an undesirable person, or where the subject leased is applied to an improper or unsuitable purpose (cf. Cens. For., 4, 22, 9). But there is nothing of this kind alleged in the present instance.

Now, I agree with Mr. Schreiner's argument that the Placaat of 1658 has no bearing on this case, which is not governed by the decision in De Vries v. Alexander (Foord's Rep., p. 43). A Statute, dealing with certain local abuses in the provinces of Holland and West Friesland with regard to agricultural rights and holdings, cannot, in my opinion, be extended to a mining lease or contract, such as that now under consideration. As the general rule of our law recognises the lessee's right to assign or cede his contract, it lies on those who dispute that right to show that, from the nature of the contract given to O'Leary, or any of its terms, the conclusion can fairly be drawn that it is a purely personal and non-assignable contract. It certainly is somewhat noticeable that, while the document of lease always speaks of the lessor and owner, "his heirs, executors, and assigns," these words are not employed in connection with the mention of the name of O'Leary. From this, however, it does not follow, as the learned Judge below seems to have thought, that the rights of O'Leary are purely personal. Sir Henry Juta urged with much force that the maxim "expressio unius est exclusio alterius" governs here, but that maxim, it has been well observed, is not of universal application. The mention of one thing does not necessarily exclude another which is not expressed. We are, therefore, brought back to the original position, what does the contract say? Against the circumstance that the words "his heirs, executors, and assigns," are not coupled with the name of O'Leary, we have the fact that the term of the contract is for 95 years in all. Such a lease in longum tempus certainly raises at least an equally strong presumption against the view that the contract is a purely personal one, so far as O'Leary is concerned. But, then, it is said that the lessor must be taken to have intended O'Leary only to enjoy the benefits of the contract, for the "sole and exclusive right" is given to him. These words appear to me to have been inserted for the protection and benefit of O'Leary, and do not indicate that the lessor intended to reserve a delectus personae to himself. It was contended at the Bar that by our law a person has such a choice or selection in many contracts, and the illustration of a building contract was put, which, it was argued, the builder or contractor cannot make over to another without the consent of the building owner. But this is not so. As usual, we find that the point has not escaped the notice and industry of Voet, who says that the builder may substitute another in his place to perform the work which he had undertaken, except where by the terms of the contract, or from the nature of the case the contrary appears; as, for instance, where one has ordered a painting to be done by a particular artist. Voet adds that, although the builder may so assign his contract, he still continues liable to the building owner for the due and proper performance of work (19, 2, 34,; cf. Cens. For., 4, 22, 9). The question of a delectus personae does not arise in the present case.

The Court below relied on two decisions of this Court. The first is that of Coronel v. Ward and Wessels (1 Sheil, 157), where it was held that because in the particular contract then under consideration, the "assigns" of Ward were mentioned, he was entitled to cede his rights. From this the inference was drawn by the learned Judge-President that the absence of the word "assigns" in the present agreement shows that the contract is not assignable. But as I have already observed, the one does not follow from the other. Coupled with other circumstances, the absence of the word assigns may have a material bearing on the question of assignability or non-assignability. Its mere absence, however, in a written contract does not per se amount to much, and is not sufficient to take the case out of the general rule. The other case referred to is that of Imroth v. Ward (8, S.C., 257), where during the argument the Chief Justice remarked that it would make a very material difference to the lessor whether one person only prospected or whether a large number of sub-concessionaries came upon the land. Now the Chief Justice has himself during the argument in the present instance answered that by observing that an expression of that kind does not form any part of the judgment or decision, and is often merely made for the purpose of testing the soundness of counsel's contention or the view occurring at the moment to the Judge. It is quite true that in Imroth v. Ward this Court held that under the terms of the agreement Ward alone, and not Imroth, was entitled to do the prospecting, and other work required, but that was because of a special agreement between them to that effect, and Wessels, the lessor, was not before the Court. These decisions, therefore, do not affect the point. It has not been shown to my satisfaction that O'Leary cannot assign this contract, and I may add that mining agreements or leases, of the kind with which we are now dealing, have been held by the former High Court of the Transvaal Republic to be assignable. If O'Leary then can assign his rights, it follows that the right of renewal is not personal, but, likewise, passes to the cessionary. It was so held in Paterson's Executors v. Webster, Steel and Co. (1, Juta), although the Chief Justice was careful to add that by the cession, the original lessees did not escape responsibility for the performance of the covenants in the lease. In the same way when I say that a contract, like the one under discussion, can be assigned, I do not wish it to be understood that such assignment, where there is no proof of any consent by the lessor to that effect, will relieve the original lessee or Cedens from his liabilities under the contract. I do not think it necessary at this stage to decide the point, for the appeal, upon the soundness, or otherwise, of the exception taken in the High Court at Kimberley, can be readily disposed of without entering upon that. I am of opinion that the declaration does disclose a cause of action, and that the exception is untenable. The appeal should, therefore, be allowed, and the judgment below reversed, with costs.

[Appellant's Attorneys: Syfret, Godlonton and Low; Respondent's Attorney: H. Sonnenberg.]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte SELTZER.

Mr. Buchanan asked leave to mention this matter as one of urgency. The petitioner applied on behalf of his minor daughter, Annie Seltzer, for a writ of arrest against the respondent, one J. Kaplan, to found jurisdiction, or in the alternative for the attachment of a certain ring belonging to respondent.

The petition set forth that the petitioner was the father and natural guardian of Annie Seltzer, who was of the age of 19. In the present month respondent made a proposal of marriage to Miss Seltzer, which was accepted. He purchased and handed to her an engagement ring, valued at £32 10s., and caused the engagement to be announced in Cape Town papers. On the 3rd inst., Kaplan, after having publicly announced the engagement to his friends, summarily broke it off, and clandestinely left Cape Town, and was now on his way to the Orange River Colony. The petitioner stated that the act of the respondent had caused himself and his family great grief and sorrow, and had lowered his daughter in the estimation of her friends. Petitioner was anxious to take proceedings to recover £5,000 damages for breach of promise, and made the present application in order to found jurisdiction, Kaplan being domiciled at Jagersfontein-road, in the Orange River Colony. Respondent had left on his way to the North on the previous evening, but petitioner had been informed, and believed, that he had broken his journey, and was now at Paarl or Wellington, whence he intended to proceed by to-night's (Friday's) train to the Orange River Colony. The ring was at present in the hands of the plaintiff's attorney (Mr. David Tennant).

Maasdorp, J., asked why petitioner had not taken the course of applying to the Registrar under the eighth Rule of Court for a writ of arrest.

Mr. Buchanan said the applicant chose the present course, his object being to found jurisdiction.

Maasdorp, J., said an order would be granted in terms of the alternative prayer to attach the ring to found jurisdiction in an action to be instituted for damages for breach of promise of marriage.

STRYDOM V. MARKOTTER.

Spoliation.

This was an application to have a rule nisi granted on August 17th made absolute, ordering the respondent to restore to the plaintiff a Colonial mare, alleged to have been wrongfully taken from his possession.

The applicant's affidavit stated that on Thursday, August 6, he went to the town of Uniondale, a distance of about 30 miles, with his cart and two horses, for the purpose of taking his sick child to a doctor for treatment. The horses had been in his lawful possession for a considerable time as his sole property. On his arrival at the town of Uniondale, he obtained permission from a storekeeper—Abraham Pieter Hansen—to place the two horses in his stable reserved for customers. On Saturday, the 8th August, while the petitioner was attending to his sick child, Christoph Carl Markotter, a clerk, in the employ of John Thomas Stone, of Uniondale, proceeded to the stable, and, secretly, and without the applicant's knowledge or consent, removed one of the said horses, a Colonial mare. Markotter took the mare to another stable in the town, and he was still in possession of the animal, and refused to give up the same, although requested to do so. Markotter alleged that he lost a Colonial mare in the Protection Camp during the administration of martial law, resembling the petitioner's mare in colour and in other respects. The petitioner said that the mare was born in November, 1898, and that in or about May, 1901, he handed over the mare to the military authorities, in accordance with instructions, for the purpose of being sent away to the Protection Camp. After the cessation of hostilities and in or about August, 1902, the said animal was returned to him by the military authorities as his own legitimate property, and it had since remained in his quiet and lawful possession up to the month of August, 1903. The said mare was the bona fide property of the petitioner, and was taken possession of unlawfully by the respondent, Markotter.

The respondent, in his affidavit, denied the allegations as to the question of the ownership of one of the question of the ownership of one of the horses. In answer to the other allegations, he stated that in or about April, 1901, he handed over to the military authorities of Uniondale the identical mare in question, and that it was subsequently sent by the military authorities to the military Protection Camp; that after the cessation of hostilities the mare was claimed and taken by the petitioner in deponent's absence from the military authorities at Humansdorp as his property; that he was afterwards informed by one Le Roux, a groom in the service of his late stepfather, the Rev. H. Hough, that he had seen the mare in the possession of a man in the employ of the petitioner; that defendant had written a letter to the applicant requesting him to deliver up the said mare, and that, as applicant had taken no notice of that, deponent's agent had demanded delivery of the said mare.

Mr. McGregor for the applicant. Mr. Buchanan for the respondent.

Mr. Buchanan argued that the point to be determined by the Court was really as to the ownership of the horse.

[Kotzé, J.: Under our Roman-Dutch law you cannot take the law into your own hands in that manner. The question of that ownership is not now before the Court; it is simply a question of possession. You have no right to go and forcibly take possession of a horse that is in the possession of another man. You must give back this horse to the man, and then you can bring an action to determine the question of ownership.]

Mr. Buchanan said that his client had not taken possession of the horse in a forcible manner, but had obtained it from the applicant's agent.

[Kotzé, J.: How can a stable-keeper give consent when he has nothing to do with it?]

Mr. Buchanan said he did not seek to justify the taking, but the fact remained that the applicant had received a horse from the military that he had no right to receive.

Kotzé, J., said that the petitioner was prima facie in the lawful and peaceable possession of the animal, and how could the respondent go and forcibly dispossess him of it?

Maasdorp, J.: There is no doubt that the respondent in this case committed an act of spoliation in removing the horse from the stable, where it had been placed by the applicant, in the manner in which he did remove it, and the Court will now order the defendant to deliver the horse to the applicant and pay the costs of this application.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZÉ.]

SHAW v. FOCK. { 1903. Sept. 7th.

Counsel—Agent—Reasonable disbursement.

The defendant, being charged with a criminal offence, employed a law agent to instruct Counsel for his defence. The trial lasted three days, and the defendant was acquitted. Counsel's fee for the first day was paid by the defendant. On the second day Counsel demanded a refresher fee, which was also paid by the defendant. On the third day no demand for a refresher fee was made, but the defendant admitted, that if it had been made on that day, he would have paid it. Subsequently Counsel demanded the fee for the third day from the plaintiff, who paid it.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount from the defendant in the absence of any proof that the fee was unusual or exorbitant.

This was an action brought by William B. Shaw, law agent, Cape Town, against Joseph Fock, valuator and auctioneer, Mowbray, to recover twenty guineas, moneys disbursed to counsel at the special instance and request of the defendant.

The declaration set out that at the Criminal Sessions of this Court in February last, the plaintiff was employed by the defendant to engage counsel to defend him on a charge of forgery, and uttering forged instruments, knowing the same to have been forged, under the Liquor Licensing Act. Plaintiff engaged counsel accordingly for the purposes of the said defence, and the defendant objected to pay the fees for which plaintiff had become responsible to counsel. Plaintiff had paid to counsel his fees in connection with the matter, and the defendant had only paid part of such charges, and there still remained due and owing to the plaintiff £21, which the defendant refused to pay.

The defendant, in his plea, admitted paragraph 1 as to the parties. As to paragraph 2, he admitted that he employed the plaintiff in connection with the defence, but he specially denied that he employed plaintiff to engage counsel, and stated that he himself engaged counsel and paid the fees. He denied that he (plaintiff) became responsible to counsel for the fees in connection with the said defence, or that the defendant undertook to pay the said fees to counsel. As to paragraph 4, he admitted that he was defended by counsel at the hearing, but he denied the other allegations, and said that counsel had been paid his fees in connection with the said defence by him. He knew nothing about the said charge of £21, and he admitted that he refused to pay the said amount, and said that there was nothing further due from him to the plaintiff.

Upon the foregoing pleadings issue was joined.

Mr. Burton for plaintiff. Mr. Upington for defendant.

Sir Henry Hubert Juta, called by Mr. Burton, said that Fock came to his chambers, and said he was going to be tried, and he asked witness whether he would be able to defend him. Witness replied that he thought so, and informed the defendant that he must get an attorney or a law agent. Witness believed that Fock replied that he would, and that Mr. Shaw had acted for him. Witness said: "You must go and get an agent or an attorney to instruct me." Thereupon Mr. Shaw came. He first came alone, and witness took his instructions from him. When he got his brief from Mr. Shaw, he made certain notes. Subsequently he had a consultation with Mr. Shaw and the defendant. Mr. Shaw made notes at the time of the different points that witness wanted in evidence. He told Mr. Shaw what his fee would be for going into court, and that if the case went beyond one day he should want refreshers. His recollection was that when Mr. Shaw came to see him about the brief he came alone. His fee was 100 guineas for the trial. The case ran beyond one day into the Civil Term, and he told Mr. Shaw's clerk that he should want a refresher for the second day, and he received 50 guineas. Then the case went on to a third day, and he informed Mr. Shaw's clerk that he should want a further refresher of 20 guineas. The fee and the first refresher were paid to him by cheque at the time. He sent a memo. to Mr. Shaw on the 20th April in the following terms: "You will oblige me by sending fee (£21) due before next term begins." The fee was paid to him by Mr. Shaw.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He did not remember whether the first cheque was signed by Mr. Fock. He arranged for the refresher of 50 guineas with whomsoever was acting on Mr. Shaw's behalf. He fixed the amount of the second refresher on the third day of trial. He informed Mr. Shaw or the person who was acting for him. The fees were not marked on the brief, he believed; he told Mr. Shaw what the amount was to be.

The plaintiff, William B. Shaw, law agent, Cape Town, said he had frequently instructed counsel in criminal cases. He appeared for Fock in the proceedings in the Magistrate's Court. When they found that defendant was to be indicted by the Attorney-General, witness asked him who was going to defend him. Fock said Sir Henry Juta, and he went to see Sir Henry, and afterwards came and told witness that counsel would like to see him. Sir Henry Juta said that his terms would be 100 guineas, with the usual refreshers. Witness saw Sir Henry, in company with the defendant. Before the case came on on the first day, witness asked defendant if he would make out a cheque for 100 guineas. Defendant produced a cheque for 100 guineas, and witness handed this over to Sir Henry. The second cheque was handed to Sir Henry Juta on the morning of the second day of trial. On the third day witness told Fock that he would have to pay a second refresher. Fock said he thought Sir Henry Juta had had enough. Witness had his first notification of a further charge of 20 guineas at the end of term. Witness paid the amount.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He did not mention "refreshers" in one of the letters he sent to Fock, although he mentioned that the fee would be 100 guineas. The reason why he did mention "refreshers" was because defendant had been present when the fees were arranged.

Mr. Upington: Was Mr. Fock annoyed when he had to pay a further refresher?

Witness: No.

Was he pleased?—I think he was very pleased when he got off so lightly.

Further cross-examined: He received Sir Henry Juta's bill for the second refresher about the 20th March. Mr. Fock thought Sir Henry ought to forego the second refresher, and asked witness to go and see Sir Henry with regard to the matter. Witness told him that he (Shaw) would do nothing of that kind. Witness sent in his account early in March. He received a cheque from Mr. Fock for £21 for his personal services. There was nothing on witness's account to show that a further amount was due. The £21 did not include his fees in the Magistrate's Court; these had already been paid. Fock had never said that he would not pay the second refresher of 20 guineas.

Mr. Burton closed his case.

The defendant, Joseph Fock, said that in January he was charged with certain criminal offences. The case was reached on the last day of January, and it ended on February 3. When the indictment was left at the office of Mr. Shaw, the latter saw him, and told him that the indictment had been received. Witness saw Sir Henry Juta, who told him that he should get a lawyer. Mr. Shaw afterwards saw him, and asked him whether he would not allow him (the plaintiff) to act for him, as he knew the ins and outs of the case. He received a letter from Mr. Shaw, stating that the fee would be 100 guineas. He had heard nothing at all about refreshers, and he had understood that 100 guineas would cover all charges. After the first day's hearing, he received a notice to go to Sir Henry Juta's chambers, and he went over with Mr. Shaw. Sir Henry asked him some questions, and then looked at Mr. Shaw, and Mr. Shaw looked at Sir Henry. Then they asked him quietly to go out of the room, and a little time afterwards Mr. Shaw came out and told him that Sir Henry would want a refresher. He asked what that was. Mr. Shaw said Sir Henry wanted some more money, and witness replied that he thought Sir Henry ought to be satisfied. Shaw told him that Sir Henry might withdraw unless he paid a refresher, and witness handed a cheque on the morning of the second day of trial to Sir Henry. He objected to paying the amount, because Shaw was not entitled to it. He did not give authority to Shaw to disburse any money on his behalf.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: He paid for all the evidence being copied, and Mr. Shaw had nothing to do with it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But, supposing you had been told on the third day of trial that Sir Henry Juta would not continue unless you paid 20 guineas, would you not have paid it?]

Witness: Well, but I was not told that.

Mr. Burton (to witness): You were in your worst plight then.

Witness: I was in the hands of the Philistines.

Mr. Burton: You know, the Philistines in the shape of the nine men in the box had not been got rid of then, and you were in considerable danger, and were prepared to pay at that time.

Witness: Yes, and I am in danger now.

Mr. Burton: Yes, I think you are in very great danger.

Mr. Upington closed his case.

Mr. Upington (for defendant): Our case is that the plaintiff was not retained by the defendant in the usual way, so that all fees were paid over to him.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Must counsel be instructed by an agent in criminal cases?]

No, they can be instructed by the prisoner.

[Mr. Burton: Only from the dock.]

I never heard that before.

[De Villiers, C. J.: Surely Fock was willing to pay refreshers?]

He was not willing. If Mr. Shaw had told him at first that refreshers would be charged, and he had instructed Shaw to proceed, of course he would have been liable: but Mr. Shaw's letter of December 9th is quite inconsistent with that view. I do not know that counsel are entitled to charge refreshers in criminal cases. I imagine that they usually make an arrangement with the prisoner's attorney beforehand. My point, however, is that Mr. Shaw never communicated to Fock that refreshers would be charged. As to English cases, see Blythe v. Funshawe (10 Q.B., 207), where see the judgment of Baggally, L.J.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Fock paid a refresher for the second day.]

Yes, but that was under pressure. It does not follow that he was bound to pay further refreshers. If Sir H. Juta made an arrangement with Mr. Fock that very fact shows that refreshers are not customary in criminal cases, and therefore it was for Mr. Shaw to have got the defendant's sanction before incurring this charge. Shaw admits that he had no express authority to pay refreshers.

Mr. Burton (for plaintiff) was not called upon.

De Villiers, C.J.: No defence has been raised in the present case that the fees are improper; nor has any special defence been raised that the payment of a refresher in criminal cases is improper or unusual. The defence raised is that the plaintiff had no authority to pay the twenty guineas claimed to counsel. The evidence clearly shows that when the defendant first consulted counsel, counsel desired to be instructed by a lawyer, and accordingly the defendant brought the plaintiff to counsel, and from that time counsel would look not to the defendant, but to the plaintiff for his fees. The fee for the first day was paid by the defendant himself. That is true. He gave a cheque, but the payment must be considered as having been made through the lawyer employed. On the second day, before the case was heard, the defendant admits that he gave instructions for the payment of a refresher, and at all events he then had notice by reason of the demand for a refresher that the original payment of 100 guineas was not to cover the whole charges of counsel, but that for each day's trial some fee was to be paid. The defendant accordingly, fearing counsel might throw up his brief, paid the fifty guineas for the first day's refresher. For the second day's refresher there was no demand beforehand for payment, but I put the question to the defendant as to what he would have done if such a demand had been made, and he admitted he would have paid the fee, because he could not very well have allowed the case to be thrown up at that stage. Well, it is shown that at that stage he considered himself liable to pay. He said he was under pressure when he paid the first refresher, but there was no illegal duress. No demand was made for the amount of the second refresher until about a month after the trial, and then he refused to pay, because there was no authority to plaintiff to pay the fee to counsel. Now, in my opinion, seeing that the plaintiff had been employed to conduct the case, he was justified in making such payments on behalf of the defendant as were necessary for the proper conduct of the case. In the absence of any proof that the fees were unusual or exorbitant, I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the fee paid by him in good faith to counsel, and judgment must be for the plaintiff, with costs.

Kotzé J., concurred.

Judgment was entered for plaintiff for the amount claimed, with costs, to include costs of the postponement.

APPEAL CASE.

THERON v. VAN DER MERWE. { 1903. Sept. 7th.

Rei vindicatio—Value—Procedure in Magistrate's Court.

The plaintiff sued the defendant in a Magistrate's Court for delivery of a mule belonging to the plaintiff or its value.

The plaintiff proved his ownership, but omitted to prove the value. After his case had been closed, the plaintiff applied for leave to prove the value, but the Magistrate refused leave and granted absolution from the instance. On appeal, the case was remitted to the Magistrate, to be tried on its merits, with leave to the plaintiff to prove the value of the mule.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Calvinia.

Mr. M. de Villiers appeared for the appellant; the respondent was not represented.

The appellant sued in the Court of the Resident Magistrate for delivery of a certain mule, which he claimed as his property, and which was in the possession of the respondent, or for payment of £20, the value thereof. At the trial the mule stood before the door of the court, and a number of witnesses declared it belonged to the plaintiff. After the evidence for the plaintiff had been heard, the defendant's attorney asked for absolution from the instance on the ground that the value of the mule had not been proved. The Magistrate gave absolution from the instance, and from that judgment the plaintiff now appealed. The Magistrate's reasons were as follow: "The plaintiff closed his case without calling evidence as to the value of the mule. Defendant thereupon applied for absolution from the instance. This Court decided that it had no alternative but to grant the application, and that, even did it have any discretion, it would not be wise to exercise it in favour of the plaintiff, owing to the laxity of procedure. It would encourage every litigant to avail himself of the precedent on any occasion when he found he had omitted some point, or he might wish to strengthen his case. The defendant having availed himself of the plaintiff's oversight, the Court felt bound to support him. It was, I may add, with great reluctance that the Court came to this conclusion, as the case is a hard one."

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: I think it is very much to be regretted that the Magistrate did not hear the evidence for the plaintiff, even after the case had been closed. The plaintiff claimed the mule as his property, and if he proved his ownership he was entitled to have the mule. He was, therefore, not bound to prove the value of the mule, but even if he was so bound it clearly was a case in which the plaintiff should have been allowed to supply the omission after his case had been closed. This Court has the power to remit a case to the Magistrate for further evidence, even after judgment has been given, but in that case, the final judgment is given by this Court. In the present case, however, the Magistrate did not hear the witnesses for the defence, and the better course will be to remit the case to be tried on its merits. The Court will allow the appeal, with costs in this Court, and remit the case to the Resident Magistrate to be tried on its merits, with leave to the plaintiff to produce evidence as to the value of the mule.

Kotzé, J., concurred.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C. K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZÉ.]

BURGER V. SOUTH AFRICAN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE SOCIETY. { 1903. Sept. 8th., „ 12th.

Life policy — Public policy — Death in consequence of illegal acts.

B. insured his life with the defendant society, the policy providing that in case "it shall not have become void by the death of the assured by suicide, whether sane or insane, within one year of the date hereof, the said society will pay to the executors, administrators, or assigns of the assured, the sum of £200." After paying the premiums for ten years, B. went into rebellion and was killed in an engagement with the British troops.

Held, that B.'s executors were entitled to recover the amount of the policy.

This was a special case submitted to the opinion of Court. The case stated was as follows:

Plaintiff is a widow, residing in the district of Clanwilliam, and is the executrix testamentary in the estate of her late husband. The society is a duly incorporated company, carrying on business in this colony, and with its head offices in Cape Town. On or about the 3rd March, 1892, the plaintiff's husband effected a policy of insurance on his life with the said company for £200. By the terms of the said policy, the company agreed that if the annual premiums were paid in the manner aforesaid, the company would, subject to the deed of agreement, pay £200 upon the death of the assured. That was, subject to the policy not having become void by the death of the said Burger by suicide, whether sane or insane, within one year of the date thereof. The premiums of £4 12s. were paid each year. While the policy was in full force he went into rebellion against the King. On or about the 25th March, 1902, in the division of Van Rhyn's 1902, in the division of Van Rhyn's Dorp, the deceased was killed while bearing arms in an engagement between His Majesty's troops and a body consisting of British subjects, then and there in rebellion, and unlawfully resisting the said troops. The society refuse to pay the claim. The plaintiff contends that she is entitled to receive the amount of the insurance. The defendant contends that, by reason of the death of the said Burger while so fighting in the armies of the King's enemies against his Sovereign and his troops, the plaintiff is not entitled to the amount.

Mr. Burton appeared for the applicant, and Sir H. Juta, K.C., appeared for the respondent.

Mr. Burton said that the facts of the case were simple. Eleven years ago Burger, who was represented by the plaintiff, insured his life for £200 upon this policy. He had paid all the premiums up to the date of his death, and due notice had been given of his death. The only point raised now by the defendant was the fact that the assured met his death whilst he was fighting in the ranks of the King's enemies, and the contention was, that in consequence of that fact, the company were not liable to pay. Having referred to the terms of the policy, he thought that, subject to what his learned friend had to say, he should leave the matter there.

Sir H. Juta submitted that the plaintiff had no good ground of claim. No man who insured his life and then lost his life through an unlawful act, say that he was hanged for murder, could possibly claim the insurance money, and where a man went into rebellion and lost his life while fighting against his Sovereign, he could not recover the insurance money. The principle was laid down a good many years ago, in the case of the Amicable Insurance Society v. Bolland (4 Blythe's Reports, p. 194). Counsel quoted at some length from the judgment given by the Lord Chancellor, and he also referred to Porter on Insurance, Bunyon on Life Insurance, and Crawley on Life Insurance. He also quoted the case of Cleaver v. The Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association, arising out of the death of Maybrick, whose wife was convicted on a charge of causing his death. He submitted that in that case Lord Esher, Master of the Rolls, upheld the principle which had been laid down by the Lord Chancellor, Lord Lyndhurst.

Kotzé, J., put it to counsel why the innocent should suffer because of the misdeeds of the father and husband.

Sir H. Juta said that the wife and children did not suffer. Suppose, for instance, this man Burger had devised the benefits accruing under the policy to someone else?

[Kotzé, J.: But confiscation is not recognised in this colony.]

No, nor does it hold in England. It is not a question of confiscation. These are cases where it is contrary to public policy that a man who commits a crime should have the benefit of it.

Mr. Burton said that, as far as he had been able to find, the case of the Amicable Society v. Bolland was the only one in which a decision had been given in which a man who had committed a felony was not entitled to get the proceeds of a policy on his life. In this case there was no condition inserted as to suicide or dying by his own hand, or any violation of law, as had been inserted in a great many policies. There was no doubt that in the case of the Amicable Society v. Bolland the Lord Chancellor went further than had been done in other cases that he had been able to find in deciding that, without any condition in the policy, the fact that a man had committed a felony, for which he had been executed, deprived him, on the ground of public policy, of his right to the insurance money. He would submit that their lordships should not be carried beyond this particular decision, in which it was held that the assured was not entitled to receive the money because he had committed an act for which he had been executed, and their lordships would see, in looking through the reports of the case, that the argument went largely on the particular legal effects of felony in England. Counsel for the respondent based his argument upon public policy, but it should be borne in mind that public policy was a very elastic term. After quoting from Hanson on Contracts in regard to the relations of public policy and law (p. 181), Mr. Burton went on to say that it would be a most inequitable thing if this insurance company were to escape their liability upon that policy, because in the case which counsel had relied upon, there was no condition whatever laid down, whereas in the present case, the company made a reservation as to suicide within a period of twelve months from the date of the policy, so that, even if death were due to suicide, whether sane or insane, the company would be liable after the lapse of twelve months.

[De Villiers, C.J., said that, if the decision of the Lord Chancellor were upheld, it would not be very material whether the twelve months had elapsed or not if death arose from suicide, because suicide might very fairly be held to be contrary to public policy.]

Mr. Burton said that only showed how necessary it was to insist upon the dangerous character of this doctrine of public policy. He contended that it would be very much more against public policy if a contract of this kind should be set aside. He urged that the company had failed, because this was not a case in which a man had committed a felony, nor was it a case of suicide; but it was a case of a man committing a wrongful act, in the course of which it was very problematical indeed whether he might be killed or not. The question as to the direct consequence of the violation of law had been dealt with in one of the American cases—Murray v. New York Life Insurance Society—in which the Court said they must satisfy themselves that the act was the immediate and necessary and proximate cause of death. It would be carrying the point very far if it were said that the act in this case was the immediate, proximate cause of his death. This man went into rebellion, but he certainly did not go into rebellion for the purpose of terminating his life, for, no doubt, he never contemplated the question of his death at all.

Sir Henry Juta in reply.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (September 12th).

De Villiers, C.J.: The question raised by this special case is whether the defendant society, after having for ten years received the annual premiums payable under a policy of life insurance, is entitled, on the death of the assured, to repudiate its liability on the ground that such death took place while the deceased was engaged in active rebellion. It is not suggested that at the time when the deceased insured his life he contemplated rebellion, but the contention is that it would be contrary to public policy to allow his executor to recover the amount of the policy, seeing that his death was a result of his illegal conduct. The policy provides that "if the annual premiums are duly paid, and in case this policy shall not have become void by the death of the assured by suicide, whether sane or insane, within one year of the date hereof, the said society will pay to the executors, administrators, or assigns of the assured, within thirty days next after proof of death, the sum of £200." There is consequently a clear undertaking to pay that amount on the death of the assured, the sole exception being in case he should commit suicide within one year after the date of the policy. In support of the defendant society's contention that it is not liable, notwithstanding this clear understanding, the Court has been referred to Fauntleroy's case (4 Bligh, N.S., 194), where it was held by Lord Lyndhurst, in the House of Lords, reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls, that the assignees of a life policy were not entitled to recover on the death of the assured at the hands of justice. The Lord Chancellor seems to have treated the case as if a clause had actually been inserted in the policy insuring the deceased against the event of the commission of a capital felony, and he held that, as such a provision would have been void as against public policy, the assignees were not entitled to recover. It is difficult to understand why a provision which neither party to the contract could have contemplated at the time when the contract was entered into, should be treated as inserted in the contract. The judgment was delivered seventy-three years ago, and if it is still to be held binding, it would follow a fortiori that, if the deceased in the present case had met with his death by suicide, the society would have been justified in repudiating its liability, notwithstanding the provision in the policy to which I have already referred. In the more recent case of Clearer v. Mutual Reserve Association (1 Q.B.D., 1892, p. 147), it was held by the Court of Appeal in England that the executors of a person who has effected an insurance on his life for the benefit of his wife can maintain an action on the policy, notwithstanding the fact that the death of the assured was caused by the felonious act of the wife. In the course of his judgment, Lord Justice Fry approved of the principle of public policy invoked in that case, as well as in Fauntleroy's case, on the ground that "no system of jurisprudence can with reason include among the rights which it enforces rights directly resulting to the person asserting them from the crime of that person." And Lord Esher, M.R., said: "No doubt there is a rule that, if a contract be made contrary to public policy, or if the performance of a contract would be contrary to public policy, performance cannot be enforced either at law or in equity; but when people vouch that rule to excuse themselves from the performance of a contract, in respect of which they have received the full consideration, and when all that remains to be done on the contract is for them to pay the money, the application of the rule ought to be narrowly watched, and ought not to be carried a step further than the protection of the public requires." If, in the present case, the deceased had been sentenced to death, and executed for high treason, Fauntleroy's case would have been a decision in favour of the view that the defendant company is not liable, but the Court is asked to take "a step further" by extending the doctrine to the case of a person killed while in the execution of an illegal act. The step may not be a long one, but it is not one which I feel justified in taking without clear and conclusive authority in its favour. There might have been less difficulty in extending the doctrine to a case like the present if the doctrine had not been coupled with the assumption that the policy contained a clause insuring the deceased against the event of his death in an engagement with the King's troops. Such a clause would have afforded proof that tht parties to the contract contemplated the possible death of the insured while engaged in rebellion, but in the absence of such a clause, it is quite impossible to assume that either party to the contract contemplated the mode of death which actually took place. The possibility of suicide was contemplated, and it was accordingly provided that if this should be the mode of death within one year from the date of the contract, the policy should become void. If, instead of being killed in action, the deceased had committed suicide ten years after the date of the contract, there would have been good ground for invoking the principle of public feeling against the payment of the amount claimed, for there would have been some evidence that the illegal act causing his death had been contemplated. In the present case there is no evidence whatever that the deceased contemplated rebellion, or that he became a rebel with the object of thus hastening his death, and securing the amount of the policy for his representatives. Having regard to the principle that where a person seeks to excuse himself from the performance of a contract in respect of which he has received the full consideration, the rule as to public policy should not be carried further than the protection of the public requires, I a of opinion that the defendant company is not protected by the rule. The judgment of the Court will therefore be in accordance with the plaintiff's contention, with costs.

Kotzé, J.: The plaintiff, as executrix testamentary of the late Sybrand Burger, claims from the defendant society the sum of £200, due on a policy of insurance effected by the deceased upon his life in February, 1892. By clause 3 of the policy it is provided that, in case the policy should not have become void by the death of the assured by suicide within one year from the date thereof, the society would pay to the executors or assignees of the assured the said sum of £200. The society now maintains that as the assured, while in rebellion and fighting against His Majesty, was killed by the British troops in an engagement, during the month of February, 1902, his executrix is not entitled to the payment of the £200. Public policy it is said will not allow such a claim to be made. A decision of Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst, reversing that of Sir John Leach, Master of the Rolls, in The Amicable Insurance Society v. Bolland (4 Bligh., N.S., 194), was cited in support of this contention. From the report of that case, it appears that one Fauntleroy insured his life in 1815 in the Amicable Society. In 1824 he was tried and convicted of forgery, sentenced to death, and executed. The Lord Chancellor, although the policy of insurance contained no condition to that effect, construed it as if a condition had been inserted that in the event of the assured committing a capital felony, and being tried and executed for it, his assignees should receive the amount of the policy. As such a condition could not, on grounds of public policy, be recognised, the assignees in bankruptcy of Fauntleroy's estate were held not entitled to recover from the insurance company.

An obvious objection to so construing a written document is that it imports into it terms which it does not contain, and so makes a contract, which is legal upon the face of it, one contrary to law. If, however, we are to understand that all that the Lord Chancellor meant to convey was that as a matter of public policy, no man shall be allowed to benefit by his crime, the decision is at once plain and intelligible. But, even then, the decision must not be too generally applied, and must be taken to have merely decided, as the headnote to the case in 33, Revised Reports, puts it, that "a policy of life insurance is avoided if the party insured die by the hands of justice, so far as regards any claim thereunder by volunteers or by persons claiming under the bankruptcy of the insured." In a footnote to this case, at page 22, it is pointed out by the learned editor that the parties to a contract of life insurance may lawfully agree that in the event of the death of the insured by suicide, or by duelling, or by the hands of justice, the policy shall nevertheless be valid to the extent of any interest which any third person may have acquired thereunder in good faith and for valuable consideration. The subsequent cases of Life Association (1892, 1 Q.B., at p. 159) White v. The British Empire Mutual Life Assurance Co. (L.R., 7, Eq., 394), and Cleaver v. The Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association (1892, 1, Q.B., at p. 159) are referred to in support of this. The case of the Amicable Society should, therefore, not be extended to circumstances which are not clearly within its scope. I agree with the observation of Lord Esher in Cleaver's case, that the doctrine of public policy ought not to be stretched beyond what is necessary for the protection of the public. Although capital punishment may under certain circumstances be awarded in the event of a person being tried and convicted of rebellion, the deceased in the present instance was not put upon his trial for rebellion, and did not meet his death at the hands of justice. He was killed in an engagement between His Majesty's troops and the enemy, whom he had joined, and it cannot be said that he had this in contemplation like a person who commits a capital offence, and who knows that when convicted the sentence prescribed by law will in the due and ordinary course of justice follow. I am, therefore, of opinion, upon the special case submitted, that our judgment should be for the plaintiff.

STEPHAN v. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT. { 1903. Sept. 6th. „ 12th.

Succession duty—Act 5 of 1864—Devolution of property.

A testator, who was in partnership in business with the appellant, by will gave the usufruct of the residue of his estate to the appellant, and appointed him and certain other persons as heirs of such residue in certain proportions, but as to the partnership property he directed that the partnership should continue, and that in case the appellant should sell any portion thereof he should receive a larger proportion than of the rest of the residue. The testator further directed that the remaining heirs should be paid their shares of the partnership property according to the valuation of the inventory to be framed on his death, but that in case the appellant should sell the whole of the partnership property, they should be entitled to share as heirs according to the original proportions. On the death of the testator, the Master of the Supreme Court assessed the duty payable by the appellant in respect of his usufruct only, and such duty was duly paid. Afterwards the appellant sold a portion of the partnership property for a larger sum than that at which the property was valued in the inventory.

Held, that on obtaining his share of the proceeds under the will the succession duty payable by the appellant should be upon such increased value after deducting the sum paid by him in respect of his usufruct.

This was an appeal brought by Hendrik Rudolph Stephan, Cape Town, one of the heirs in the estate of the late Johan Carel Stephan, against the Colonial Government.

The petition was in the following terms:

1. Your petitioner is one of the heirs of his late brother Johan Carel Stephan, also known as Johan Carel Jacobus Stephan, under the last will and testament of his said brother.

2. On or about 20th November, 1901, a special case was brought before this Honourable Court by your petitioner and the executors in his late brother's estate in order to have the construction to be placed upon the terms of the said will declared.

3. On or about 12th March, 1902, this Honourable Court gave judgment in terms of the first portion of contention (a) of your petitioner to the effect that your petitioner was entitled to one-half of the testator's share in such of the property belonging to the partnership business carried on by your petitioner and his said late brother as was sold by your petitioner whilst carrying on the said business in terms of the said will and that the other heirs in the estate were only entitled to be paid out their one-half share of the testator's share in the property sold according to the valuation made in the inventory framed in terms of the said will.

4. After the testator's death the inventory was duly filed in terms of the will and the Master of this Honourable Court assessed the succession duty on the life interest of your petitioner in the property specified in the said inventory, and the executors paid the amount of such duty, prior to the judgment of this Honourable Court in the special case above referred to.

5. In the month of November, 1902, your petitioner whilst carrying on the said partnership business in terms of the said will sold certain landed property at Rogge Bay, Cape Town, measuring 31 square roods 45 square feet, registered in the name of the said partnership of Stephan Brothers for the sum of £20,000.

6. The value of the said property, according to the inventory, was the sum of £4,250, and the said valuation was a bona fide appraisement made by sworn appraisers at the time when the said inventory was framed.

7. Before receiving transfer of the half-share of the property, which was registered in his late brother's name, your petitioner was called on to pay succession duty.

8. For the purpose of deciding on the amount of duty to be paid the said Master assessed the duty upon the amount for which the said property was sold, and called on your petitioner to pay succession duty on a sum of £10,000, less £1,062 10s. (being the amount payable to the other heirs—one-fourth of the value of the property as brought up in the said inventory), but the said Master was willing that from the above sum should be deducted the amount already paid, as aforesaid, upon the life interest.

9. Your petitioner contends that he is not liable to pay any larger sum than the amount payable on his proportionate share of the value as brought up in the said inventory on the ground that he succeeded to the property on the death of the testator, he having decided to carry on the said partnership business in terms of the will, and that the proper sum on which duty must be assessed in respect of the aforementioned property sold, as aforesaid, is £1,062 10s.

10. It was arranged that, inasmuch as transfer had to be passed to the purchasers, your petitioner should pay the duty upon the amount as claimed by the Master without prejudice and subject to the decision of this Honourable Court on this petition.

11. With regard to the sale of the farm Jacobus Kraal, referred to in the special case, your petitioner paid duty upon the valuation, according to the said inventory, but the said payment was made subject to adjustment in subsequent accounts, if necessary.

Wherefore your petitioner prays that your lordships may declare that he is not bound to pay succession duty on any larger sum than his proportionate share of the valuation of the said property, according to the inventory, and that the additional amount paid by him under protest may be refunded to him, or that your petitioner may have such further or other relief as may seem meet.

Mr. Burton for the applicant. Mr. Schreiner, K.C., for the Colonial Government.

Mr. Burton: Succession duty is to be paid on the net value of the estate—Act 5 of 1864, section 2. The question is, when is that net value to be ascertained? Our contention is that it must be ascertained at the time the succession took place, or, in other words, that this duty is a succession duty, and not a duty on the estate.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Should not the value be ascertained at the time the successor comes into possession?]

I contend that we are bound to pay duty only on the value of the property as at the death of the testator. We say that the property vested in us at that time. The subsequent sale of the property can have nothing to do with our liabilities as to succession duty. I cannot find any cases in our own courts as to when the property is to be valued, but see Attorney-General v. Sefton (12 L.T.N.S., 242). The English Act (16, 17, Vict., C. 51, Sec. 10) is in almost identical terms with our Act 5 of 1864, and neither of these Acts deals with any possible increase or decrease in the value of the property. It is not on the property, but on the succession that duty is paid. The question is then, when did this property vest. The case of Strydom v. Strydom's Trustee (11 Juta, 423) shows that it vested on the death of the testator, unless something in the will showed that the testator did not intend that it should do so. In this case the will has already been construed by the Court to some extent in Stephan v. Executors of Stephan (12 C.T.R., 242). The will certainly does seem to present some difficulty, and it is not easy to reconcile clauses 19 and 20 with 22 and 23. My contention is that the testator intended to confer a quarter of his private property and half of the partnership property upon Henry R. Stephan, and I contend that this property vested on the death of the testator. It was then worth £4,250.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for the respondent): The Court has held that H. R. Stephan was to get half of the partnership property when he should realise that property. If he should discontinue the business, all he can get is three-quarters of half. This property was worth £4,250 at the time of the testator's death, but H. R. Stephan had only a life interest in the property till he should sell it, and the Master could claim duty only on that life interest until it should be sold. The other heirs would have to pay succession duty on the full £4,250, even if the property had depreciated (see clause 23 of the will), but H. R. Stephan might have had nothing to pay in the way of succession duty if the property had materially decreased in value, otherwise it might have happened that he might have had more to pay as duty than his share amounted to. The property having sold for £200,000, H. R. Stephan is entitled to £100,000, and the Master claims duty on that sum. As to the other £100,000, the heirs are to pay on the basis of £4,250. There was no absolute vesting of this property until it was sold: previous to that event there was only a vesting of certain rights, and on these it was impossible to assess duty. The case Attorney-General v. Sefton, cited on the other side, was decided on Section 21 of the English Act, to which there is nothing corresponding in our Act. See Hanson on Probate and Succession Duties Act. Also see the previous case (12 C.T.R., 242) as to the interpretation of the will.

Mr. Burton (in reply): I did not refer specifically to Section 21 of the English Act because that merely provides the machinery by which the land is to be valued. A decrease in the value of the property would effect the succession duty. See judgment of Wensleydale, L.J., in Attorney-General v. Earl of Sefton (12 L.T. Rep., 242). The whole ratio decidendi in that case is to be found in the 10th Section of the English Act. Hence the whole question is, when did the succession take place? It has been argued for the respondent that a quarter of the brother's share vested in the death of the testator. It was evidently the wish of the testator that the business should be carried on, bu if H. R. Stephan was to get half instead of quarter when he sold part of the property, it would have been a direct inducement to him not to carry on the business. I submit that the property vested on the death of testator. H. R. Stephan undertaking to carry on the business.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (September 12th).

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an appeal against the assessment made by the Master of the Supreme Court of the duty payable by the appellant in respect of his share of the proceeds of certain property under the will of the late J. C. J. Stephan. The Master has appraised the value of such share according to the price actually realised by the appellant, whilst the appellant claims that the appraisement should have been according to the value placed on the property in the inventory made after the death of the testator. Under the will the appellant has a life interest in the residue of the testator's estate, and there are complicated and somewhat contradictory directions as to the division of the property among the heirs. The appellant is one of the heirs, being entitled to one-fourth of the residue, but in regard to property which had been held in partnership by the testator and the appellant, the directions are very peculiar. Should the appellant sell any of the partnership property, then the appellant is entitled, in additon to his half share of the property, to one-half of the testator's share, and must pay the remaining half of the testator's share, or one-fourth of the whole to the remaining heirs. Such is the provision of the 22nd clause of the will, which is, however, inconsistent with the immediately following clause, which directs that the heirs shall receive their share of the partnership property according to the valuation made in the inventory. The Court has already decided that, so far as there is an inconsistency, the later clause of the will should prevail, and that the effect of the two clauses read together is to confer on the appellant one-half of the testator's half share of the proceeds of sales of landed property belonging to the partnership. It is clear that such partnership property was placed on a different footing from the rest of the testator's property, and that the proceeds were not to be distributed in the manner indicated until there had been an actual sale of the property. There is a further provision that in case the appellant should sell the whole of the partnership property the other heirs would be entitled to their inheritance upon the basis directed in regard to the rest of the property. After the death of the testator, the Master appraised the duty payable by the appellant, but he charged the appellant with duty on his life interest. The appellant raised no objection to this course, and the consequence is that if the property had diminished in value he would, on coming into possession of his share of the proceeds, have been entitled to claim that the duty shall be assessed according to the diminished value. In fact, however, the property has greatly increased in value, and the question is whether the appellant should not pay duty according to such increased value. The case of Attorney-General v. Sefton (12, L.T., Rep. N.S., 242) has been referred to in support of the view that the value of the property at the time of the testator's death should be the criterion. In that case, however, there seems to have been no doubt that the devolution of the succession took place immediately upon the death of the deceased. At the time of the succession the land had no dutiable value, and it was held that the fact of the land afterwards acquiring such dutiable value did not entitle the Crown to succession duty. The property in question in the present case had a dutiable value at the time of the testator's death, but, owing to the peculiar provisions of the will, no assessment was made of the duty payable by the appellant, except so far as his life interest was concerned. As I have already remarked, he did not object to this course, and, so far as I can judge, it was the most convenient course to adopt under the circumstances. The will directed that the partnership should be carried on by the appellant, and until the contingency happened of any portion of the property being sold, it could not be known what proportion of the partnership property would devolve on him. I am of opinion, therefore, that the Master properly charged the appellant with duty on the amount actually realised, deducting from such duty the amount already paid in respect of his life interest. The appeal must therefore be dismissed, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice, the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D., and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZÉ.]

RIES v. WILLETTS. { 1903. Sept. 11th.

Defamation—Injury—Dishonourable conduct.

To a declaration claiming damages for defamation the defendant excepted on the ground that the words complained of were not defamatory, the words being as follows: "I do not like his mean tricks. I told him he could go elsewhere with his dirty mean tricks."

Held, that as the words were capable of the meaning that the plaintiff had been guilty of dishonourable conduct, the exception should be overruled.

This was an argument on exceptions. An action was brought by Michael Joseph Ries, hotel proprietor, Henry Michael Ries, produce merchant, and Alfred John Ries, produce merchant, all of East London, against Henry Noah Willetts, auctioneer, also of East London, for damages for defamation.

The declaration set out that the plaintiffs had had dealings in land with the defendant on several occasions, who had sold on their behalf land at public auction. Prior to the 11th April, 1903, the plaintiffs were jointly interested in certain land purchased from Mrs. Klein, and they entered into negotiations with the defendant for the sale thereof. On the 6th April the plaintiffs informed the defendant that they would not sell the land through him. Thereafter, on 11th April, at a public auction of land at East London—not the plaintiffs'—in the presence of E. Cordiner and a large number of persons, there and then assembled, the defendant made use of the following words: "You may have seen advertised another sale, which is Mrs. Klein's property, by my friends the Ries party (thereby meaning the plaintiffs); I do not like their mean tricks; I told them they could go elsewhere with their dirty, underhand business." The plaintiffs each claimed £2,500 damages.

Exception was taken to the declaration by the defendant, on the ground that, even if the words complained of were used, they were not defamatory, and could not support the plaintiffs' action in law.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Sir H. Juta, K.C.), was for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Burton (with him Mr. Upington) was for the defendant.

Mr. Burton (for the excipient): The point is whether the words set forth in the declaration support the innuendo? The plaintiff is bound by his innuendo. The only question there is as to the word "dishonest." It is not defamatory to call a man "mean." If the words are susceptible of the meaning attached to them in the innuendo, the question whether they are defamatory or not must be decided at the trial. But I contend that the words used by the defendant do not amount to a charge of dishonesty. If he had intended to charge dishonesty he would have used such words as "swindle" or "fraud." The phrase "mean tricks" does not necessarily imply dishonesty, and that is the whole question. It does not matter what the bystanders understood. As to the plaintiff being bound by his innuendo, see Odgers (p. 107, 3rd Edition). To make these words amount to a charge of dishonesty is to carry them beyond their legitimate meaning. Then the defendant said they could "go elsewhere with their dirty underhand business." Here the whole force of the expression lies in the word "underhand," but that only means "sly," and not "dishonest." In a Canadian case, cited by Odgers, it was held that it was not actionable to say that "A.B. has cheated me out of 100 acres of land."

Mr. Schreiner (for the respondent): I would submit that these words are as defamatory as well could be, and no innuendo was really necessary as a matter of law. Odgers (p. 106, 3rd Edition). The argument for the excipient has gone chiefly on the word "dishonest." Well, surely "dirty underhand business" implies dishonesty. But the words themselves are prima facie actionable. They were spoken of mercantile men, and our law is very careful to safeguard the character of merchants. See Voet (47-10-8), M. de Villiers on Injuries (p. 89 and notes. Also p. 93 (citing Voet, 5-1-21) as to casting reflections upon classes of people, and p. 97 as to conritium. This is purely a question of conritium. If a man who is accused of being guilty of "mean tricks" has no remedy, it might be argued that every honest man is guilty of mean tricks.

Mr. Burton (in reply): Newspapers often describe the conduct of public men as "mean and underhand." There is nothing on the declaration to show that the defendant gave any explanation of these words tending to support the innuendo.

De Villiers, C.J.: At this stage the Court has to decide whether the words used by the defendant are capable of the meaning attributed to them in the innuendo. The words used are: "You may have seen advertised another sale, which is Mrs. Klein's property, by my friends, the Ries party (thereby meaning the plaintiffs); I do not like their mean tricks; I told them they could go elsewhere with their dirty, underhand business." These words may not necessarily imply dishonesty, though they come very near to implying dishonesty, but they certainly attribute dishonourable conduct to the plaintiff. The defamation may not be of such a nature as to justify heavy damages, but the question to be decided at this stage is whether the words are defamatory at all. If they are injurious to the character or reputation of the plaintiff they must be held to be defamatory. The exception, therefore, in my opinion, should be overruled, with costs.

Kotzé, J., concurred. He said he thought the words as they stood might be taken to mean that the defendant intended to say or to impute that the plaintiffs were guilty of dishonourable and disreputable conduct, in other words, that they were guilty of conduct derogatory to the character of respectable and reputable men.

KAEDING v. M'BUNJA. } 1903. } Sept. 11th.

Resident Magistrate's Court—Dismissal of claim—Appeal—Costs—Remitting case to Court below—Res judicata.

In an action in a Magistrate's Court for goods sold and delivered, the Court dismissed the claim although there was evidence in support of it. On appeal, the case was remitted to the Magistrate's Court, to be tried on its merits but, as the case had been dismissed by the Magistrate without being thereto requested by the defendant, the costs of appeal were ordered to abide the result in the Court below.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Resident Magistrate, of Willowdale, in a case in which the appellant sued for £3 10s., being the balance of an account for goods sold and delivered and for 10s. interest.

The appellant sued in the Court below on a summons, alleging that the respondent was indebted to him in a sum of £3 10s. for goods supplied between 1896 and 1899. The account annexed to the summons showed an item due by respondent of £14, for seven bags of mealies on the 31st August, 1896, an item of 10s. for a jacket supplied on the 30th January, 1899, and credit payments for £11, leaving a balance of £3 10s. It appeared that in 1901 the appellant sued respondent, and one Nomzanqa for a sum of £10 on a promissory note and a sum of £3 for a bag of mealies alleged to have been supplied to respondent on the 21st December, 1899. That case came before the Magistrate, and Nomzanqa, who was sued as surety, admitted the liability, and judgment was accepted against him. That money was paid. In the present case, no exception was raised to the summons, nor was any evidence taken, but there was some conversation at the hearing, and the Magistrate dismissed the summons. The reasons of the Magistrate were as follow: "Defendant is an illiterate native. His proper course would have been to take exception on the ground of res judicata," and judgment to have been that the exception was sustained, but under the circumstances it was impossible to sustain an exception not raised. The account attached to the summons does not show a credit of £3 paid by the defendant's surety, and, as plaintiff admitted that the judgment of the 27th March, 1901, was satisfied, the only course was to dismiss the summons, with costs."

Mr. McGregor (for the appellant): The Magistrate has not taken account of the fact that the transactions of 1896 and of 1898 were entirely different.

[Kotzé, J.: What was the evidence in the Court below?]

No evidence seems to have been taken. It would appear that in the account of 1901 they sued for £19, but this is a different case, and the articles purchased are different. It is true that mealies are mentioned in both accounts, but they are not the same mealies. Then the R.M. takes no notice of 10s. for the jacket, which shows that something had escaped his notice. He was misled by the occurrence of mealies at much the same price in both accounts. It is unfortunate that no evidence was taken on oath, and the case seems to have been decided on a conversation between the parties in Court.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The plaintiff sued for the 1896 account; why did he not also sue for that of 1898?]

He had security for the later account.

[De Villiers, C.J.: That does not explain why he never sued.]

I cannot explain; but it may have been that in 1901 the surety was not worth suing, but is now in better circumstances.

The respondent was in default.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is to be regretted that the Magistrate did not hear the evidence, and enter into the merits of the case, because that would have saved considerable costs in this case. The Magistrate in his reasons says: "The defendant was an illiterate native. His proper course would have been to take exception on the grounds of res judicata, and judgment to have been that the exception was sustained, but under the circumstances it was impossible to sustain an exception not raised." But on referring to the records, I do not see how the plea of res judicata could have availed the defendant, because in the first action the plaintiff sued the defendant for the price of a bag of mealies purchased on the 21st December, 1898, while in the second case he sued for seven bags of mealies, which were purchased on the 31st August, 1896. There seems to be no connection whatever between the two cases, and a plea of res judicata could not apply unless the fresh action had been in respect of the same cause of action as the previous one. So that res judicata would not have been a good defence. Then the Magistrate goes on: "The account attached to the summons does not show a credit of £3 paid by the defendant's security, and, as plaintiff admitted that the judgment of the 27th March, 1901, was satisfied, the only course, was to dismiss the summons, with costs." Well, I confess I do not see the force of that reasoning, but is quite possible that all the facts are not now before the Court. The Magistrate had tried the previous case himself, and he remembered more than the Court now knows. It is quite possible there may be evidence forthcoming which supports the view the Magistrate takes, but this Court, as a Court of Appeal, can only be guided by the records, and upon the records as they stand the Magistrate was wrong. The Court will, therefore, allow the appeal, and remit the case to the Magistrate for trial upon the merits. As to the costs of this appeal, I think they should stand over for the Magistrate to decide upon his final decision of the merits of the case. After all, it was the Magistrate's own course to give judgment. The defendant was a native. He appeared in person and was not advised, and the Magistrate seems to have taken this course without being asked to take it. The Court will, therefore, allow the appeal, and the case will be remitted to the Magistrate to decide on the merits, the question of costs of appeal also being remitted to the Magistrate.

Kotzé, J., concurred.

De Villiers, C.J., said the form of judgment would be as follows: Appeal allowed, and case remitted to the Court below for trial on its merits, costs of appeal to abide result in the Court below.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

S.A. MILLING CO. v. GRAND JUNCTION RAILWAYS. { 1903. Sept. 12th.

Mr. Gardiner appeared for plaintiffs, Mr. Close for defendants, and Mr. Upington on behalf of certain creditors.

Mr. Gardiner, who asked for the appointment of a receiver in accordance with certain consent papers, read an affidavit by Mr. E. J. Moore, which stated that on September 7 a meeting was held at which the parties' attorneys and Mr. A. F. Hills were present. The meeting was strongly in favour of the further postponement of the application for the adjudication of the estate as insolvent, and consented to Messrs. E. R. Syfret and J. E. Close being appointed as receivers, with powers to collect moneys due to the Grand Junction Railways, and to realise any assets. As the African Banking Corporation was not willing to consent to a distribution, Mr. Gardiner asked that the matter be postponed.

Mr. Upington consented.

Mr. Close said he would leave the matter entirely in the hands of the Court.

De Villiers, C.J., said there was a provisional sequestration against the estate, and the property was therefore in the hands of the Master. It was a somewhat novel procedure to take the custody out of the hands of the Master, and entrust it to someone else.

Mr. Gardiner said that if the application for the provisional order for sequestration were postponed until October 15, and Messrs. Syfret and Close were appointed as receivers, Mr. Hills would in the meantime see what further arrangement could be come to.

De Villiers, C.J., said the case would be postponed until October 15, and in the meantime the Master would be authorised to appoint Messrs. Syfret and Close as curators, but this must be left to the Master's discretion.

PURCELL AND OTHERS V. HENDRICKSE.

Mr. Buchanan, for the plaintiffs, applied for a decree of civil imprisonment on a judgment for £133, with interest for goods sold and delivered and £8 15s. 3d. costs of suit.

The defendant appeared in person.

De Villiers, C.J.: Have you no means to pay the money?

The Defendant: No.

De Villiers, C.J. (to Mr. Buchanan): Have you found he has means?

Mr. Buchanan: No. He explained that defendant seemed to have used the goods for the purposes of a contract, and that he was turned off from the contract by the owner of the building.

De Villiers, C.J., told the defendant to be present on Monday, and to bring witnesses—if he had any—to prove that he had no means to pay the amount.

Postea (September 14): The Court refused to grant the decree; the plaintiffs not having proved that the defendant was possessed of means wherewith to satisfy the judgment.

REX V. DEMPERS. { 1903. Sept. 12th.

Act 36 of 1902, Sec. 22—Liability of Landlord—Guilty knowledge.

This was an appeal from a conviction of Mr. Broers, A.R.M., of Cape Town, in a case in which the appellant, Mr. H. J. Dempers, was charged, under section 22 of Act 36 of 1902, in that he did, on divers dates between December 1, 1902, and August 1, 1903, wrongfully and unlawfully keep a brothel at 12, Muir-street, Cape Town. The appeal was brought on the grounds that the conviction was against the weight of evidence in the case, and generally that the conviction could not be supported.

Mr. Burton for the appellant; Mr. Jones for the Crown.

Mr. Burton, in opening the case for the appellant, referred to the Act under which Mr. Dempers was charged. Part 4 of the Act related to this matter of the suppression of brothels, and in sub-section (c) of section 24, it was laid down that any landlord who may be aware that his premises are being conducted as a brothel shall be deemed to be the keeper of a brothel. He (Mr. Burton) might say at once that the evidence showed that Mr. Dempers had been the owner of the premises in question. Counsel then proceeded to read the evidence given in the Magistrate's Court, upon which evidence the Magistrate had brought in a conviction. Continuing, he said that he would like to refer to the terms of the 26th section of the Act, which stated that the onus of proof rested with the prosecution, unless it could be shown that the landlord was receiving a high rent, when it would rest with the landlord to show that the rent was not excessive. In this case, although he had not actually mentioned it in giving judgment, the Magistrate had expressed the opinion that the matter of the rent of the house was not sufficient evidence on which to find the accused guilty. It was quite clear from the evidence given in the Court below, both for the Crown and for the defence, that the rent of the house in question was not exorbitant. Mr. Goldberg seemed to be the only authoritative witness produced by the Crown, and according to his calculations, the rent of the premises would be £45, yet Mr. Dempers only received £22 10s. for the house and £9 for the stables. Persons living in the neighbourhood, who also gave evidence, stated that the rent was not excessive, and showed that if the accused had wished to let the premises to be used as a warehouse, he could have received a much higher rent for them Therefore the onus of proving that the accused knew the house was a brothel rested with the prosecution; and how was this onus discharged? The accused had been convicted upon the evidence of a well-known procuress and her agent. There was the evidence of the servant who stated that Mr. Dempers called at the house in company with Mr. Van Rynveld, but these gentlemen had visited the place in broad daylight.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Does it appear from any evidence not before the Court why the police allowed the place to continue as a brothel?]

There is not the least evidence to show why this had been done. The police never gave Mr. Dempers the slightest hint that the place was being kept as a brothel, although it was admitted that the practice was to give notice to the owner of the house in such cases. He felt that the police had failed in their duty in leaving this man in ignorance that his house was being used as a brothel. His learned friend might say that the Magistrate had found that the facts did prove, but he submitted that the facts did not prove the accused guilty. The evidence might show that the accused ought to have had a suspicion that the house was being used as a brothel, but there was nothing to show that Mr. Dempers had that guilty knowledge of the nature of the house, which it was the duty of the Crown to prove he had. The woman admitted that the accused had never been near the place until the time he called and spoke to the servant, Alice Williams. The only evidence against the accused as to guilty knowledge was that of the procuress, who, if Mr. Dempers had that knowledge, was his accomplice, as was also her private detective. Taking the evidence of the procuress herself, she said that in January the accused refused to give her a lease, but told her to bring somebody else, and then she brought the man Back. Neither Hyman or Back were produced by the Crown; they were both important witnesses, but they had gone away. What man, what property owner would be safe under such conditions? Here was a man holding a large amount of property, his neighbours made no complaint—two of them said they had no idea that this place was being used as a brothel—and he had been convicted on this woman's testimony. The central point in her evidence was that Mr. Dempers refused her a lease, and told her to bring somebody else, presumably as a blind. But that was contradicted by Mr. Van Ryneveld. How could any Court of Law take the word of a prostitute against the sworn testimony of witnesses like Mr. Dempers, Mr. Van Ryneveld, and Mr. Groenewald? It was straining the right which the Court had of believing one witness rather than another. The Crown had failed to establish guilty knowledge. What motive could the accused have, because he had derived no profit from the immorality which had taken place in the house, and it had been shown that, had he let the house as a warehouse, he could have got a higher rent? I submit that the conviction was not justified by the evidence.

Mr. Howel Jones said that the terms of the appeal were that the evidence was insufficient, not that it was incorrect. The house had been a notorious brothel.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But what I cannot understand is why the police did not prosecute before. Would it not appear—although it seems hard to imagine it—that the police knew that the house was being kept as a brothel, and allowed it, or that it was conducted in such a manner that evidence could not be got to bring in a conviction?]

The woman Madam Sarah has been prosecuted several times.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But this woman comes into court, and says that at that moment she is the keeper of a brothel. Has there been a prosecution since this case of Dempers?]

I cannot say.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why was no notice given to the appellant. The usual practice was to give notice, but in this case it has not been given. If a landlord did not get notice, how was he to know of the nature of the house?]

I hold that Mr. Dempers must have known it by inference; he had seen this woman.

[Kotzé, J.: But women are good actresses. This woman might have put on a different appearance before Mr. Dempers.]

Mr. Dempers had seen her often, and he must have known what she was.

[Kotzé, J.: Is the evidence of a woman like that to be believed unless it be corroborated?]

I can only argue that the Magistrate believed the evidence of the woman; if not, I have no case. If the Magistrate must be taken to have believed the evidence of the witnesses for the Crown, then there were numerous circumstances which would justify him in finding appellant guilty. The Magistrate was entitled to believe the woman Sarah from the manner in which she gave her evidence, and he could hardly believe that the appellant was so innocent as to be deceived in the character of this woman into a disbelief as to her true trade and calling.

[Kotzé, J.: The object of the woman when she saw the appellant would be to impress him with the idea that she was not a prostitue, for if she led him to believe she was a prostitute she would not have got the lease.]

She did not get the lease in her own name. When she went to appellant he asked her whether the house was quiet. When Carey paid the rent, Dempers asked him how the house was conducted, and if there were any complaints. If the Magistrate believed that evidence, he could have no other conviction than that the appellant knew that the house was one which might possibly be improperly conducted. If the Magistrate believed that could he believe that the house was anything else than a brothel? It was a peculiar circumstance that when the Act came into force Dempers sent for the woman with the object of turning her out, but she refused to go, as the lease was not up. Another extraordinary fact was the appellant's refusal to take the money from the woman Sarah, when she went to his office with the rent in notes and gold; the presumption was, he knew she was keeping the place.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is Dempers' explanation of all this?]

He denies it, and if the Court believes his evidence there is no case against him. The fact that the Magistrate convicted him shows that he did not believe Dempers. There is nothing in the deed of sale of No. 12, Muir-street to compel the purchaser to take transfer; he would not forfeit anything by not carrying it out. The person responsible for the house was the registered owner, not a person who might become the owner six months hence. The legal agreement under which the premises were originally let, contained the extraordinary clause, that if they were not kept as a boarding-house only the lease would be terminated. If Dempers did not know that the place was being used as a brothel, the fact that he thought of having this proviso in the lease should have put him on his guard.

[Kotzé, J.: That is not sufficient to show a guilty knowledge.]

Then the rent paid to Dempers, having due regard to that of other dwelling-houses in the neighbourhood, was very high.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is the number of the house?]

No. 12.

[De Villiers, C.J.: In the lease it is spoken of as No. 4.]

De Villiers, C.J.: It is impossible to acquit the defendant of some degree of negligence in the performance of his duties as a landlord. The ownership of property carries with it obligations as well as privileges, and one of those obligations is that the owner should prevent his property from being used for illegal or improper purposes. In the present case, it appears that the appellant sought to protect himself by inserting a clause in the lease that the property should be used only for certain purposes, but it was not sufficient to insert that clause in the lease—it would have been more prudent to see that a clause of this kind was properly carried out. But the charge against appellant is not that he was negligent or imprudent in the performance of his duties as a landlord, but that he kept a brothel, and it is of the very essence of such an offence that there should be a guilty knowledge on the part of the person so charged. Now in the present case it would appear that it was the practice of the police to give notice to the landlords of premises which were being used for immoral purposes, and I asked for an explanation from counsel for the prosecution why such notice was not given in the present case. It was admitted that notice was not given. If it had been given, there would have been no doubt as to the defendant's guilt, but seeing no such notice was given, the man might fairly believe there was nothing to be said against the manner in which the premises were conducted. It has been said it appeared there had been prosecutions against the woman called Sarah, who lived on the property, and that police reports were put in showing that the tenant of No. 12, Muir-street, was so charged, and that seems to have been taken as one of the reasons why the appellant should have known that the house was improperly conducted. It now appears that the number of the house on his deed of transfer was 4, so even if appellant had been in the habit of reading the police reports—which he says he is not—and had read a report of the case, he would not necessarily have known that his place, which appeared on the deed as No. 4, was No. 12 in respect of which the prosecution was instituted. There is no dout that some of the evidence given on behalf of the prosecution would afford very fair ground for considerable suspicion against the appellant. Counsel for the Crown has said that the evidence shows that the appellant ought to have known that the place might have been conducted improperly, but that is not sufficient; the evidence ought to show that he must have known, and without such evidence it is impossible to impute to him a guilty knowledge. It is said that this is a pure question of fact, and that the Court is bound to accept a magistrate's decision on this point; but when it comes to a question of a woman's evidence being taken against the evidence of other witnesses - a woman who admits that at the present moment she is conducting this brothel, a kind of procuress, a woman of infamous character--I think the Court should not accept such evidence as conclusive against the evidence of witnesses of repute. I therefore think that the Magistrate was wrong in taking her evidence as conclusive as to what is alleged to have taken place between her and the appellant. The appellant himself never visited the house. It is quite true he ought to have visited it. I quite agree if a man has fifty houses, if he cannot inspect them all personally, he should have an agent to do so. I quite agree, therefore, that he ought to have visited the house; but it does not follow that if he did not inspect it he must be held to know what took place inside. The only time when the appellant visited the house was on the occasion when he had already sold it to Hyam. At that time he visited the house purely for business purposes, and there is no corroboration whatever of the woman's statement that she then said there were some girls there. On that occasion the appellant was accompanied by others, and the evidence of this woman is in no way confirmed by any of the other witnesses. To my mind, the conduct of the police is very extraordinary. They seemed to be aware that the place was being used for immoral purposes, but, notwithstanding that fact, after the last prosecution of the woman no further prosecution took place. The only conclusion open is that they either knew it was being so conducted and did not prosecute—which I should be very loth to accept—or that the house has been so conducted latterly that it would be impossible to prove that it was being improperly conducted. If that were the case with regard to the police, the appellant cannot be blamed for not knowing that this house was being used for immoral purposes. When we come to the evidence given by witnesses for the defence, there is conclusive evidence to show that even the neighbours did not know that the place was being improperly used. A man who lives next door said he never saw anything improper, but the supreme test in cases of this kind, where the landlord is charged with keeping a brothel—I say the supreme test where the offence is not clearly brought home by the prosecution is the rent which the landlord receives. It cannot be for one moment assumed that a gentleman like the appellant, who knows what extreme penalties are connected with this offence, would have continued to let these premises to this woman if he had known that they were used for immoral purposes. If he wished to take the risk of prosecution one would have expected he would have charged an excessive or exorbitant rent, and the whole of the evidence shows that, so far from the rent being excessive, it was fairly moderate considering the rents in Cape Town at the present time. The evidence of the witnesses for the prosecution is clear on that point. Jacob Goldberg said: "I think the house in question is worth £40 or £45 per month. I cannot say I think Muir-street a desirable place for a gentleman's residence." The rent was only £22 10s. per month, and evidence of other witnesses for the prosecution is to the effect that the rent is a moderate one. A man like Mr. Zoutendyk and other respectable witnesses said the rent was fair and moderate. There were no doubt witnesses for the prosecution who said they paid less rent for houses in the same neighbourhood, but these houses were considerably smaller than the house let to this woman. With regard to Madam Sarah paying the rent, it had been explained that she represented herself to be the wife of Hyam, to whom the house had been let. It is quite possible that on the occasions on which she saw the appellant for this purpose she would be so modestly dressed and have all the appearance of being a respectable woman, and that there would be nothing in her conduct when paying the rent to lead appellant to believe that she was anything but a respectable woman. I am bound to say there are circumstances of suspicion, but cases of this kind should not have been decided on suspicion. The offence is a very serious one, and the object of the Act is that the offence shall be adequately punished, but in every case the guilt should be brought clearly home before a conviction is arrived at. In the present case the evidence, in my opinion, is not sufficient to justify the Magistrate's finding. The appeal must be allowed.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice, the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

LEWIS AND SACKS v. GOODMAN. { 1903. Sept. 14th.

Provisional sentence—Security.

On a claim for provisional sentence the defence of compensation was raised, but as the evidence of the existence of a valid counter claim was not satisfactory, provisional sentence was granted. The plaintiffs, residing outside the jurisdiction of the Court, were ordered to give sufficient security over and above the ordinary security de restituendo.

Mr. Close moved for provisional sentence on two promissory notes, each for the sum of £100, together with interest and costs of suit.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for the defendant) put in the following affidavit:

1. I am the defendant in this suit. I am a contractor, residing at Sea Point.

2. The said plaintiffs owe me between £400 and £500, being the balance due on an account of cash advanced, stock sold, and moneys deposited at various times since the year 1900.

3. I am unable to give exact dates or amounts, because the first-named plaintiff, while in Cape Town in December last, broke open my desk by forcing the lock and took the book in which the account between the plaintiffs and the defendant was kept. The said first-named plaintiff thereupon absconded to the Transvaal, taking the said book with him. I am consequently without exact data.

4. After deducting the amount now sued for, the plaintiffs still owe me between £200 and £300, more or less.

5. Transactions between the plaintiffs and defendant first commenced in Johannesburg in the following manner:

In June, 1900, Samuel Lewis and this deponent entered into a partnership under the style of Goodman and Lewis, trading in the Transvaal as contractors and speculators.

7. George Sacks was at that time employed by Goodman and Lewis. But at that time there also existed a private loose partnership between Lewis and Sacks.

8. In November, 1900, Lewis and this deponent came to Cape Town, leaving Sacks in charge of our affairs, with our general power of attorney.

9. I entrusted to and deposited with Sacks my own personal property, amounting to £500 sterling in sovereigns and about £300 worth of stock.

10. In January, 1901, I left Cape Town for England.

11. Before I left for England I gave Lewis £350 to invest on behalf of Goodman and Lewis.

12. While I was away in England, Lewis and Sacks traded with my personal property referred to in paragraph 9, and mixed up, interchanged, and transferred contracts, moneys, and speculations between Goodman and Lewis, this deponent, and Lewis and Sacks. All this was done without my leave or consent.

13. While in the Transvaal, Sacks forwarded to Lewis, in Cape Town, £400 sterling out of my moneys deposited with him as in paragraph 9.

14. When I returned from England in 1902 I discovered that this had been going on, and demanded a settlement. On my insisting, Lewis absconded with the books as described in paragraph 3 hereof.

15. The books referred to more or less show what was done with my moneys.

16. On June 23rd last this deponent was sued in the local Court of the Resident Magistrate on the first promissory note. The case was withdrawn, however, because Bernard Gabrilch, the plaintiff on that occasion, was only a nominal holder.

17. I have frequently written and legally demanded the delivery of the books or a statement of account, but have received no reply.

The affidavit of Samuel Lewis and George Sacks denied that they owed the sum of between £400 and £500, or any sum whatever; that there had ever been any accounts between them and the defendant, or any books containing such accounts. They denied paragraphs 10 and 12 of plaintiff's affidavit. That they had ever received from the defendant any demands for the delivery of any books or for a statement of account.

The latter affidavit was supported by the affidavits of Samuel Lewis, George Sacks, and Samuel Marks (the plaintiffs' book-keeper).

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for defendant): There is a direct conflict of evidnece in this case, and it is very significant that when one Gabric sued plaintiff on a promissory note the action was dismissed. The plaintiff has no remedy within the jurisdiction unless he sues by edict. He does not explain how he came into possession of these promissory notes.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Has he instituted an action?]

No, he could not do so, as the other parties are in the Transvaal.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The affidavit is very meagre.]

He could not give fuller particulars, because he says his books have been stolen and the matter is in the hands of the police. If the plaintiff wishes to go into the principal case he should give ample security. He has offered only £30, which is only sufficient to cover the costs in the provisional case.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What security are you prepared to give, Mr. Close?]

Mr. Close (for plaintiff): In any case we have to give security de restituendo.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Yes, but they want security for costs.]

Does not security de restituendo cover costs?

Mr. Schreiner: If your Lordship rules that we are content.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What security would you suggest?]

About £120.

De Villiers, C.J.: The plaintiffs are the holders of these promissory notes, and as such they are entitled to provisional sentence upon them unless the defendant can satisfy the Court that there are satisfactory grounds for holding that he has a counter-claim by way of compensation. From the evidence given by the defendant, it may well be that he has this defence, but he does not give a satisfactory explanation as to why he did not sue the plaintiffs on the claim, which he says he has before they left the country. Now, when he is sued upon these notes, he raises this defence. It may be a good defence, but there does not seem to be such a strong prima facie ground for holding that there is such proof of the defendant's allegations as to justify the Court in refusing provisional sentence. But at the same time, I think that full security should be given to the defendant by the plaintiffs, who reside out of the jurisdiction, not only for the costs of the provisional sentence, but also for the costs of the principal case. The Court will give provisional sentence for the amount claimed, and direct the plaintiffs to give security to the extent of £120 over and above the ordinary security de restituendo.

HEYDENRYCH V. HOCTOR. } 1903.
HEYDENRYCH V. JEFFERY. } Sept. 14th.

Promissory note—Place of payment.

A promissory note made by the defendant in favour of the plaintiff was payable at the office of S. The defendant did not pay the note when it fell due, but some weeks afterwards he paid the amount at the office of S., no intimation having in the meantime been made to the defendant that the amount was to be paid elsewhere. Application for provisional sentence was refused with costs.

Mr. M. de Villiers moved for provisional sentence in the first case against Hoctor on a promissory note for £25 with interest.

Mr. Upington (for the defendant Hoctor) read the affidavit of Hoctor, which stated that he obtained the loan from James Scott, a broker, of St. George's-street, and he attached his cheque for £25, dated September 27, 1902, paid on deponent's instructions by his attorneys to the said James Scott, as agent of the plaintiff in settlement of the plaintiff's claim.

The plaintiff's affidavit set forth that the statement of the defendant that he obtained the loan from James Scott as the agent of the deponent was incorrect. He was a financier, carrying on business in Cape Town, and was frequently applied to by brokers on behalf of their clients for loans. James Scott applied to him for a loan on behalf of the defendant. Scott never had any authority from him to collect the money, nor did he authorise him to act as his agent.

Replying to the Chief Justice, Mr. Upington said that he understood that Scott had absconded.

In regard to the case against Jeffrey, Mr. De Villiers moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £105.

Mr. Gardiner, who appeared for the defendant, read an affidavit, sworn by Jeffrey, which stated that he admitted having signed a promissory note for £105, but said that the promissory note had been paid by him, and had been discharged in due course. In October last he approached Mr. James Scott, broker, and applied to him for a loan. Mr. Scott told him that he was not in a position to make him an advance, but subsequently informed him that he had got the money. Deponent received a cheque from Mr. Scott signed by him, and he signed a promissory note for £105, the additional £5 being for interest. He was not aware at that time that the plaintiff had anything to do with the loan. On the 15th November, not being in a position to discharge the said promissory note, he applied for an extension of time, and he subsequently paid James Scott all the money in his possession, about £4, in consideration of the extension of time. On the 29th November he again called at Scott's office, and gave him a cheque for £101, the balance due on the promissory note. He never received any intimation from the plaintiff that he had lent the money until the 23rd August of the present year.

Mr. De Villiers read a replying affidavit by the plaintiff, which stated that he lent money to brokers on behalf of their clients. In October last year he was so applied to by Scott for the defendant. He gave Scott a cheque for £100; the statement that it was signed by Scott was incorrect. Scott was not his agent, and he had not acted on his behalf. His services were rendered on behalf of the defendant, and he took it, were paid for by the defendant. He had not received the sums of £4 and £101 mentioned by the defendant.

Mr. Upington (for defendant): The whole question is whether the payment made to plaintiff's agent is good. The cheque has been put in, and is the cheque of defendant's attorneys. It is dated September 27, 1902. No demand was made upon Scott for a promissory note until he became insolvent. Under these circumstances, the defendant has shown that prima facie Scott was agent for Heydenrych. If he was not, why should Heydenrych pay the note through Scott? Again, there is no explanation of the delay in prosecuting this case.

Mr. M. de Villiers (for plaintiff): It is not a question whether Scott was believed to be plaintiff's agent, but whether he was so. The promissory note was payable at the plaintiff's own office, how then could Scott have been an agent to negotiate loans. The plaintiff never asked defendant to return his promissory note: he only asked Scott, and there is no proof of his agency. Then who paid Scott for negotiating the loan? Scott was defendant's agent throughout, and not plaintiff's.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What do you say to Jeffrey's case?]

There the defence is still more extraordinary. Scott there was clearly defendant's agent. The defendant simply employed Scott to negotiate a loan. Then Scott asked defendant for £4, as he was in financial difficulties, but what had that to do with the plaintiff? But even if he was agent for the plaintiff, how could he give extension of time? The note was payable at Scott's office. This is not a case analogous to one in which payment is to be made at a bank. Extension of time is a most important factor, because if payment is to be made by a certain date, it cannot be received thereafter by the agent. On the due date Abrahams went to the proper place and asked for payment, and therefore defendant is not justified in setting up the defence that we have lain by so long.

Mr. Upington was not heard in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is quite clear from the affidavit of the defendant Hoctor that he understood Scott to be the agent of the plaintiff, not only for the purpose of making the loan, but also for the purpose of receivng payment of the loan. The fact that he so understood it, however, is not enough, because if, in fact, Scott was not the agent of the plaintiff for the purpose of receiving payment, the defendant had no right to pay to Scott. Hoctor himself says it was "clearly understood by me from the plaintiff that this amount should be paid by me to the said Scott for the plaintiff's account." That is denied, and the promissory note which has been produced is somewhat inconsistent with the statement, because the promissory note says that the money shall be payable at the offices of Heydenrych. But that seems to be a printed form of the notes given by Heydenrych, and the objection should not be carried too far. But there is the letter written by Heydenrych on the 17th June, 1903, which goes very far, in my opinion, to support the statement of the defendant. That letter is referred to by the defendant in his affidavit, and there is no explanation given by Heydenrych, the plaintiff, in his replying affidavit as to the statements contained in this letter. In this letter of the 17th June he says: "Sir,—I have repeatedly called at Mr. Scott's office for payment of your promissory note for £25, and interest from the 1st September, 1902, payable at my office as above, and I have received no payment, and Mr. Scott tells me that he had written several times to you. I have, therefore, to demand immediate payment, failing which, I shall collect the rent of the houses pledged to me by you, and charge you with the expenses." Now this letter goes very far to show that Scott may have been writing these letters to the defendant on behalf of the plaintiff, for why should Scott tell him that he had written these letters several times to the defendant unless Heydenrych had employed Scott for the purpose of writing these letters? I am by no means satisfied upon these affidavits that Scott was not employed by Heydenrych. The fact that Scott's office was undoubtedly the place of payment in the second case should not be lost sight of in the first case. Another point that should not be lost sight of is this: that Heydenrych, the plaintiff, delayed taking these proceedings until all remedy as against Scott was lost, but any decision at this stage is not final—the plaintiff will still have an opportunity of going into the principal case, and the defendant will then have better opportunities than he has now of proving the agency, and the Court will then decide the case upon its merits. The Court is of opinion that the plaintiff should go into the principal case, costs to abide the result. In regard to the second case, payment was made by the defendant at Scott's office, where the note was payable, and, prima facie, therefore, the payment was good. The note was paid several weeks after it fell due, but the defendant was not directed by the plaintiff to pay the amount elsewhere than at Scott's office, where it had been made payable. In this case, therefore, provisional sentence will be refused, with costs. In the other case, costs will abide the result.

REX v. BROWN. { 1903. Sept. 14th.

Liquor Licensing Act (28) 1883—Native locations and areas.

On the trial of the appellant in the Resident Magistrate's Court of Komgha for selling liquor to an aboriginal native in contravention of the 22nd section of Act 28 of 1883, the defence was raised that the Proclamation was illegal, but the evidence shewed that there were aboriginal natives resident in the village of Komgha when the liquor had been sold, and that the appellant had consented to take his licence subject to the Proclamation.

Held, that although such consent might not estop the appellant from setting up the illegality of the Proclamation, it afforded further evidence to prove that aboriginal natives were located or resident in the village, so as to justify the issuing of the Proclamation.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Acting Resident Magistrate of Komgha in a case in which Henry Viner Brown, the licence-holder of the Central Hotel, Komgha, was convicted of an offence in regard to the supplying of liquor to an aboriginal native. The charge was under the ordinary jurisdiction, Brown being summoned for a contravention of section 22 of Act 28 of 1883. It was alleged in the summons that the district of Komgha had been proclaimed by Proclamation 245 of 1900 to be included in the area in which section 22 of the Act of 1883 was in force. The charge was that of having wrongfully and unlawfully supplied a half-quart bottle of brandy to one Wilhelm, a Kafir. Exception was taken to the summons on the ground that the proclamation was ultra vires. According to the evidence, Wilhelm was a servant of the appellant's. The licence was not produced, but the Government official by whom it was issued stated in evidence that the licence was endorsed as being subject to the provisions of the Proclamation. In evidence for the prosecution, it was stated that 87 boys were employed on railway works at Komgha, and the engineer of the works stated that it would be harmful in his opinion if the unrestricted sale of intoxicants to natives were allowed. There was a location at Komgha, in which there were stated to be some 25 male natives. For the defence, it was stated that at the time the licence was granted the railway works had been started, and no "boys" were then employed thereon. There were then no natives located in the district, excepting a few domestics. After hearing the evidence, the Magistrate imposed a fine of £5. In his reasons the Magistrate stated that in Komgha there was no Municipal Council or Village Management Board when the licence was granted. There were then large public works, including the construction of the Kei-road, while a number of natives were employed on private property in Komgha. The Magistrate stated that for these reasons he considered that the case differed from that of Rex v. Floriquey (13 C.T.R., 652), recently decided on appeal, in respect to a prosecution in the township of Alice.

Mr. McGregor for the appellant. Mr. H. Jones for the Crown.

Mr. McGregor said the appeal raised certain questions respecting the proclamation issued in 1900 prohibiting the supply of liquor to aboriginal natives in districts in certain areas. The questions at issue were analogous to those raised in the cases of Rex v. Mathebus and Rex v. Floriquey, which were recently decided. Notice of appeal had been given to the Attorney-General, in which it was set forth that the appeal was made on the grounds that Proclamation 245 of 1900 was illegal and ultra vires; that Komgha was not an area within the meaning of the Act and was not a locality wherein natives were congregated or resident; that the conviction was not supported by the evidence; and that the decision of the Magistrate was contrary to law. He wished to emphasise the fact that the natives in the district were only birds of passage, and had come into the place since the Proclamation was issued. He submitted that the Proclamation was invalid when it was issued, and that the later events, as shown by the evidence, could not validate it.

Without calling upon Mr. Jones, the Court dismissed the appeal.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is not necessary to hear Mr. Jones on the matter. It is entirely a question of evidence as to whether the place where the liquor was sold was such a place as could lawfully be included in an area, in terms of the 21st and 22nd sections of the Act of 1883. The definition in the 21st section is: "In districts where aboriginal natives of South Africa are located, or resident, or are congregated upon public or other works or mines." In the present case there is evidence which has satisfied the Magistrate that the place where this liquor was sold, viz., the village of Komgha, is a place where aboriginal natives of South Africa are located or resident. In addition to the fact that there are natives located or resident there, there is the further fact that on the commonage immediately adjoining is a location, in which a considerable number of natives are living, and the fact that railway works are being carried on upon which natives are employed in large numbers. Without deciding that the circumstances that there are this location and these railway works would be sufficient, I consider the fact that there are a number of natives resident in this small place, in connection with these circumstances, justified the Magistrate in coming to the conclusion that the district is one which could lawfully be included in an area. There was ample evidence to justify the verdict, and I am bound to add that I am impressed by the remark made by my Brother Kotzé in regard to the fact that the appellant himself had given his consent to the licence being issued subject to the Proclamation. Now, this consent would never have been given if he had not at the time believed there was a sufficient number of natives in the place to constitute it such a place as might be lawfully included in the area. It may be quite true that a defendant in a criminal case cannot be estopped from pleading the illegality of a proclamation under which he is charged, but the fact that the appellant consented to take his licence subject to this condition goes very far as evidence that he and others considered that place to be a place where natives are congregated and resident. For these reasons, I think the appeal should be dismissed.

Mr. Justice Kotzé concurred.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZÉ.]

REHABILITATIONS.

Ex parte DIETERLE. { 1903. Sept. 15th.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the rehabilitation of Frederick William Dieterle. He stated that the estate was sequestrated in 1899, and the debts were £8,791, of which £6,024 were preferent claims. The assets realised £4,184; the costs and charges were £106; and the balance went to pay a preferent creditor, who, however, was not paid in full, consequently nobody else got anything. The applicant was originally a tobacco merchant in Cape Town, and did fairly well, but in 1898 he abandoned this, and took a farm in the Swellendam district. He borrowed money, and the farm did not pay.

An order for rehabilitation was granted.

Ex parte GARDNER.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the rehabilitation of Edward Gardner. The liabilities were £943, and the assets £287, but the latter only realised £188, and the amount for distribution was £147. There was no dividend to concurrent creditors. The trustee's report was favourable. Mr. Buchanan brought to the notice of the Court that there was no certificate by the Master that the trustee had filed the dividend receipts. The trustee was in the country, and could not be induced to file the receipts. Counsel urged that because of this "cornering" of the insolvent by the action of the trustee, the applicant should not be allowed to suffer. It appeared that the insolvent was unsuccessful. Then he took a boarding-house at Cradock, which was even more disastrous, the insolvent having given unlimited credit to boarders.

The Court ordered the application to stand over.

Postea (September 16).

The application was granted.

Ex parte JORDAAN.

Mr. Gardiner moved, under the 117th section of the Insolvent Ordinance for the rehabilitation of Johannes Arnolders Jordaan. There was consent by the creditors.

The application was granted.

Ex parte HARDWICK.

Mr. M. de Villiers moved for the rehabilitation of Alfred William Hardwick, whose estate was sequestrated on May 28, 1901. All the creditors who proved were paid in full, and there was a surplus of £22.

The order was granted.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

DAY V. DAY.

Mr. Buchanan moved for a decree of divorce against Louisa Cornelia Day, born Strydom. The defendant was to have returned to her husband on August 31, or show cause to-day why the bonds of marriage should not be dissolved. The husband had filed an affidavit showing that, up to date, she had not returned.

The Court granted the usual decree.

THOMSON V. THOMSON.

Mr. Upington moved on behalf of Mrs. James Mudie Thomson, for a decree of divorce. The defendant, the husband, should have returned to his wife on August 31, but had not done so. There was an affidavit by the wife to this effect.

A decree of divorce was granted, with costs.

Ex parte McGRATH. { 1903. Sept. 15th.

Act 3 of 1879—Prescription.

In 1863 M. purchased from one W. a certain piece of land. About a year after this purchase had been completed, W.'s estate was sequestrated (as it appeared). The heiress of W. now opposed a rule nisi in favour of M. being made absolute.

Held, that as M. had been in quiet and undisturbed possession of the land for forty years, and more especially as it was not quite clear that the estate of W. had been sequestrated, the rule nisi must be made absolute.

This was an application to have made absolute a rule nisi granted under the Derelict Lands Act.

The affidavit of Sarah Emily Gardiner, of Elsie's River Halt, stated that she was married to James Gardiner, and was the daughter of the late George William White, who was also known as William George White, of Cape Town, and subsequently of Natal. She had perused the order of the Court in this matter published in the "Cape Times," and contended that the George White therein referred to was George William White, her late father. She had reason to believe this, and was aware that one McGrath was in or about the year 1863 a great friend of her father's. In 1864 her father left for Natal, and his estate was compulsorily sequestrated, as far as she could recollect, upon the application of Mr. Kelly. Her father died at Durban in February, 1875, but since the publication of the order of the Court she had been unable to obtain a certified copy of his death notice. She was aware that her late father owned ground at Rondebosch, purchased by him, but of which he never took transfer. At the time of his departure for Natal she was very young, and she had since on various occasions endeavoured to obtain this property, but without avail. She believed that the property referred to in the petition of McGrath was the property belonging to the estate of her late father. She was not aware that petitioner at any time purchased the property. The affidavit of Claude Joubert Watermeyer, attorney, stated that he had searched the insolvency records in the office of the Master of this Court, and found that the estate of one William George White was compulsorily sequestrated on July 12, 1864, and one Petersen was appointed as sole trustee. No account had since been filed in the estate, nor did it appear that the insolvent had since been rehabilitated.

The answering affidavit of Michael McGrath stated that he did not know the respondent (Mrs. Gardiner). He admitted that in 1863 he was friendly with George White, but he did not know that his name was Wm. George White. He was not aware that George White's estate was sequestrated in 1864, or that he died in 1870. Deponent only knew that White received £60 from him in payment for the land in question, and shortly afterwards left the country, and he had never heard of him since.

Mr. Upington for the applicant. Mr. Close for the respondent.

[Kotzé, J.: You have not attached any document showing payment of this £60?]

Mr. Upington: No.

[Kotzé, J.: What is your objection, Mr. Close?]

Mr. Close (for the respondents): I think the creditors should be informed of this application. They seem to know nothing about it. It would seem that the property left was at Somerset West, and nothing seems to have been done in respect of this land. Looking at the affidavit of Gardiner, I would suggest that the matter should be dealt with in some other way.

[Kotzé, J.: What do you suggest? The applicant has been in undisturbed possession forty years.]

That is my difficulty.

Mr. Upington (for the petitioner): There are two grounds on which this petition is based—(1) that the property in question was sold to the petitioner in August, 1863, for £60. This nobody disputes: but if this was so, the property never came into the insolvent estate for W G. White's estate was not sequestrated till July 12, 1864. Then, again, White never got transfer, and it is for that very reason that we have to apply under the Derelict Lands Act. Moreover, the release given by Mostert was given to Geo. White, of Stellenbosch, while the person mentioned in the insolvency proceedings is William George (or James) White, of Somerset West. The only person who now comes forward is this lady, who was only nine years old at the time of the sale. The property is still registered in the name of Mostert. (2) My client has been in undisturbed possession for forty years.

[Mr. Upington was stopped by the Court.]

Kotzé, J.: The applicant, as far back as August, 1863, purchased from one George White, who was also called William George White, a certain piece of land on the main road to Rondebosch, for the sum of £60. Now that fact, it appeared from the petition of applicant, is not denied by respondent, although she says she is not aware that applicant ever purchased this property, but that is not sufficient against his positive statement made on oath that he did purchase it. Then we have the fact that for forty years he has been in the uninterrupted and undisturbed possession of this property. That being so, it seems to me clear that the objection raised by the respondent, namely, that her father's estate was sequestrated, and that this property was an asset in the estate—ought not now to weigh with the Court in considering the application, because the sale took place a year before the alleged insolvency, and also there is some doubt as to whether the estate sequestrated was that of George White, who sold the property. But even assuming for a moment that it is so, I do not think the Court now ought, in view of the fact that the applicant had been in undisturbed possession for so long a period, to refuse to make the rule absolute. The sale, moreover, was nearly a year prior to the sequestration. Consequently, I am of opinion that the rule should be made absolute, respondent to pay the costs of the opposition.

[Applicant's Attorney: C. P. Hughes; Respondent's Attorneys: Herold and Gie.]

Ex parte PALMER.

Mr. Buchanan applied to have made absolute a rule nisi, granted on August 10, under the Derelict Lands Act.

Order granted.

Ex parte DE WET.

Mr. Pyemont applied to have made absolute a rule nisi, issued by His Lordship (the Chief Justice) on March 16, under the Derelict Lands Act. Counsel stated that a letter had been received from the respondent's attorneys saying that they would not object to the rule being made absolute.

Order granted, a declaration to be filed within 14 days.

Ex parte LESSING.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers applied to have made absolute a rule nisi, authorising the petitioner to pass transfer of certain property.

Order granted.

VAN NIEKERK V. VAN NIEKERK.

Mr. Buchanan moved for an order on respondent to pay the sum of £2, in respect to the maintenance of the parties' children.

Mr. Upington appeared for the respondent.

Mr. Buchanan stated that the matter was before the Court on the 20th August, when the petition and affidavits, in which the circumstances of the matter were stated, were read. The case was then ordered to stand over, pending information in regard to the salary of one of the two girls in respect of whose maintenance the application was made. An affidavit was now made by the girl to the effect that she was employed as a teacher, and earned £1 per month. She was engaged to be married, but the date of the marriage was indefinite. Deponent was in a delicate state of health, and in consequence of the small salary she received, she was entirely dependent on the respondent for support. In a replying affidavit, respondent said he was employed in a forage business at Hermann at a salary of £5 a month. He had no interest in the business. The elder daughter had told him that her marriage would take place shortly, and the second daughter had informed him that after her sister's marriage she would take her place in the school as a teacher.

Counsel having been heard in argument,

The Court made an order for the payment of £6 per month, as maintenance of the children.

Kotzé, J., in giving judgment, said: In this matter it appears there are four children of the marriage, two girls and two boys, and when the Court granted a decree of divorce in 1896, the Court also made an order that £2 per month should be paid to the plaintiff—the mother—as maintenance for each child. The Court, however, stated that with regard to the girls, this maintenance was to continue up to their 18th year. Now it seems that both the girls are more than 18 years, the elder girl being 21 and the other 19. Mrs. Niekerk now comes and says that the maintenance of £2 a month in respect to each of the two girls having stopped, she is unable to support them, and that they require support, because they are in a delicate state of health. There are the doctors' certificates in support of that, and though the elder girl is doing her best by teaching in an infant school, for which she gets £1 a month, it is very little. It appears that she is in a delicate state of health, but at the same time she is engaged to be married, and one does not know how soon that marriage will take place. There is nothing to show the Court that it might not take place in the course of a few months. Therefore, as far as the elder girl is concerned, the Court is not prepared at present to make any order. But with reference to the other girl, she is not teaching in school, and, according to the doctor's certificate she seems to be really the more delicate of the two. That also appears from the mother's statement, and under these circumstances I think the maintenance for her ought to be continued, and respondent ordered to contribute £2 per month. I must say it certainly does seem strange that the respondent, who says he is only in receipt of £5 a month, should have been in a position to pay, for the four children, £8 a month, and to marry another wife, and, therefore, I am not quite satisfied that the respondent is a man of very poor circumstances, as suggested by counsel. Under all the circumstances of the case, the order of the Court will be that the respondent pay £6 per month for the maintenance of the second daughter, and of the two boys. Of course, the respondent will have to pay the costs of this application.

PRETORIUS V. PRETORIUS.

Mr. Buchanan made application for a rule nisi, operating as an interdict, to be made absolute. Counsel stated that no opposition was offered by the respondent to this course.

Order granted.

FRIEDLANDER V. KAISER BROS.

This was an application on notice of motion, calling upon the respondent to show cause why an interdict should not be granted restraining him from parting with 200 chairs, valued at £65, until the ownership of the articles had been decided by an action now pending.

Mr. Upington appeared for the applicant and Mr. Buchanan represented the respondent.

Mr. Upington read the affidavit of Maurice Friedlander, in which he stated that the chairs in question had been hired from him by Messrs. Hagerty and Shaw for the purposes of a certain entertainment. Hagerty and Shaw had not paid for the hire of the goods, nor had they paid the respondent for the hire of the hall in which the entertainment was held; and the respondent now retained the chairs in lieu of the rent of the hall. Deponent had an order for 1,000 chairs in hand, and these 200 chairs were required to complete the order.

Mr. Buchanan said that if it could be proved that the chairs had been hired from the applicant, the respondent was willing to give them up.

Kotzé, J., suggested that the applicant should deposit the sum of £65 with the registrar, who might give up the chairs under these circumstances, pending the action to decide the ownership of the articles.

Mr. Upington said that the applicant only required an interdict, restraining the respondent from parting with the chairs.

His Lordship pointed out that applicant, in his affidavit, stated he required the chairs to complete an order.

Mr. Buchanan said that he had no objection to his lordship's suggestion being followed.

Mr. Upington said that he was not instructed as to whether his client would agree to that course.

His Lordship said that he merely threw out the suggestion as a means of surmounting the present difficulty.

The case was allowed to stand over until to-morrow.

Postea (September 16):

Order granted in the following terms, by consent: "The applicant is to deposit the sum of £65 with the Registrar, pending the result of an action to be brought by the applicant for the purpose of having declared that the 200 chairs are his (the applicant's) property, and upon such deposit being made, the 200 chairs are to be returned, or restored by the respondent to the applicant, and costs to be costs in the cause."

McKAY V. DUFFY.

This was a motion on notice calling upon the respondent to show cause why a certain rule nisi interdicting the respondent from refusing to allow the applicant free access to a certain passage should not be made absolute.

The affidavit of the applicant stated that the respondent had denied the applicant access to the passage in question, which led into some stores in Bree-street, by locking the door, or by blocking it up with cases, so that the door could not be used.

Respondent's answering affidavit stated that had the applicant asked for a key to the door, before coming into court, the matter could have been amicably settled. If, however, deponent was compelled to keep the door always open, he would be forced to leave the premises, and to sue the applicant for damages.

The answering affidavit of the applicant denied that the door had always been closed.

Mr. Gardiner appeared for the applicant, and Mr. Upington was for the respondent.

[Kotzé, J.: Will the respondent agree to supply the applicant with a key to the door within three days?]

Mr. Upington said that the respondent would be willing to supply a key, but he presumed that the three days would not be insisted upon if everything were done to have the key made as quickly as possible. His client could scarcely undertake to have the key made in so short a time—for Cape Town, at least, the time was short—but he would do everything possible to have it done.

[Kotzé, J.: I consider the time reasonable.]

Mr. Upington submitted that plaintiff should be ordered to pay the costs, at any rate from the time at which the offer was made of a duplicate key.

Kotzé, J., in giving judgment, said: In this matter it seems to me that the respondent was not justified in refusing reasonable access to the store at the back of the yard. However, in his affidavit, he expresses his willingness to supply the applicant, or the lessee under the applicant, viz., Wilson, with a duplicate key, so as to enable him to have access to the yard or store by opening the gate, and on condition, therefore, that the respondent supplies the applicant with such a duplicate key, the rule will be discharged. But I think the applicant is entitled to the costs of this application, because it was due to the respondent that he (the applicant) was obliged to come to the Court.

Mr. Gardiner: Will your Lordship stipulate any time within which the key is to be supplied?

Kotzé, J.: Three days.

DREW AND CO. V. YE MECCA CAFE.

Mr. Gardiner applied to make absolute a rule nisi calling upon the respondent company to show cause why the company should not be wound up under the provisions of the Companies Act of 1892, and why an official liquidator should not be appointed.

The rule was made absolute, and the Court appointed Mr. E. R. Syfret as official liquidator.

AFRICAN BANKING CORPORATION V. A. F. HILLS AND OTHERS.

Mr. McGregor moved for leave to take certain evidence on commission in England.

Mr. Close appeared for the respondent Hills personally and as receiver of the Grand Junction Railways.

Mr. McGregor said that the liquidator of the Grand Junction Railways, Ltd., was joined in the action, but no notice of this application had been served upon him. He simply formally joined in the action, which was set down for hearing on the 16th October. Counsel read an affidavit by the attorneys for the African Banking Corporation, in which it was stated that the Corporation desired to have taken on commission in London the evidence of certain of its officials for the purpose of substantiating certain allegations set forth in the declaration, which evidence was not procurable in this colony.

Mr. Close read the replying affidavit of defendants' attorney, in the course of which it was stated that the only fact in dispute on the pleadings was the question whether notice was given to the African Banking Corporation of the assignment of certain contracts. The matter had been postponed from time to time, and if the application for a commission were not granted the case could not be heard next term. The interests of creditors of the Grand Junction Railways would be damaged by the delay.

Mr. McGregor, in argument, stated that it was not now possible to give the names of the officials in the London office whose evidence it was desired to take. As to the statement made on respondents' behalf that the case could not be heard next term, counsel pointed out that if leave were granted and authority sent by next mail to take the evidence, the evidence would be here and ready in the first week in November. There was, he submitted, every probability of the case being taken next term. He submitted that no prejudice had been shown and that the balance of convenience was distinctly in favour of such a commission being granted.

Mr. Close referred to the extreme urgency of having the matter settled. The sum of £76,000 was awarded by the judgment of the Court to Mr. Hills. The Court subsequently interdicted the payment of the money to Hills, but, in granting the interdict, the Court specially stipulated that it would only be granted until the end of the month of August. The case was set down for the 31st August, but was afterwards postponed on the application of the present applicants until the 4th September. It was again postponed, and finally set down for the 16th October. He submitted that if the present application were granted it would jeopardise the chances of having the case determined in the October term. All sorts of difficulties might arise in getting the evidence on commission, and it was extremely unlikely that the evidence would be here by the first week in November. If the case were not heard in the next term it would have to stand over until February, and this would involve serious loss.

Kotzé, J.: This is an application for a commission de bene esse, to take the evidence of certain employees of the plaintiff company in London. Objection is made on behalf of the respondents, who are the defendants in the action, that great delay might occur if the Court grants this application, and that there is the possibility, even a probability, of the case having to go over the November term; but I think that, if the Court were to grant the application in the alternative by the appointment of one Commissioner, and of another if the commissioner first appointed is not in London, that difficulty would be, to a large extent, overcome, especially if the Court fixes another day in next term, later than the day upon which the action is now fixed for trial for the is now fixed for determination, for the hearing of the case. I must say that, weighing all the circumstances, the balance of convenience seems to be with the plaintiff in this matter, and the plaintiff must surely be quite as anxious as the defendant to have this case go to trial as soon as possible. The Court will grant the application, and will appoint as commissioner Mr. Macarness, and, failing him, Mr. McLean, and will fix the 12th November for the hearing to the action. Of course, it is understood that the applicants must be prompt in the matter of the commission, and have it returned as soon as possible.

Mr. Close asked that it might be ordered that the trial take place on the day named, whether the commission were then returned or not.

Kotzé, J., said he thought it might be better to substitute Mr. Mossop in place of Mr. McLean. Mr. Mossop was an attorney, and would most likely be in the City. He had acted in the capacity of commissioner for the Court previously, and the Court would therefore appoint him as commissioner, failing Mr. McLean. Costs would be costs in the cause.

Ex parte HUMAN.

Mr. Buchanan moved for leave to mortgage certain property, in order to pay a deficiency in the estate of the testator, from whom the minors, of whom petitioner was the natural guardian, inherited the property sought to be mortgaged. The executor approved of the application, and the Master also made a recommendation.

An order was granted in terms of the Master's report.

Ex parte ATHERSTONE.

Mr. Buchanan moved for an order authorising the appointment of a trustee. The present trustee was not in the Colony, and had declined to deal with the property, alleging that the estate had been finally wound up. The appointment of a trustee was asked, in order that a certain asset might be dealt with, this asset having come to light since the last report was filed.

Kotzé, J.: In this matter, as the trustee, Mr. Black, is absent from the Colony, and is resident now in England, he has practically ceased to be a trustee under the Ordinance, and the Court has power to give instructions for the election of a trustee. Such an order will naturally include in itself authority to the Master to take such steps as are necessary to carry out that order. The order the Court will make now is that a new trustee be elected.

HOFFMAN V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. Howel Jones (for the Government) moved for leave to sign judgment against plaintiff for not having proceeded with his action within the stipulated period.

There was no appearance for the respondent, and the application was granted.

RAKOFF V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. Howel Jones applied on behalf of the Government for leave to sign judgment against the plaintiff (Rakoff) for not having proceeded with his action within the time prescribed by Rule of Court.

Mr. Close appeared for the respondent.

Mr. Howel Jones put in an affidavit supporting the application, and stating that the time fixed by the Rules of the Court in which the case should have been proceeded with had expired.

Mr. Close put in an answering affidavit of the plaintiff (now respondent), stating that the plaintiff had been suffering from ill-health, which prevented him from proceeding with the case, although he had desired to do so. He now asked for leave to purge his default and to file his declaration. A medical certificate was annexed in support, stating that the plaintiff had been suffering from bronchitis since June 25, and that he was unable to travel.

His Lordship asked on what grounds the claim was made.

Mr. Close replied that he did not know, as he had not seen a copy of the summons. He submitted that, while there had been some delay on the part of the plaintiff, the Court should not now be so strict as to refuse removal of bar, since the plaintiff had been prevented by illness from giving instructions for the declaration.

Mr. Jones said that the medical certificate only stated that the plaintiff was ill on June 26, and that he was unable to travel on that one day. Counsel further pointed out that the summons did not state the cause of action, and the Government was, therefore, ignorant as to the nature of the claim.

Kotzé, J.: In this matter, the applicant—the Government—who is the defendant in the action, asks for leave to sign judgment against the plaintiff, the latter not having gone on with the action, and filed his declaration within the time prescribed by the rules of Court. As against that, the plaintiff now appears, and asks for permission or leave to purge his default, and file his declaration. Now, it is quite apparent there has been some delay on the part of the plaintiff, but on the other hand, again, the medical certificates show he has for some weeks or months been suffering from ill-health, and under all the circumstances of the case I do not think this is an instance where the Court should now peremptorily order that judgment should be entered for the defendant against the plaintiff. It is true that all that is alleged in the summons is that he is claiming against the Government for damages; but it is not usual in the summons to state particulars of the damages. The object of the summons is to bring the defendant before the Court; the real facts upon which the plaintiff relies in regard to his claim for damages are generally set forth in the declaration. I think the plaintiff will be sufficiently punished for his delay by having to pay the costs. I am of opinion, therefore, that this is a case in which the Court should not allow judgment to be entered against the plaintiff, but should grant plaintiff leave to purge his default, and to file his declaration within fourteen days, on payment of the costs.

Ex parte COWELL AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Gardiner, for petitioners, moved for an order authorising the execution and registration of a marriage contract between petitioner and his wife to keep their two estates separate, and for the wife to keep the property to which she was entitled at the time of the marriage, which was solemnised on June 25 last.

The matter was ordered to stand over until October 12, and, in the meantime, a marriage contract to be drawn up for submission to the Court.

HARRIS V. DU TOIT.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for the appointment of a commission to take the evidence at Johannesburg of David Anderson Blyth, who was too old to attend the court to give evidence personally.

The Court appointed Mr. Saul Solomon commissioner.

THE MASTER V. DICKSON.

Mr. Howel Jones moved for an order compelling respondent to file a certain liquidation account.

Respondent was ordered to file the account within a month, and to pay the costs of the application.

Ex parte BARNARD AND OTHERS.

Mr. Close moved for an order confirming the sale of certain property, in which certain minors were interested. The Master recommended that an order should be granted in terms of the prayer. The shares accruing to the minors out of the proceeds to be paid into the Guardians' Fund.

The order was granted in terms of the Master's report.

RAUCH V. RAUCH AND SCOTT.

This was an application regarding the payment of alimony.

Mr. Buchanan was for applicant, and Mr Greer for respondents.

The parties were married at Somerset East in May, 1895, and there were two children of the marriage. The husband is bringing an action against his wife for divorce, and she now applied for an order to compel him to pay her a sufficient sum to enable her to defend the suit and, meantime, for funds for her maintenance.

Mr. Buchanan read an affidavit by the wife, who stated that her husband was employed in the Railway Department in Cape Town at a wage of £12 per month and overtime. He also had saved money. She had a good answer to the action for divorce.

Mr. Greer said the husband was willing to pay his wife £1 10s. per month, and to provide her with a room and groceries. The wife had left the home provided for her by her husband, who was supporting the two children of the marriage. He submitted that the husband had a very strong cause of action, and had done all he possibly could with regard to maintaining his wife.

Kotzé, J.: In this matter I do not wish to say anything which might prejudice the merits of the case. The application is twofold. First, the petitioner asks for a certain sum of money by way of interim maintenance, and secondly she asks that the husband be ordered to deposit a certain sum of money sufficient to enable her to defend the action for divorce. Now, from the facts put very ably before the Court by Mr. Greer, I do not think this is an application in respect of which I ought to meet the wishes of the applicant. It appears that the husband is actually paying his wife £1 10s. per month, and so far as his ability to contribute towards the expense of her defence is concerned, it seems to me he is in a position where he receives the very moderate salary of £12 per month, and he has besides two minor children and himself to support, and also to pay the expenses of his own action. Therefore he is not in a position, even if the Court ordered him, to deposit a certain sum to enable his wife to defend the suit. On the other hand, the wife will not be prevented at the trial from bringing forward the facts which she may wish to advance for her defence. If she has no means the law provides a remedy by allowing an application to be made for leave to sue in forma pauperis. Seeing she is anxious to defend the action, it will be open to her to make such an application. The present application is therefore refused.

Ex parte GRAND JUNCTION RAILWAYS, LTD.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the confirmation of the liquidator's report.

The application was granted, leave being given to the liquidator to apply at a later stage for the directions of the Court.

Ex parte DUFF. { 1903. Sept. 15th. „ 16th.

Attorney—Examiners outside the jurisdiction of the Court.

Examiners residing outside the jurisdiction of the Court who possess the qualifications required by Rule 293, appointed to examine an applicant residing outside the jurisdiction of the Court, with a view to his admission as an attorney of the Court.

Mr. Buchanan moved for an order authorising the examination of the petitioner at Pretoria as an attorney-at-law.

Mr. Upington opposed the application on behalf of the Incorporated Law Society.

Mr. Buchanan said applicant had passed his law certificate examination, and had served his articles in the Colony, he was unable to come to Cape Town to pass his practical examination, as his employers refused to give the necessary leave of absence, he having already had a week's leave on account of ill-health.

Mr. Buchanan pointed out that the Incorporated Law Society had given no notice of their opposition.

[Kotzé, J.: Their objection may be of a legal character.]

Mr. Buchanan: Anyone else has to give notice of objection, and I do not see why the Law Society should be specially favoured in this matter. This is not the first time within my knowledge that such a thing has happened.

Mr. Upington maintained that it was not wise to establish a new precedent in this matter. There were examiners here appointed by the Court for the purpose of holding examinations, gentlemen of very high standing in their profession, and in the practice of that Court, which differed to a great extent from the practice of the Court in the Transvaal. The Law Society felt that unless it was an exceptional case, no exception should be made.

[Kotzé, J.: How can the Court make an exception; it must go by a general rule.]

The Court has made exceptions. The Law Society feel that this is a very ordinary case, and that it is not wise to appoint examiners altogether outside the jurisdiction of the Court.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (September 16).

Kotzé, J.: In this matter, which came before me yesterday, I have looked into the report of the application of one Holderness which came before this Court on the 17th of April last (13 C.T.R., 254). In that case it appears that Holderness had passed on examination as attorney in Bulawayo, having been examined by examiners resident in Bulawayo, and was duly admitted as an attorney by the High Court of Southern Rhodesia. He then applied for his admission in this Court as an attorney, or, otherwise, that this Court should appoint examiners to examine him in the practical part of his profession, with a view to his admission by this Court; and in the course of the judgment the Chief Justice said that, inasmuch as Mr. Holderness had already been admitted, he did not see the necessity for any further examination, and that, if it had been necessary to appoint examiners, he probably would have appointed the same gentlemen who had already examined him in Rhodesia at Bulawayo. From that I draw the inference that the Court saw no objection to examiners being appointed outside the jurisdiction of the Court, but then, when I read Rule 293, I find it is said there that, when the Court does appoint examiners, they must be examiners who possess particular qualifications, viz., they must be an advocate of the Supreme Court and two attorneys of the Supreme Court. Now, in the present case, it so happens there are learned gentlemen in Pretoria who comply with these qualifications, and therefore, following the practice indicated by the case of Holderness, I will now appoint as examiners Mr. Advocate Esselen, who is also an advocate of this Court, and Attorneys J. H. L. Findlay and William Nixon, who are attorneys of more than seven years' standing in this Court. They are to examine the applicant in the practical part of his profession for admission as an attorney of this Court, and will make their report to this Court through the Registrar.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZÉ.]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

GIRATIE v. ESTATE GODDESS. { 1903. Sept. 16th.

This was an application on motion, under section 103 of the Insolvent Ordinance, for an order requiring the trustee in the insolvent estate of Goddess to deliver up a certain agreement of sale and also possession of certain premises, thereby sold, and also for costs of suit.

The Widow Giratie, in her affidavit, stated that in 1901 she sold to the insolvent certain property in Hanover-street, Cape Town, for £2,500, on terms set forth in a certain broker's note. Interest was to be paid on the sum owing under the purchase from the 1st October, at 6 per cent. The insolvent took possession of the property on the 4th October, 1901, and from time to time paid certain instalments of the purchase price; but it did not appear that the insolvent would be able to take transfer of the property within a reasonable time. He declined to give up possession. Deponent obtained judgment against the insolvent on the 6th February, 1903, for the balance of the purchase, £2,400. She was still prepared to cancel the sale, but this the insolvent declined to do, and deponent was then compelled to take proceedings to have his estate placed under sequestration. Subsequently, on the appointment of a trustee, letters were written to the trustee asking him to decide whether he would execute the agreement for the purchase, or abandon it. The insolvent was still in possession of the premises, and was not taking proper care of the same, and deponent was desirous, either of receiving possession of the property again, or the money for which it was sold. The letters were at first ignored, but afterwards, when notice of the present application was given, the trustee replied that he was not prepared to cancel the agreement without the instructions of creditors, which he proposed to take at the third meeting, to be held on the 2nd October, when he should recommend that the sale should be abandoned.

Mr. M. de Villiers for the applicant. Mr. Pyemont for the respondent.

[Kotzé, J.: The whole question is whether the trustee's contention that he must wait till a meeting of creditors is correct?]

Mr. M. de Villiers (for the applicant): Partly so. According to the Insolvent Ordinance (section 103) it is in the discretion of the trustee to elect whether to hold a sale of the insolvent's property or not. In this case the property is rapidly deteriorating, every opportunity has been given to the insolvent to take such steps as may render the sale unnecessary, and the applicant is the largest creditor. It is for the trustee to decide whether to hold the sale or not, and he need not consult the creditors.

[Kotzé, J.: There may be cases in which the trustee does not wish to take the responsibility.]

Mr. Pyemont (for the respondent): This action is premature—I cannot find any similar case. It is for the Master to fix the date of the meeting of creditors. The letter of August 8 was written before any trustee had been appointed. When he was appointed he called a meeting at the earliest practicable date. It could not legally have been called till September 13, and yet the trustee was called upon to elect on September 12, whether he would hold to the sale or not. The practice is for the trustee to consult the creditors at the third meeting. The English Act of 1883 allowed the trustee three months within which to elect. A later Act extended this period to twelve months, thereby showing that three months was not considered a sufficient time. The applicant has already obtained judgment for £2.400, and if he gets his order he will have the property as well. As to the deterioration of the land, even if no order is made the applicant will not suffer, because he can always come to the Court for damages.

[Kotzé, J.: Why did the trustee delay so long before taking action?]

I cannot say, he is not at present in town, but he virtually asked the applicant to withdraw, and explained what arrangements he had made in respect of the meetings of creditors. The applicant never gave the trustee an opportunity of consulting the creditors.

[Kotzé, J.: Should the trustee do anything without consulting the creditors, would he not be personally liable?]

[Mr. Melius de Villiers: No, he can fall back on the Insolvent Ordinance. The applicant is a poor woman, and she can get neither her property nor her money.]

[Kotzé, J.: But the trustee is acting on behalf of the creditors.]

And the applicant is the chief of these —section 103 of the Insolvent Ordinance is perfectly clear.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

The Court ordered the trustee to consult the creditors, and abide by their decision.

Postea.

Ex parte SCHOOMBIE.

Mr. De Waal moved on behalf of the petitioner for an order removing one John McAllister from executorship, under the will of petitioner's sister, Elizabeth Maria McAllister (born Schoombie). The testatrix made her child sole heir, and it appeared that the said McAllister had left for Johannesburg, and that his present whereabout were unknown. He left the minor child with the petitioner without any means of support, and the liquidation and administration of the estate of the late Mrs. McAllister could not be proceeded with, owing to his absence. Petitioner prayed for an order for the removal of McAllister from the executor-ship, and the appointment of an executor dative in the said estate and a guardian to the said minor.

Rule nisi granted, calling upon McAllister to show cause on the 15th October why the prayer of the petitioner should not be granted, rule to be served personally, failing which, publication in two newspapers circulating in Johannesburg.

Ex parte GOUS.

Mr. Buchanan moved for leave to sell certain property bequeathed by the late Andries Stephanus Gous to the male children of his marriage, and subject to a life interest by his surviving spouse. The property sought to be sold comprised a twenty-fourth share in a certain farm, for which an offer of £181 12s. had been received, and there were interested three major and three minor heirs.

The Master's report was as follows: "In view of the facts set forth in the petition, I beg to recommend that an order should be granted confirming the proposed sale of a twenty-fourth part or share of the farm Heeren Logement (locally known as Klipfontein) to one Johannes C. de Jongh, and that the Registrar of Deeds be authorised to pass transfer thereof to the said purchaser. The shares accruing to the three minors out of the proceeds of such sale to be paid into the Guardians' Fund."

Order granted in terms of the Master's report.

Ex parte BENJAMIN AND FRANK WHEELER.

Mr. Upington, for the petitioners, said that this matter had been before the Court on a previous occasion (see page 801). The petitioners applied for leave to sell certain two diamond rings, pledged to them by one McKee Rankin. A dispute arose in connection with the playing rights of "Magda." Rankin was the manager of a company which had been billed to play "Magda" at the Good Hope Theatre, and Messrs. Wheeler were defendants in an action brought by one Sass to determine the company's playing rights. Rankin gave a guarantee to the Wheelers that he would be responsible for the action. Thereafter, Rankin's company was leaving the Colony, and the Wheelers took proceedings to have him stopped until he had deposited security to cover the indemnity and the guarantee. The Court thereupon ordered that the sum of £226, which was in the possession of the Wheelers, and due to Rankin, should be retained by them as security, and upon those terms Rankin was allowed to go. He appeared to have been in want of funds to take the company Home, and then an arrangement was entered into between Rankin and the Wheelers by which the Wheelers paid over this sum of £226, and Rankin deposited as a pledge certain two diamond rings, which were valued at £240. He gave a written document in which he pledged himself to repay the sum of £226 9s. 3d. by the 31st December, 1902, and if he failed to pay by that date he authorised the Wheelers to realise the diamonds, and pay the proceeds into court, in accordance with the order that the Court made. Now, the Wheelers applied to the Court for a denunciation. The matter had been standing over, because the Court felt, he believed, that as these were valuable rings it might be difficult to obtain a purchaser, and that some effort should be made by the petitioners to see if they could not sell them by private contract for an amount somewhere about the value which Rankin's jeweller set upon them. They had made efforts to sell the rings, and amongst the people applied to was the jeweller himself, but he was by no means prepared to pay the value that he set upon the rings when applied to before. Counsel said the petitioners now had no knowledge of the exact whereabouts of Mrs. Drew, Mr. McKee Rankin's daughter, who had offered to pay Messrs. Wheeler the sum of £160, and to redeem the jewellery from them. When this offer was made, the petitioners could not sell without the authority of the Court. An offer had been made of £155 for the jewellery by a jeweller.

The matter was ordered to stand over until Friday morning, in order that a valuation of the jewellery might be made.

Postea (September 18).

Mr. Upington said that since the matter was last before the Court, he had obtained affidavits, as suggested by their lordships, from two jewellers. Philip Myers made an offer of £155 for the two diamond rings pledged by McKee Rankin with the petitioners as security in an action concerning certain playing rights in "Magda," and another jeweller, Philip Harris, also made a similar offer. Counsel read a third affidavit from one Harry Farrell, stating that he had noticed from the newspapers that this application was pending, and he was prepared to pay £175 cash for the rings, provided this offer were accepted by Wednesday, the 23rd inst.

An order was granted authorising the sale of the rings for the sum of £175 cash, and the payment from the proceeds of £85 to Messrs. Tredgold, McIntyre, and Bisset, as attorneys for Mr. Sass, in the case of Sass v. Wheelers and £75 costs incurred by Wheelers in the cases of Sass v. Wheelers and Wheelers v. McKee Rankin, plus the costs of the present application, any balance remaining to be deposited for and on behalf of the said McKee Rankin with the Master of the Court.

BARTHOLOMEW V. GEISSLER.

Mr. McGregor moved for leave to sue by edictal citation. Judgment had been given in the Magistrate's Court for £32 9s., and a writ of execution had been issued against respondent's movables, to which a return of nulla bona had been made. Geissler at present resided at Johannesburg. He was stated to have landed property in the Colony.

[Kotzé, J.: Applicant has the ordinary remedy of proceeding against the movable property, a judgment of a competent Court having been obtained for the amount.]

Counsel said that applicant wished to sue provisionally, and obtain provisional sentence on the judgment of the Magistrate.

Leave was granted to sue by edictal citation provisionally, the citation being made returnable on the 15th October, personal service to be effected.

Ex parte CHAPMAN.

Mr. Buchanan moved for leave to execute an ante-nuptial contract after marriage. Petitioner, acting as attorney for one Losper, was instructed to draw up an ante-nuptial contract between Losper and a lady named Wessels. Before the contract was executed, the marriage took place. It was stated that the contracting parties were under the impression that all they had to do was to sign the power of attorney, which they did prior to the ceremony. The parties had now gone to Johannesburg, but were not domiciled there, and so could not apply to the Transvaal Court.

Leave was granted to have a contract drawn up in terms of the power of attorney, subject to the rights of creditors between the marriage and the registration.

Ex parte DIBBEN.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for authority to register a certain deed of servitude.

Granted.

WRIGHT V. WRIGHT. { 1903. Sept. 16th.

Divorce—Domicile—Jurisdiction.

Jurisdiction in the matter of divorce is founded on the domicile of the husband.

Mr. Gardiner moved for leave to sue by edictal citation.

The applicant is Rose Mary Wright, and the respondent is her husband, Dan Wright. The parties were married in Melbourne in 1895. They came to live at Cape Town, whence respondent proceeded to Melbourne in October, 1901. He left applicant here, and had taken no notice of repeated applications for money to maintain his wife and child. Petitioner wished to sue for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, for divorce, on the ground of malicious desertion. It was stated in affidavit that defendant left for Australia in connection with a business venture, it being understood that he was not going to remain there, but intended to return to the Cape. The business was one connected with the sending of wheat from Australia to the Cape.

[Kotzé, J.: What jurisdiction has the Court in this case?]

Mr. Gardiner (for applicant): The respondent came to this country with his wife, he resided here for five years, and established a domicile here, and that domicile he has never abandoned.

[Kotzé, J.: He has gone back to Australia.]

Non constat, that, he has taken up a domicile there. He has gone merely to conduct a branch of a Cape Town business. I would suggest that the order be granted, subject to no objection being successfully raised by the respondent.

Kotzé, J.: In this matter there is some doubt as to whether the husband and the applicant are domiciled in the Cape Colony, and whether, after all, the real domicile is not in Australia. Whatever my own personal opinion may be with reference to the question of jurisdiction in matters of divorce, this case shows that the rule insisting in all instances that jurisdiction must be founded upon the domicile of the husband may operate very harshly, because, supposing the defendant, who is the husband, were to be really domiciled or taken to be domiciled in Australia, then, if his wife has no means, she is unable to proceed to Australia to obtain a divorce there in the Court of the domicile of the husband. But however that may be, the law which this Court has to follow has been laid down in the matter by the Privy Council, in the case of Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier, and it is not necessary now for me to say more than that I will grant the leave asked for, that is, to sue the husband by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights, and failing that, for divorce. It must be distinctly understood that this will be subject to the Court itself raising the question of jurisdiction, or to the husband raising objection. It is quite possible, however, that the applicant may be in a position to lay such facts before the Court as will show clearly that this Court has jurisdiction, and that the absence of the husband is only temporary. The application will, therefore, be granted.

LORENZ V. LORENZ.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved, on behalf of Reyner Lorenz, for a commission de bene esse in connection with an action for divorce, instituted against her husband. The evidence of plaintiff, who is resident in Holland, was required. Respondent resided at Beaufort West.

The application was granted, Mr. Ernest Scheides being appointed commissioner.

Kotzé, J.: In this case, also, it must be understood that the order will be subject to the question of jurisdiction being raised either by the defendant or the Court itself.

Ex parte VAN DER SPUY.

Mr. Buchanan moved for an order authorising petitioner to take transfer of certain property. Petitioner was the executor in the estate from which the property was asked to be transferred. He had made the highest tender for the property, after tenders had been publicly invited. The amount of the tender—£50—was stated to be a fair one.

Order granted.

Ex parte MASTERTON.

Mr. Upington moved to have a certain contract of sale annulled.

The petition set forth that in December, 1902, petitioner sold certain property to Edward M. Bray and Wm. S. Tarry for £1,000. The purchase price had not been paid. Judgment had been obtained against Bray and Tarry, and a writ of execution had been issued, but the judgment had not been satisfied in any part. Bray and Tarry could not now be found. The petitioner had an offer for the property, but was unable to sell while the contract of sale subsisted. Petitioner was prepared to waive his rights under the judgment if the sale were annulled.

Kotzé, J.: On that condition I will give you the order.

Ex parte CARNOVSKI AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Pyemont moved for an order dissolving a certain partnership. Applicant's affidavit stated that his fellow partner—Eren Berman—was away in Europe, and had committed acts prejudicial to the partnership business. He was not expected to return to this country.

Kotzé, J.: In this matter it appears that the partner of the applicant, one Berman, left this Colony, taking with him the sum of £1,750, which, it is alleged, belonged to the business; and it is also alleged that he falsified entries in the books, making it appear that £1,500 of this £1,750 was paid by him to a certain person of the name of Provoski. Mr. Provoski himself has not made an affidavit; it is said his present whereabouts are not known. Still the applicant and his agent, Jackson, have both made affidavits, in which they say they saw Provoski, and the latter denied all knowledge of having received any money from Berman. Be that as it may, it is quite clear that the applicant must have lost all personal trust and confidence in Berman, who, in the absence of the applicant, left the business and went to Europe, and his present whereabouts being, it is said, unknown. Under these circumstances, seeing that the personal trust and confidence between the partners is no more, the Court will dissolve the partnership existing between the applicant and Eren Berman, and will appoint, as joint receivers, Mr. Edward Ridge Syfret and the applicant, Carnovski. The costs of the application will come out of Berman's share, if any.

Ex parte LLOYD.

Mr. Buchanan moved for an order authorising the Master to pay to petitioner certain moneys for the education and maintenance of the minor, Russell W. Lloyd.

The Master's report (from which the facts of the case sufficiently appear) was as follows: "The petitioner is the duly-appointed tutor dative to the minor S. E. Lloyd, to whose credit a sum of £216 2s. 11d. has lately been paid into the Guardians' Fund for account of the inheritance accruing to her out of her late father's estate. It is anticipated that a further sum of about £30 will also so accrue to her. It is now desired to place the minor at S. Hilda's School for Girls, Kloof-street, Cape Town, for a period of one year, to enable her to complete her education. It seems to me that it would be for the benefit of the minor to accede to the application. I, therefore, beg to recommend that your Lordships may be pleased to grant an order authorising the Master of the Court to pay over to the petitioner in quarterly instalments the sum of £75 out of the moneys standing to credit of the said minor in the Guardians' Fund for the purpose of defraying the cost of the education and maintenance of the said minor, and the costs of this application."

The Court granted an order in terms of the Master's report.

Ex parte SILBERBAUER AND OTHERS.

Mr. Buchanan moved in the matter of the petition of Silberbauer, Wahl and Fuller, acting as attorneys for one F. W. B. Wilmot, of Laingsburg. Counsel said the case involved a peculiar point of practice. It appeared that Wilmot, acting as agent for FitzRoy George, of Johannesburg, obtained judgment against one G. R. Rogers, of Laingsburg, on a promissory note for £10. A writ of execution was issued, but the execution debtor made an assignment of his property, to which assignment Wilmot refused to be a party. When the messenger went to execute at Rogers's business place, he found the place locked up. He was told that the key was in the hands of Mr. Walter, of the firm of Krige and Walter, law agents. Mr. Walter told the messenger he (Walter) was in possession of the assets, and refused to give up the key, so that no attachment could be made. All the creditors, with the exception of Wilmot, agreed to the assignment. Petitioners contended that the action of Walter in refusing to give up the key was illegal, inasmuch as Wilmot had not consented to the assignment; and applied for an order compelling Walter to give up the key, and to pay the costs of the application. The amount of the judgment was £10, with £2 10s. costs. Notice had not been served on Walter.

Kotzé, J., said he would make an order on Messrs. Krige and Walter to give up the key, and to allow the messenger of the Court at Laingsburg to attach so much of the property as was necessary to satisfy the judgment. The other creditors, if they wished to sequestrate the estate, could take action.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZÉ.]

ADMISSION. { 1903. Sept. 18th.

Mr. Rainsford moved for the admission of Albert Claus Heinrich Wilhelm Cluver as an attorney-at-law and notary public.

Application granted, and oath administered.

GENERAL MOTION.

STEVENS v. STEVENS.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved, on behalf of the petitioner, for leave to sue her husband, Frederick Stevens, by edictal citation, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, a decree of divorce. Petitioner stated that she was at present residing in Station-road, Woodstock. She was married to the respondent in Cape Town in 1900, but in 1902 he maliciously deserted her, and was now living in Tasmania.

Kotzé, J.: Under the circumstances, as the applicant says that she was married to her husband, Frederick Stevens, in November, 1900, and that he had deserted her and gone to Tasmania, the Court will grant her leave to sue him by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights, failing that, divorce; but it must be distinctly understood that it is subject to any question or objection as to jurisdiction which may be raised at a later stage. Personal service must be effected, the rule to be returnable on the 1st February next.

RUTHERFORD AND MASON V. MYBURGH. } 1903. Sept. 18th.

The Pounds and Trespasses Act, 1892, section 36, sub-section (5)—Convenient time.

A Field-cornet at 4 p.m. appointed 9 a.m. the following day for the purposes of inspecting the land trespassed upon, and sent a message to M., the owner of the cattle which had trespassed, to that effect. This message did not reach M. until 8 p.m. The next morning M., on proceeding to a neighbour, for the purpose of getting him to act as his arbitrator, found that his neighbour was ill; M. then drove into Stellenbosch to secure another arbitrator. On arriving on the land trespassed upon with his arbitrator, M. found the Field-cornet and the other arbitrator moving off the land, and they informed him he was too late and that the damage had already been assessed. The Magistrate held that under the circumstances a sufficiently convenient time had not been allowed. On appeal, the Court refused to reverse the Magistrate's decision.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Stellenbosch, in an action brought by the plaintiffs to recover £8 4s. from the defendant, being damages and costs assessed by a Field-cornet under the Pounds Act.

The action was brought in the Magistrate's Court at Stellenbosch to recover damages sustained in his garden at Klapmuts, owing to trespass by goats and sheep belonging to the defendant, J. A. Myburgh. The plaintiffs had given notice to the defendant at eight o'clock in the evening that the damages would be assessed at 9 o'clock the following morning. The defendant did not arrive on the ground with his arbitrator until the assessor, Dirk Cloete, Field-cornet for the Klapmuts Ward, had completed his assessment, and the Field-cornet refused to re-consider his decision.

The Magistrate, in giving absolution from the instance, said that the defendant seemed to have had some difficulty in finding a landowner to act as arbitrator, and that he eventually arrived on the ground trespassed on between 9 and 10 o'clock on the day appointed, and that he was then informed that the assessment had been made, and could not again be gone into. He (the Magistrate) gave absolution from the instance, on the ground, as had been urged by the defendant, that the time allowed to him to be represented at the assessment was not "convenient" within the meaning of sub-section 5 of section 36 of Act 15 of 1892. Defendant was not allowed a reasonable time in which to secure a landowner as arbitrator, whereby the intention of the Act was defeated.

Mr. Upington (for appellant): The point in this case is, whether the time fixed by the Field-cornet for assessing the damage was a "convenient time" within the meaning of sub-section 5, section 36, of Act 15 of 1892. We contend that it was. Section 36 provides that the damage shall be assessed by the nearest Field-cornet or Justice of the Peace, with two landowners as arbitrators. The proprietor of the land on which the damage is done appoints one arbitrator and the owner of the cattle the other.

[Kotzé, J.: But the point is: was the time convenient?]

Yes. As to that, the object of the law is to provide a speedy and cheap means of assessing damage done. The Field-cornet and not the plaintiff had to fix the time. He fixed nine a.m. the following day. The defendant's house was within sight of the place where the damage was done. He had notice at eight o'clock on the previous evening, but he did nothing till the next morning. Then he went to Bosman, who was ill; and then he went to Stellenbosch.

[Kotzé, J.: What more than what he did do could he reasonably have done-]

He could have found out the night before that Bosman was ill. He could then have gone to Beukes the next morning about 7.30, and could have got him; or he might have got a landowner in his immediate neighbourhood. He showed a want of reasonable diligence. He had reasonable notice, and he gives no explanation as to why he left the matter over till 7.40 the next morning. The Field-cornet was, therefore, justified in not re-opening the matter after making his award. The defendant does not allege that the award was excessive, and has not shown that he was prejudiced. When the Act prescribes twenty-four hours' notice, it is clear that it was meant that the proceedings should be expeditious.

[Kotzé, J.: But you did not give twenty-four hours' notice?]

The Act says twenty-four hours' notice after the damage has been done.

[Kotzé, J.: Is it reasonable to expect a man to go out after nine p.m. to look for an arbitrator?]

He could send a boy.

[Kotzé, J.: Suppose the man to whom the boy is sent does not put in an appearance?]

That would be his misfortune. I submit that the Court will never upset an award unless the applicant can show prejudice not arising from his own negligence. Here he has not been prejudiced, and he has certainly been negligent.

Mr. J. E. de Villiers (for the respondent): If any time was wasted, it was wasted by the plaintiff. The Field-cornet made the appointment as early as 4 p.m. the day before, and yet we got no notice till 8 p.m. Then the evidence as to the distance between the farms of the plaintiff and of the defendant, and their distance from Stellenbosch is very vague. The evidence does not show that the defendant had any near neighbour save Bosman. He could not reasonably be expected to inspan a cart and drive round after 8 p.m. to look for a landowner. We are not bound by the Magistrate's reasons for his judgment.

[Kotzé, J.: If the parties were still on the ground when the defendant arrived, why did they not give him an opportunity of speaking for himself?]

They ought to have done so. Subsection 2 of section 36 makes no provision for the case of one of the arbitrators being unavoidably absent. The Field-cornet is thus in such a case thrown back on the common law, and according to that he should have re-opened the case. In this Court, if judgment is given in default, the Court will always grant leave to purge the default. That alone would have justified the Magistrate in refusing to accept the award. Besides, the award should have been given in writing.

Mr. Upington (in reply): The defendant did not object to the time fixed by the Field-cornet. As to the award being in writing, the Field-cornet's evidence is that they had finished the award and were just leaving the farm when the defendant appeared.

Kotzé, J.: In this matter Rutherford and Mason sued in the Court below, before the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Stellenbosch, for damages done to their property by the cattle of Myburgh, and the Field-cornet was asked under the 36th section (sub-section 5) of the Act 15 of 1892, to fix and appoint a time by which Myburgh had to be present, with an arbitrator appointed by him, on the ground for the purpose of assessing the damages conjointly with the Field-cornet, and an arbitrator appointed by the plaintiffs. It appears that at four o'clock on the day previous to the assessment of the damages, the Field-cornet requested one of the plaintiffs to notify to Myburgh that he would be on the spot at 9 o'clock the following morning. This message was delivered to Myburgh, the defendant, not immediately, but at eight o'clock at night. Well, I think, then, it was too late, it would be unreasonable to expect that Myburg should then at night, at eight o'clock, inspan his cart, or saddle his horse and ride to a neighbour, who might probably live an hour away on horseback to request him to be present there on the following morning. Then it appears that on the following morning Myburgh, at 20 minutes to eight, which, regard being had to the alteration of the time, would really be seven o'clock by the sun, went to a neighbour (Bosman), but Bosman, being ill, was unable to accompany Myburgh to the spot for the purpose of acting as his arbitrator to assess the damages. Then Myburgh rode in to Stellenbosch for the purpose of finding another arbitrator, and eventually he found one Beukes, who accompanied him to the ground. When they got to the spot, or as one of the witnesses said, "when we got on the ground, we saw the Field-cornet and the other arbitrator moving off the ground." Myburgh subsequently went to the Field-cornet, and the Field-cornet then informed him that he was too late, as the award had already been made. In the Magistrate's Court the defendant raised the objection that the time appointed by the Field-cornet was not a sufficiently convenient time within the meaning of sub-section 5 of section 36 of the Act, and the Magistrate, after hearing the evidence, came to the conclusion that a sufficiently convenient time had not been allowed Myburgh, and, therefore, he granted absolution from the instance. The sole point in this appeal is whether under all the circumstances a sufficiently convenient time, within the meaning of the sub-section of the Act, was fixed by the Field-cornet. Now, what is or what is not convenient must depend to a very large extent on local conditions and circumstances, and in judging whether the time appointed is convenient or not, distance must play a very important part; it must be a very material factor in deciding that question. We do not know the precise distances of the various farms from the Field-cornet, or from the spot or the land where the trespass was committed, but still, regard being had to the list put in, showing the expenses charged by the Field-cornet and the other arbitrator, it would appear that they charged for three hours' horse hire that morning. Allowing an hour for the purpose of viewing the damage and assessing it, it would be a very fair and reasonable conclusion that the Field-cornet and the arbitrators each lived about an hour from the spot. Under all the circumstances, therefore, seeing that the Magistrate must be the best judge of local conditions and distances, I must say there is nothing in the evidence to show that Myburgh acted unreasonably, and did not do what a reasonable man under the circumstances would have done to act with sufficient promptitude, in securing a proper and fit arbitrator; and I do not see any reason why I should disturb the finding of the Magistrate on that point. The Magistrate having a far better knowledge of local conditions than this Court possesses came to the conclusion that the time allowed was not sufficiently convenient, and nothing has been urged on behalf of the appellants in this matter to induce me to come to a different conclusion. The appeal will, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

REX V. McCULLY. { 1903. Sept. 18th.

Appeal—Weight of evidence.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of East London. In the Court below the defendant (now appellant), one Horace McCully, master of the British ship Strath-Isla, had been charged with the crime of assault, in that on or about May 12, 1903, on board the said ship, when on the high seas, sailing between the port of Buenos Ayres and that of East London, he did wrongfully assault one James Golightly, a British seaman, serving on board the said vessel, and did with his clenched fist strike and beat him upon his right ear, giving to him then and there, and thereby certain bruises and hurts, and other wrongs and injuries the said Horace McCully to the said James Golightly then and there did.

The prisoner pleaded "not guilty."

Certain witness deposed to having witnessed the assault, while the evidence for the accused tended to show that they could not have done so: (1) because it was perfectly dark at the time of the alleged assault; (2) because looking to the locus in quo it could not possibly have been observed by a certain one of the witnesses for the Crown.

The Court found the accused guilty, and sentenced him to pay a fine of £3, or in the alternative, one month's imprisonment with hard labour, and further declared that the complainant's contract with the accused as seaman should be cancelled.

Mr. Upington (for the appellant): This appeal is brought on the ground that the conviction was against the weight of evidence. The Magistrate did not sufficiently advert to the fact that charges of this kind are not often made by seamen in order that they may get away from their ship. The Magistrate also seems influenced by the fact that the accused, unfortunately, because intoxicated while on shore, was apprehended by the police, and estreated his bail.

[Kotzé, J.: It would seem that the evidence of the master was on one side, and that of the first mate and the cabin boy on the other.]

The second mate is also said to have witnessed the whole occurence, and yet, strangely enough, he had not been called by the Crown.

[Mr. H. Jones: The second mate had broken his wrists, and, therefore, could not attend.]

Judgment was not given in the Court below till six weeks after that accident, and surely he could have attended by that time. The Magistrate ought to have attached greater weight to facts by which he could test the value of the evidence. For instance, the evidence of Mr. Benett, a perfectly independent witness, is quite opposed to that of the cabin boy. Mr. Benett says, it must have been quite dark at the time of the alleged asault; Olsen, the cabin boy, denies this. Then Olsen's evidence is contradicted by Benett, who says that it would have been impossible to see a man at the wheel from the bottom of the companion ladder. Again the complainant says, that he was struck five times: but no evidence has been called to prove any injuries whatever.

Mr. H. Jones (for the Crown) was not called upon.

Kotzé, J.: It is not necessary to hear Mr. Jones. This is an appeal from a decision of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of East London. It appears that the captain of the British ship Strath-Isla was charged by a seaman serving on board the ship with having assaulted him by striking him several times with his clenched fist when the ship was at sea on a voyage from Buenos Ayres to East London. Several matters have been urged, and urged with great ability by Mr. Upington in support of this appeal, but I must say it seems to me that this is one of those cases where the Magistrate is the best judge on the facts. The plaintiff did not merely state the charge and give evidence in support of it, but he is corroborated by the cabin boy. Now it has been said that the cabin boy's testimony must be viewed with a great deal of suspicion, because both he and the complainant may have given evidence against the captain, either out of spite or because they wished to get rid of the ship. But be that as it may, there is nothing on the record to show that anything of the kind was contemplated by either the cabin boy or the complainant. Certain infirmative circumstances have been pointed out in the evidence of the cabin boy, and it is quite right that the Court should consider those circumstances. First of all, it has been said that the boy stated that at the time the assault was committed it was beginning to get light, and that it has been shown by an expert witness—the captain of another ship who examined the log of this vessel and judged from its position at the time—that it must have been dark at the time. Well, it is quite possible that the boy may have made a mistake with reference to the time; but, after all, this does not show that he is not a trustworthy witness. There was a full moon the evening before, and however equally it may have been at sea, there might have been quite sufficient light for him to have seen what he said he did see. Another point urged is that the cabin boy could not have seen the assault from the place where he says he was standing. There is nothing satisfactory to show that this is so. It is true there is the statement of the accused that the cabin boy could not see him from the place where he stood, but the cabin boy is positive that he did see the captain strike the complainant. Then it is also asked how it is that, if the complainant was really assaulted by the captain, no other member of the crew was brought forward either to show that the complainant was assaulted, or that they afterwards saw marks on the ear or face of the complainant. No doubt it would have been far more satisfactory if that evidence had been forthcoming. The absence of the evidence of the second mate is easily explained by the fact of his having been taken to the hospital when the ship arrived, owing to having fallen from a mast and broken his two wrists and injured his spine. Consequently, he could not have been present at the hearing. Although the prosecution might have obtained, or tried to obtain, evidence from one of the members of the crew, still the absence of such evidence is not sufficient to show that the evidence of the complainant and of the cabin boy is not to be believed, as against that of the captain. The captain, although he denied having committed the assault, admitted that when he laid a charge against the complainant of leaving the ship, and when he also made the charge against the cabin boy, who was acquitted, he was under the influence of liquor, and it also appears from the record that the captain was arrested for drunkenness, and that, failing his appearance, his bail was estreated. It is said that the Court must not look at that too particularly, that if, when a captain goes on shore, he may take more drink than is good for him, it does not follow that he might not be steady or sober on board ship. No doubt that might be so in certain instances, but in this case, although the cabin boy says that the captain was sober at the time of the assault, the complainant says that the captain was intoxicated at the time, but sober when he subsequently went to ask him for some oil and wool at 8 o'clock. However, in any case, the complainant and the cabin boy both say that the assault took place, and against that, we have the simple statement of the captain, who denies it. Now the Magistrate is the best judge of this question of fact as to the credibility of the two witnesses on the one side and of the accused on the other, and he came to the conclusion that the evidence for the prosecution was to be believed. Under these circumstances, I do not see any sufficient ground brought forward here to-day to justify me in going behind the decision of the Magistrate and allowing this appeal. The appeal will, therefore, be dismissed.

CASES DECIDED IN THE SUPREME COURT, CAPE COLONY.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZÉ.]

REVIEW CASE. { 1903. Oct. 12th.

Magistrate—Remit by Attorney-General.

Where a criminal case is remitted by the Attorney-General to be tried by a Magistrate under his ordinary jurisdiction (Act 20, 1856), the Magistrate cannot pass a sentence in excess of such ordinary jurisdiction. Where, therefore, a Magistrate on such remit had sentenced a prisoner to six months' imprisonment with hard labour, the Court reduced the sentence to one of three month's imprisonment with hard labour.

Kotzé, J.: The case of Rex v. Abdol Kariem has come before me as judge of the week. The prisoner was charged with fowl-house breaking, with intent to steal, and with the theft of a large quantity of fowls. The Magistrate took a preliminary examination, and at the close of it committed the prisoner for trial. The Attorney-General remitted the case back to the Magistrate under his ordinary jurisdiction, Act 20 of 1856, and the Magistrate sentenced the prisoner to six months' imprisonment, with hard labour. Under his ordinary jurisdiction, he could only sentence the prisoner to three months' imprisonment, with hard labour, and the sentence must therefore be reduced from six months to three months' hard labour.

ADMISSIONS.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved for the admission of George Gerhard Sutton as an advocate.

Application granted, and oath administered.

Mr. Gardiner moved for the admission of Percival Frere Smith as an advocate.

Application granted, and oath administered.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the admission of Benjamin Robert Duff as an attorney-at-law.

Application granted, oath to be taken before the Registrar of the Supreme Court of the Transvaal.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for the admission of Johannes Stephanus Marais as an attorney-at-law and notary public.

Application granted, and oath administered.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

LENG AND MAXWELL AND EARP v. SONENSCHER.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the provisional order granted on the 22nd August for the sequestration of the defendant's estate to be made final.

Order granted.

HOFFMAN AND OTHERS V. SHOFFER.

Mr. Alexander moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

WHITAKER, PATERSON, BROOKES, LTD.' V. ISMAIL.

Mr. Alexander moved for provisional sentence for £445 0s. 9d. on an acknowledgment of debt, less £90 paid on account.

Order granted.

JONES AND SON V. RICHARDS AND SONS

Mr. Gardiner moved for the final adjudication of the defendants' estate as insolvent.

Mr. Upington said he was instructed by the Bank of Africa, who were creditors, to move from the bar for the appointment of a provisional trustee in this matter. The affidavit of the manager of the bank said that the said firm of Richards and Sons was indebted to the bank in the sum of £26,000 and upwards. The firm had in the past carried on business as printers and stationers; a large number of persons were employed in the said business. Since the 1st January, 1903, the said business had been conducted under the supervision and inspectorship of Mr. E. R. Syfret and Mr. C. W. T. Mouatt. Contracts had been taken by and on behalf of the said firm, some of which were still running. Deponent believed that it would be in the interests of the business and the creditors that the business should be continued under a provisional trustee, until such time as a permanent trustee or trustees should be elected by the creditors. Deponent suggested that Mr. E. R. Syfret should be appointed as provisional trustee.

An order was granted, appointing Mr. E. R. Syfret as provisional trustee of the estate.

SCHULTZ AND DE JAGER V. FOWRIE.

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £979 12s., less £273 6s. 6d., paid on account.

Order granted.

LIPSCHITZ V. MEYER.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

BENNETT AND LOUW V. SPARGO.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Defendant appeared, but said he had no statement to make.

Order granted.

McLEOD V. VISSER.

Mr. Sutton moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £1,190, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent., and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable. the bond having become due by reason of non-payment of interest.

Order granted.

SMIT V. HOOLE AND STEVENS.

Mr. Bisset moved for judgment for £236 4s. 3d., with interest, on a promissory note.

Mr. Buchanan consented to the application on behalf of Stevens.

Provisional judgment granted against Hoole, and final judgment granted against Stevens.

BAM AND OLIFF V. BLOOM.

Mr. De Waal moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £300.

Mr. Alexander, for the defendant, asked for a postponement on the ground that defendant was away in the Transvaal in connection with a case that had an intimate bearing on the present matter. The defendant sold certain property at Worcester to one Captain J. F. Livingstone, and a cheque had been passed in defendant's favour for £1,960, which, however, had not been honoured, and was still in the defendant's possession. The plaintiffs had proposed an undertaking with the defendant, agreeing to stay all proceedings against him pending the action brought by the defendant against Livingstone, in the Transvaal, the defendant, in consideration thereof to pay them £500 as commission on the sale of the property. The defendant had not signed the undertaking. The defendant desired the present matter to be postponed for 8 or 10 weeks.

Mr. De Waal opposed the application for a postponement.

Kotzé, J.: I am of opinion that in this matter the Court should give provisional sentence. The defendant has set up the plea that the money was to be paid out of the cheque of one Livingstone. It appears that this cheque had not been paid before the due date of the bill. It is now said by Mr. Alexander that there was a pactum between the parties to the suit whereby it was agreed that the plaintiff should not seek to enforce payment of the debt until the defendant's action against Livingstone had been dealt with, but it does not appear that that agreement was signed or ever entered into by the parties

---

FEITELBERG V. DELL.

Mr. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence for £78 2s. 4d. and £3 12s. 1d. costs, on a judgment of the Magistrate's Court at Wynberg, upon which there had been a return of nulla bona, and for certain immovable property belonging to the defendant to be declared executable.

Order granted.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

SMITH AND HOLDEN V FOX. { 1903. Oct. 12th.

Mr. Greer moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £33 16s. 11d., work done and materials supplied, with interest a tempore morae and costs of suit.

Order granted.

LEWIS AND PURCELL V. MELLORS.

Mr. Benjamin moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £9 1s. 6d., goods sold and delivered. Plaintiff, it was stated, resided at Sir Lowry Pass, and the defendant at Malmesbury. Hence the application was made to the Supreme Court.

Order granted.

MALCOMESS AND CO. V. WALKER.

Mr. Upington moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £2,149 16s. 8d., with interest, less £400 paid on account since the issue of summons, and also costs.

Order granted.

ESTATE SOUTHEY V. LUCOUW.

Mr. De Waal moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £40 5s. and costs.

Order granted.

HAYWARD V. LEONARD.

Mr. Greer moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £82 10s., purchase price of certain property, with interest from the 2nd May, 1903, and costs of suit, plaintiff tendering transfer.

Order granted.

PHILIP BROS. V. WALLACE.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £147 12s. 7d., balance of the purchase price of goods sold and delivered, with interest and costs.

Order granted.

METHUEN AND CO. V. BUCHANAN.

Mr. Smith moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £82 17s. 3d., goods sold and delivered, with interest a tempore morae and costs.

Order granted.

PASHA V. HADIEN.

Mr. Benjamin moved, under Rule 329d, for an order compelling the defendant to pass transfer of certain property in Cape Town, sold by him to the plaintiff, the plaintiff tendering purchase price. Counsel asked that, in case the order were granted, a date should be fixed within which transfer should be effected.

Order granted, transfer to be passed within one month.

ROSS AND CO. V. ROUS.

Mr. Upington moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £65 9s. 6d., goods sold and delivered, interest, and costs.

Order granted.

HART V. MATESDORF

Mr. Upington moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, in default of plea, for £210, being commission, interest, and costs. The declaration set out that there was a commission upon an agency to obtain subscribers for certain shares.

Order granted.

ANDREWS V. WOLK.

Mr. Bisset moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £43 10s., for rent, less £1 5s. paid on account, together with interest a tempore morae and costs of suit.

Order granted.

JACOBS V. PORTER.

Mr. Upington moved, under Rule 329d, for an order requiring defendant to forthwith give transfer and conveyance of certain property at Claremont, bought by plaintiff from him in April, plaintiff having already paid the full amount of the purchase price. There was also a claim for £50 damages, but this had been withdrawn.

An order was granted, calling on defendant to pass transfer within three weeks.

MOWBRAY MUNICIPALITY V. YOUNG BROTHERS.

Mr. Sutton moved under rule 329d for judgment for the sums of £4 4s. and £52 10s. for rates, with interest and costs.

Order granted.

REHABILITATIONS. { 1903. Oct. 12th.

Mr. Alexander applied for the rehabilitation of Henry Cragg. The estate was provisionally sequestrated in March, 1897, and finally in April of that year.

Granted.

Mr. Buchanan moved for an order for the rehabilitation of Harry Hoblin Hards. The date of surrender was the 14th May, 1891.

Granted.

Mr. De Waal moved for the rehabilitation of Gustav Adolf Anderholod Nefdt, whose estate was sequestrated in May, 1895.

Granted.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones applied for the release from sequestration of Petrus Andries Steenekamp. On the 11th May, 1900, the estate was compulsorily sequestrated. All the creditors who had proved had been paid in full, and there was a surplus of £189 11s. in the hands of the Master. The application was under the 107th section.

Kotzé, J., pointed out that in the notice published in the "Gazette," the application was stated to be one for discharge. However, there was a certificate given by the Master, and applicant could take an order for his release.

Mr. Bisset moved for the rehabilitation of Pieter Johannes Olivier, whose estate was sequestrated in March, 1897.

Granted.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for the rehabilitation of Frederick Daniel le Roux. The estate was sequestrated in January, 1896.

Granted.

Mr. De Waal moved for the rehabilitation of Paul Johannes Marais. Insolvent surrendered his estate in 1891. He had paid all his creditors in full.

Granted.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for an order for the rehabilitation of Gerhard Christian Bedford.

Granted.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

CHAMBERLAIN V. CHAMBERLAIN. { 1903. Oct. 12th.

In deciding as to whether the custody of a child shall be entrusted to the father or the mother, the Court will be guided chiefly by what is in the interests of the child.

Mr. Upington moved on behalf of Wm. Ernest Chamberlain for a decree of divorce. The respondent had failed to obey an order to return to or receive plaintiff. The custody of the minor child was asked for.

Mrs. Chamberlain appeared and gave evidence on oath. She made allegations of cruelty against her husband, saying she had left the house because she did not think that she and the child were safe there. The child was a girl, aged sixteen months, and was now with witness.

In cross-examination, she said she was living at a boarding-house. She objected to the child being placed with anyone; she considered she was the most competent person to look after the child. She intended to proceed with the child to England to her parents shortly. The child was a girl.

Mr. Upington said the father was prepared to place the child with a competent and reliable person at the Paarl. If the mother were going to leave the country, and to take the child with her, the father would not be able to have access to the child.

Mr. Justice Kotzé said the order for the divorce would be granted, but he would make an order as to the custody of the child later.

Postea (October 16th).

Kotzé, J.: This matter came before me on the 12th instant, and the question was with reference to the custody of the child of the marriage. I intimated at the time that a divorce would be granted, but that, as to the custody of the child, I would consider my decision. I have consulted with my brother Maasdorp, before whom and myself the matter first came, and I think the proper order to make is to give the father the custody of the child. The Court, of course, is principally actuated by asking itself the question, What is best in the interests of the child? Seeing that the child is only sixteen months old, the Court probably for the next three or four years would have allowed the mother to have the custody of the child; but he says she is about to proceed to Europe the moment she receives the child from the father, and wishes to take the child with her. Now, the father objects to that, and says he is opposed to the child being removed from the jurisdiction of this Court. If the mother were in a satisfactory position, so far as character is concerned, the Court might think it would be to the benefit of the child that she should have the custody of it. Under all the circumstances, it will be better, in the interests of the child, not to give the mother the custody; consequently the Court will make an order giving the father the custody. The mother, of course, may at all reasonable times have the right of access.

Ex parte WOODHEAD AND SONS.

Mr. Alexander moved to make absolute a rule nisi granted under the Derelict Lands Act.

Granted.

Ex parte HAYBITTEL.

Mr. Buchanan moved to make absolute a rule nisi granted under the Derelict Lands Act.

Granted.

Ex parte COWELL AND WIFE.

Mr. Gardiner moved for leave to execute a marriage contract. Counsel said the matter had been previously before the Court, when it was ordered to stand over in order that the contract which it was proposed to register might be produced. He now produced a duplicate contract signed by the parties.

Leave was granted as prayed.

MILLAR V. BEST.

This was an application for an order for personal attachment, it being alleged that defendant had committed contempt of Court by failing to comply with an order granted on the 20th August, whereby he was ordered to pass transfer of certain land at Muizenberg, alleged to have been purchased by applicant from respondent in May last.

Mr. Buchanan appeared for the applicant.

The defendant, Alfred John Best, appeared, and gave evidence on oath. He said that the property belonged to one Robertson. He denied that he sold it, and said that the documents relating to the property which he held at the time of his negotiations with the plaintiff were held by him as security for the repayment of money advanced to Robertson by him. Since that time the money had been repaid, and he had given up the documents to Robertson. He contended that there had only been a provisional sale to Millar.

In cross-examination, respondent said he did not appear to oppose judgment, because he did not understand the legal procedure, and was unable to consult an attorney. Robertson was a commercial traveller, and was now, witness believed, in Johannesburg. When he negotiated with Millar he did not tell him that the property belonged to someone else; he did not think it was necessary to do so. He wrote a letter to the applicant's attorney stating that Robertson had written to him from Maritzburg, stating that the transfer of the property to him was registered in the Deeds Office in December, 1897.

Mr. Buchanan said that search had been made in the Deeds Office among the deeds registered in December, 1897, but no trace of this could be found.

In further cross-examination, the witness admitted that on the 20th May, 1903, he gave Millar a document in the following terms: "Mr. Millar, I herewith give you refusal until the 25th instant for two plots of land at Muizenberg on the corner of Royal-road.—A. J. Best. Meet me at 2 p.m." Witness did not keep the appointment to meet at two o'clock. He saw Millar again on the 22nd May, and gave him a document, which read: "I have this day sold to Mr. Millar two plots of ground at Muizenberg described as lots 21 and 22, corner of Royal-road, and newly-made road, for the sum of £100. Meet me at 2.10 on Sunday." Witness did not keep this appointment.

In reply to the Court, witness said he had not told Robertson he had sold this property. Robertson had asked him to sell it. Witness took up the position that there was no sale.

Kotzé, J., told Best he had better think the matter over seriously until Thursday, when counsel could again mention the matter. Best had better be ready with some proposal then, or see Mr. Millar and try to make some arrangement with him.

Postea (October 15).

The Court granted an order as prayed, but (by consent) suspended execution for a month. The question of costs to stand over.

HENDERSON AND ANOTHER V. HANEKOM. | 1903, Oct, 12th. „ 21st. „ 29th.

Appeal to Privy Council—Final judgment—Decision on exceptions.

In an action brought by the cessionary of a mining lease against the lessor to have it declared that the rights under the lease were vested in the lessor, the defendant excepted to the declaration on the ground that it disclosed no cause of action. The Court having disallowed the exception, the defendant applied for leave to appeal to the Privy Council.

Held, that the decision overruling the exception was not a final judgment in terms of the 50th section of the Charter of Justice until the plaintiff obtained the benefit of the decision by a judgment in his favour on the declaration.

This was an application brought by Jurgens Johannes Hanekom, of the district of Hay, for leave to appeal to the Privy Council against a decision of the Supreme Court in the matter of Henderson and others v. Hanekom.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Buchanan), was for the applicant; and Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Benjamin), was for the respondents.

Mr. Buchanan said that the action raised the question of the assignability of certain prospecting rights in the defendant's farm, and was commenced in the High Court of Griqualand. The defendant excepted to the declaration, and the High Court upheld the exception, but on appeal to the Supreme Court, the exception was overruled. The defendant now applied for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Privy Council from the judgment of the Supreme Court.

Mr. Schreiner: The original action was brought by my clients, now the respondents, that action is still pending in the High Court of Griqualand, exception was taken to the declaration by the defendant, who did not plead in any way, setting forth that the declaration disclosed no cause of action; the High Court of Griqualand upheld the exception, and against that decision an appeal was brought before the Supreme Court as the Court of Appeal, and that appeal was successful. The Supreme Court disallowed the exception, with costs, and caused judgment to be entered overruling the exception, with costs. Of course, the case was then remitted to the High Court of Griqualand for further hearing. We then oppose this application on the ground that the judgment given by this Court, sitting as a Court of Appeal, was not a final judgment, from which alone an appeal lies to the Privy Council; see Charter of Justice and Act 35 of 1896, section 22. By this Act (section 19) the Supreme Court is constituted as a Court of Appeal under the Charter of Justice. Section 24 provides for an appeal from the High Court to the Supreme Court, even on interlocutory matters, but no appeal lies from the Supreme Court (our Court of Appeal) save against "a final judgment, decree, or order thereof." The question whether an appeal can be granted on an exception has never been clearly decided, but the case of Jones v. Town Council of Cape Town (12 S.C.R., 144) is somewhat in point. In this case we stand without any judgment. We asked for a declaration of rights, and that has neither been granted nor refused. No final judgment has been given either in this or in any other Court in this case.

[Kotzé, J.: Surely the decision that the declaration disclosed no cause of action was final?]

I submit not—at all events, according to English cases. See Salomon v. Warner and Co. (1 Q.B.D., 1891, p. 734). Here the judgment on the exception was not a final order, and it would be most unfair if the applicants could appeal on an exception taken by their own counsel.

[Kotzé, J.: The question is whether this Court did not finally dispose of the question of the assignability of a mining lease?]

I submit not. A judgment is not final till it has been given on a declaration and is perfected by the signing of judgment. What would be the position if your lordship gave leave to appeal? I should have to ask for the execution of the judgment. But there is no judgment to execute, and therefore there is nothing to appeal about. If exception had been taken in the High Court, and there had been a plea over the exception might be over-ruled and the plea over admitted.

[Kotzé, J.: Do you then mean to argue that the argument on exceptions does not affect your case?]

Absolutely. Section 50 of the Charter of Justice shows that the Court has no power to grant leave to appeal on exceptions. We might go to the Privy Council, but they cannot, because the order was made on our exceptions. Had our declaration been set aside, according to our practice we might have had a right of appeal; and in this our practice differs from the English practice. See Jones v. Insole (64 L.T., 703) as to interlocutory and final orders. That is the latest decision as to English practice, and shows that an appeal cannot be taken on an exception or a demurrer, which, of course, is the same as our exception; and very rightly so, for a demurred may be of a most frivolous character. If the defendant wants to appeal he can file his plea, or he can go to the Privy Council for leave to appeal.

Mr. Buchanan (for applicant): There have been many cases in which leave has been granted to appeal on an exception. Counsel for the respondent has referred to the case of Kimberley Waterworks v. Kimberley Town Council (12 C.T.R., 205), but in that case the appeal was refused only because the application was merely for an interdict pending an action. Had a perpetual interdict been asked for the Court would have granted the appeal, even if final judgment had not been given. In England an appeal is allowed even on interlocutory matters. The only question is as to the time within which notice must be given; but if an interlocutory order has the practical effect of a final order, it is certainly appealable. In England the term "interlocutory" has a much wider meaning than it has here, and hence English cases do not altogether apply. To show the difference between our terminology and that of England, I would refer to the Encyclopædia of the Laws of England (Vol. 9, p. 311). I submit that this is such a judgment or order as can be appealed against.

Mr. Schreiner (for respondent): As to the difference between a final judgment and an interlocutory order, see Onslow v. Commissioner of Revenue (63 L.T., 513). I would also submit that your lordship sitting alone has not the powers of a Court of Appeal (Act 35 of 1896, section 20).

[Kotzé, J.: I think I have the full powers of the Supreme Court.]

But I submit not of a Court of Appeal.

[Kotzé, J.: I will take time to consider that point.]

Mr. Buchanan cited Trowell v. Shenton (1878, 8, Ch. D., 318) as to the meaning of the term "final order."

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (October 21).

Kotzé, J.: The question arose as to whether or not the sentence or judgment of the Court on the exceptions had the effect of a final or definite sentence or decree. Another point was raised by Mr. Schreiner, viz., that inasmuch as the Court in giving judgment sat as an Appeal Court from the decision of the High Court of Griqualand West, the question was whether, regard being had to the Act 35 of 1896, known as the Better Administration of Justice Act, one judge sitting alone in this Court had jurisdiction to entertain such application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council. He had since had an opportunity of looking through the Act, and he found that section 22 of the Act was clear on the point. It said that an appeal to Her Majesty in Privy Council shall be allowed by the Supreme Court sitting as an appeal court in any decision, judgment, or decree, and so forth. Now, the other case he had mentioned, viz., the action that came before him alone, was the case connected with what was known as Contat's Colliery Company. That case came before the Supreme Court in the first instance, not in its appellate, but in its ordinary jurisdiction. Therefore the point that arose in this case did not arise in Contat's Collieries. Regard being had to the express language of section 22, he did not think that sitting alone he could entertain the application. Therefore, he thought the matter should be referred to the full Court in its appellate jurisdiction—i.e., as a Court of Appeal. Some future day could be fixed for hearing it, when three judges were present.

Postea (October 29).

[Before De Villiers, C.J., and Maasdorp and Kotzé, J.J.]

Mr. Buchanan (for the petitioner): When this application came before his lordship, Mr. Justice Kotzé, on October 12, exception was taken that we could not appeal in this case, inasmuch as no final order or judgment had been given by this Court, but see Jones v. Cape Town Town Council (5 C.T.R., 172). The whole question is, "Is this a final judgment or not?"

[De Villiers, C.J.: Surely they have given security?]

But only for the costs of appeal, not for the damage they have done on our farm. Then as to whether or not this is a final judgment. My client will suffer irreparable damage if these prospectors are allowed to come on his ground. The defendants did not plead over (as they might have done) to our declaration. We cannot admit section 2 of their plea, nor can we meet it with a categorical denial, because if we do the other side will meet us with an exception. A judgment which goes to the root of the whole question, as this judgment does, is a final "rule or order in this action." See also section 10 of the declaration, which contains the whole gist of the declaration. The whole question raised in the declaration was with respect to the assignment of the contract. Should the Court grant leave to appeal, two actions may be going on at the same time. See also section 50 of the Charter of Justice, which says that "any rule or order . . . having the effect of a final or definite sentence" may be appealed against. The wording of the section clearly shows that no rule or order made on motion is appealable.

Mr. Schreiner (for respondents): The order under section 15 of Act of 1896 was that the appeal was to be allowed. He merely filed an exception, and did not plead over. The exception was upheld, and the paragraph of his pleadings to which that referred was struck out. Section 15 of the Charter of Justice and Act 22 of 1893 show that no exception can be taken on an appeal. In the meantime, we are being kept out of our rights and out of our money. If we were to go on with our action we could not well appeal: for if we did, how could this Court give judgment on the appeal while an appeal was still before the Privy Council?

[De Villiers, C.J.: But was not this a final judgment? Here there was no cause of action, as the Court held by final judgment that there was no good exception.]

But see sections 24 and 15 of Act 35 of 1896. We are the successful parties, and yet we have no legal rights.

[Kotzé, J.: But, on your exception, were not all the facts admitted?]

No, only for the purpose of the argument on exceptions. Suppose A sues B for £1,000 damages. A is not called upon to give any security for costs, and there is nothing to prevent a dozen civil cases from going on at once against B. Here the exception of res judicata is quite out of place. To refer to one or two English cases. See Salomon v. Warner (3 Q.B., 1891, Vol. 1, p. 734), where see judgment of Esher, M.R., and that case is quite on all fours with the present one. See also judgment of Fry, L.J., as to interlocutory and final orders in re Alabama Railway Company (1891, Ch., 1-246). Hence here the order was not final or effectual. See Jones v. Insole (64 L.T., 703), in which Salomon v. Warner was followed. See also Act 35 of 1896, section 26.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But has not the rule as to striking out of pleadings superseded the old rules as to demurrer?]

Demurrer is an old English law term no longer recognised (see Order 25, Rule 2). A decision on a demurrer would not be final.

[Kotzé, J.: Should this Court judge this case by Roman-Dutch Law or English Law?]

We must look to the view the Privy Council would take, and I admit that if Dutch Law were decided on this point the Court would be bound by Roman-Dutch Law. McPherson's Privy Council Practice, Onslow v. Commissioner of Revenue (63 L.T., 513), and Tronson v. Dent (8 Moore's P.C., 419).

Mr. Buchanan (in reply): See Trowell v. Shenton (8 Ch. D., 318). I admit that case was quoted in Salomon v. Warner, but that was a very peculiar case. Surely a judgment which says that a declaration discloses no cause of action is a final judgment; but suppose the decision had been the opposite, would that have been final? Surely not. The terms "final" and "interlocutory" are very indefinite, and are understood differently in our law from what they are in English law. That is shown by Rule 58 of the English Rules of Court. See also Encyclopædia of the Laws of England (Vol. 7, p. 116). The ratio decidendi in Salomon v. Warner is not so much the effect of the judgment as the time when the decision was given. Here we have an exception which to all intents and purposes was final.

De Villiers, C.J.: In this case an exception was taken to the declaration in the Court below that the declaration disclosed no cause of action. The exception was allowed, but, on appeal, the exception was disallowed. It is unnecessary now to decide whether, in case the judgment of the Court of Appeal had been different, the judgment would have been a final one or not. There is much to be said in favour of the view that, in case the judgment had supported the decision of the Court below, it would have been a final one, but I am clearly of opinion that a judgment in favour of the plaintiff upon exception did not amount to a final judgment. The words of the Charter of Justice are: "An appeal against any final judgment, decree, or sentence of the said Court, or against any rule or order in any civil suit or action having the effect of a final or definitive sentence." In my opinion the order of the Court of Appeal is neither a final judgment, nor is it a rule or an order having the effect of a final, or definitive sentence. Before the plaintiffs could obtain the benefit of the decision of the Court, it was necessary for them to proceed further, to proceed to trial, and obtain judgment, and until that judgment was obtained and the object for which the action was brought was attained, it is impossible to hold that there was a final judgment. It was interlocutory so far as the plaintiffs were concerned. The plaintiffs therefore, ought, in my opinion, to be allowed first of all to proceed with their action; the defendant can then raise further defences; it is possible that the defendant may have a valid defence to the action. If we consider the matter from the point of view of convenience, the effect of allowing an appeal at the present stage of the proceedings might be to create a multiplicity of appeals, but no inconvenience or injustice could result from letting the appeal stand over until a final judgment has been given. The plaintiffs must, of course, proceed with due despatch with the action. I take it there will be no delay on their part in proceeding with the action. The present application must be refused, with costs.

Mr. Schreiner asked whether the order as to costs would include costs of the previous application.

The Chief Justice said that that was so.

Maasdorp, J., concurred.

Kotzé, J., said that, under the circumstances, he concurred in the judgment, although with some hesitation.

COHEN AND ANOTHER v. A.R.M. OF CAPE. { 1903. Oct. 12th.

Magistrate—Mandamus.

An application for a mandamus, compelling the Magistrate to have certain questions put to and answered by a witness, a police constable, in a preparatory examination: refused on the ground that it would be contrary to the interests of justice to do so.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers appeared for the applicants; Mr. Howel Jones for the respondent.

Mr. De Villiers said that the application was for a mandamus compelling certain questions to be answered by one Campbell, a detective. The questions were asked of Campbell in a case in which applicants were charged with theft, and were as follows: (1) Whether Campbell had information on which he arrested accused; (2) from whom he received information; and (3) what the information was. Campbell had refused to answer the questions unless ordered by the Court, and the A.R.M. had refused to make such order. It was stated on affidavit that if the questions were not answered, the interests of the accused would be prejudiced.

Kotzé, J.: This is an application for a mandamus to issue against the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Cape Town to compel him to have certain questions put by the agent of the accused to a certain police constable named Campbell. It appears that a preliminary examination was held by the Magistrate in question against one Cohen and one Feldman, and that they were both charged with the crime of theft, and in the course of the proceedings, Campbell was called as a witness for the prosecution. The agent for the accused asked him whether, besides what he had already stated, he had other information upon which he acted in arresting the accused, and he, according to the affidavits of both the accused and their agent, answered in the affirmative. Thereupon, the further question was put by the agent of the accused to the witness: "What was the information?" The witness declined to answer that question, and appealed to the Magistrate whether he was bound to answer it or not, and the Magistrate ruled that he was not bound to answer it. The Magistrate, however, in his affidavit, gives a different account of what actually took place, and I see no reason to doubt the accuracy of what the Magistrate states in this matter. The Magistrate states that the question which was asked was whether, in addition to the information on which he acted, Campbell had any further information about the accused Feldman at the time the arrest was made. Well, that is a very different matter, and this the witness declined to answer. Then on the 17th September, some weeks after the previous occasion, Campbell was recalled during the progress of the preliminary examination, and he was asked again whether he had any further information at the time, and, if so, from whom he had the information. That he declined to answer unless ordered to do so by the Magistrate, and the Magistrate ruled he was not bound to answer these questions. Now upon that the accused come to this Court, and apply for a peremptory order or mandamus to be served upon the Assistant Resident Magistrate compelling him to have these questions again put to the witness, and duly answered by him. Now it appears to me that the whole point turns upon the question whether or not the putting of these questions would be or are in the interests of criminal justice. Of course, if they are in the interests of criminal justice they may be so in one of two ways; either it may be in the interest of the prosecution that this information should not be given, or it may be shown that if these questions are not put and answered the accused would be materially prejudiced. Looking at it from either point of view—the punishment of the guilty as well as the protection of the innocent—there is absolutely nothing before me except the bare, unsupported statement of the accused or their agent to show that these questions were of great consequence to the defence. The record is not before me, and I am not in a position to say that the Magistrate's ruling was wrong and contrary to law. It appears to me that the Magistrate sitting there hearing the evidence was the best judge as to whether or not the questions would really affect the point of the guilt or innocence of the accused, in other words, whether it was in the interests of justice that they should be put, and the witness ordered to answer them. It is quite possible that there are many people who give information to the police who do not wish to have their names disclosed, and if the channels through which the police get information were made public in this way it is very probable that the interests of criminal justice might suffer. Of course, had it been clear that the interests of the accused would suffer, in other words, if they would have been prejudiced in their defence had these questions not been put, or had the Magistrate refused to allow them to be answered, then the matter would have been quite different, because then it would have been in the interests of justice that they should be answered. But nothing of that kind appears, and that being the case I should not be justified now in holding that the Magistrate acted contrary to law, or, even assuming that the Magistrate had a discretion in the matter, that he exercised his discretion wrongly. Under these circumstances the application must be refused.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte ESPINOSA. { 1903. Oct. 13th.

Act 48 of 1882—I.D.B.—Appeal.

This was an application for leave to appeal from a conviction of the Special Court at Kimberley under the Diamond Trades Act. The affidavit of the petitioner said that on the 10th July, 1903, he was tried and convicted by the Special Court at Kimberley, constituted under Act 48 of 1882, of having contravened sections 2 and 3 of the Diamond Trades Act, in that (1) on or about the 11th June, 1903, at or near Beaconsfield, in the district of Kimberley, he was found in wrongful and unlawful possession of five rough uncut diamonds, and was not able to account satisfactorily for possession or prove his right to the same; and (2) upon the date and at the place aforesaid, the petitioner, not being duly licensed under Act 48 of 1882 to deal in rough uncut diamonds, or carry on the trade of a diamond cutter, did wrongfully and unlawfully buy, deal in, or receive, either as principal or agent, five rough uncut diamonds. Sentence was passed upon him of ten years' imprisonment with hard labour. He was afterwards removed to the gaol at Kimberley, and owing to the prison regulations, he had no opportunity of consulting his legal adviser with a view to instituting an appeal within the period specified by the Act. Subsequently he was removed to Cape Town, and he then had an opportunity of consulting his legal adviser as to the desirability of appealing. The petitioner, having failed to comply with the requirements of section 52 of the aforesaid Act, now applied to this Court for leave to appeal. Communications had been opened with the Attorney-General, who intimated that no objection would be raised to an application for leave to appeal, provided that application were made in the proper course.

Mr. Howel Jones (for the Crown) said that, as representing the Attorney-General, he did not object to the present application, but he wished to correct a statement made in the petition. The petitioner said that, owing to the prison regulations, he had no opportunity of consulting his legal adviser while he was at Kimberley. The statement was incorrect. The Magistrate at Kimberley had been communicated with, but, unfortunately, he (counsel) had not got an affidavit on the point.

Mr. Benjamin (for the appellant): This application is made under section 52 of Act 48 of 1882. The Court can extend the time within which the prosecution must be met: though there is no provision to extend the time of notice. Snayman v. Le Grange (Buch., 1878, p. 110). I quote this case merely by way of analogy, and would also refer to Smith v. Pinto (Buch., 1868, 105). I think it has always been the practice of the Court to extend the time in cases in which the Attorney-General raises no objection.

The Court granted leave as prayed.

ROHLAND v. ROHLAND'S CURATOR. { 1903, Oct. 13th.

Curator of lunatic—Transfer of quit-rent title.

R. had obtained a licence on behalf of his son H. R. for the grant of certain Crown land on quit-rent tenure, and effected certain improvements thereon. Thereafter H. R. was declared a lunatic, and the curator to his property took out a quit-rent title to the land in question. R. now applied for an order of Court, ordering H. R.'s curator to transfer this land to him (R.)

Held, that the order must be refused.

Semble: that if R. had made a reasonable offer as consideration for the value of the land, the Court would, in view of the improvements which had been effected by R., have ordered transfer if they considered that it would be in H. R.'s interest that R.'s offer should be accepted.

This was an application brought by Christian Rohland, of Stellenbosch, upon notice of motion, calling upon the curator of his son, Heindrichs Rohland, to show cause why an order should not be granted requiring him (1) to apply to the Colonial Government to issue a quitrent title to certain lots 8 and 9 of Crown land at Stellenbosch, the licence of which was granted to Heindrichs Rohland; and (2) on the same being obtained, to transfer such title gratuitously to the applicant without payment or security, but at the cost and charge of the said applicant, or such other order as the Court might deem fit.

It appeared the applicant was the father of Heindrichs Rohland, to whom certain lots of Crown land at Stellenbosch were granted in 1897. The son Heindrichs was now an inmate of the Valkenberg Asylum, and under an order of the Court, he had been declared of unsound mind, and Mr. Steytler had been appointed curator of his property, and his father, the present applicant, had been appointed curator of his person. Counsel read the affidavit of the applicant, which stated that his son lost his reason some little time after the grant of land had been made, and in the meantime the property had been looked after by the deponent, who had erected buildings thereon, and considerably enhanced the value of the property. Petitioner's son had been desirous of transferring the said land to his father, as appeared from two letters which he had written to him. The lots 8, 9, and 11 were originally secured by the petitioner for the benefit of his two sons. He had built a shop and store on lots 8 and 9, and had converted waste into arable land. His son had not spent a penny on the improvement of the ground. Deponent had spent about £700 on the ground.

[Kotzé, J.: Have the terms of the licence been complied with?]

Mr. Schreiner: That is the point. We say that the father, on behalf of his son, has complied with them. I suppose that, strictly speaking, the Government might have forfeited the licence, but they have taken a broad view, and do not wish to do this. The affidavit of the respondent, Mr. Steytler, stated that he had obtained quitrent title to lots 8 and 9 on behalf of Heindrichs Rohland. He declined to make transfer of the property to the said applicant unless authorised or directed by the Court so to do. He had no means of verifying the statement made by the applicant as to the money he had expended on the ground. The land, in his opinion, was worth probably about £1,500.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for respondent): The Court appointed Mr. Steytler simply as curator of the property. He can sell it, but he cannot give it away either to the father or to anybody else. He is quite ready to realise the property and to pay out to the father whatever he has spent. But he has nothing to guide him as to what the father has spent beyond the father's bare word. The son may recover, or may die, and in either of these contingencies either he or his heirs ab intestato (as the case may be) will demand their property. Why should the property of the son, which may be required for his comfort and support be given away to his father?

Mr. Buchanan (for applicant): The father has paid off all obligations on the farm, and should be compensated.

[Kotzé, J.: Is he paying for his son's maintenance?]

I do not know, but the whole action of the father in paying quitrent shows that he was acting in his son's interest. The father thought that as he had improved and cultivated the land, he could treat it as his own. No doubt, he was wrong in law, but the mistake was not unnatural.

[Kotzé, J.: Ignorantia juris cuique nocet.]

Of course, that is so in strict law, and my client would get no preference if father and son are to be treated as strangers; but I submit that such treatment would scarcely be equitable, and that the father should be dealt with on a liberal basis. I would suggest that the curator should transfer the land under section 34 of Act 1 of 1897 to the father, either without payment or, at all events, on very favourable terms.

Kotzé, J.: In this matter, Christian Rohland, the applicant, appears in the year 1897 to have obtained a licence for the grant of certain Crown land, situated at Stellenbosch, and he did so for and on behalf of his son Heindrichs. After that he effected certain improvements on the land, he put up certain buildings, for instance, he turned waste land into arable land, and effected other improvements, and after that the son was declared by this Court of unsound mind. The father was appointed curator of the person, and Mr. George Steytler was appointed curator of the property. After Mr. Steytler had been appointed curator of the property, he, as curator, took out the quitrent title to this Crown land, and now the father, who had effected these improvements, comes to the Court and asks the Court that the curator shall be ordered, gratuitously, without any consideration, to transfer this property, this quitrent title, to him (the father). Now I quite agree with Mr. Schreiner that the Court must regard this as a valuable asset in the estate of the lunatic, and the curator is quite right in opposing this application. The father, having obtained this land, originally in favour of his son, and put these buildings on the land, may be entitled to some equitable consideration, but that is not now the question for me to consider. The only request before me is that I should grant an order directing the curator to transfer this property to the father (the applicant); in the absence of any offer made by the father, which the Court might consider as to whether it would be in the interests of the lunatic or not to grant, I am wholly at a loss to conceive how this Court may now grant the application in its present form. The proper course for the applicant to pursue, it seems to me, would be to approach the curator and proceed to make some fair and reasonable offer. I don't say whether the Court would approve that offer or not, and I don't wish to be understood as binding the Court in any way to sanction a particular course. As a matter of fact, I would like it to be an open question. The application in its present form clearly cannot be entertained, and must be refused, and refused with costs.

Mr. Schreiner said he supposed that the curator could move the Court if he were approached by the father with some offer.

His Lordship: Certainly, only I wish to say nothing in any way that would lead to the belief that the Court would give or withhold its sanction.

DREWFS V. DREWFS.

Mr. Upington moved on behalf of the petitioner, Fritz Heindrichs Drewfs, residing in Carnarvon, for leave to sue his wife, Emilie Drewfs, by edictal citation, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce. Petitioner said his wife wrongfully and maliciously deserted him in April, 1901, and she was now supposed to be living somewhere in the neighbourhood of Johannesburg, but her exact address was unknown.

Replying to His Lordship, Mr. Upington said he did not know whether desertion took place at Carnarvon.

Kotzé, J.: Leave to sue will be granted, personal service to be effected, if possible. It must be understood that so far as divorce is concerned, it is subject to any objection that the wife may raise as to jurisdiction. There have been several of these cases lately before the Court, and I think the Court should be very careful. In the present case, failing personal service, there must be the usual publication in the "Gazette," and, further, two publications in a local newspaper, circulating in Johannesburg, the citation to be returnable on the 1st February next.

CAPE DIVISIONAL COUNCIL V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT. { 1903. Oct. 13th. ,, 14th.

Rule nisi discharged.

The Court discharged a rule nisi, calling upon the Government to shew cause why it shall not be restrain'd from proceeding with the construction of a certain overhead bridge until the plans thereof had been submitted to and approved by the applicant, and why the respondent shall not be restrained from breaking up a main road, on the ground (1) that the applicant had not first applied for and been refused an inspection of plans by the respondent, and (2) that as the applicant was plaintiff in an action, in which it was ordered that the bridge should be made by the respondent, it must be taken to have consented to the work necessary for commencing the construction of the bridge.

This was an application to make absolute a rule nisi calling on the respondents to show cause why they should not be interdicted from proceeding with the erection of a certain overhead bridge over the main road at Salt River, until the plans of such bridge had been submitted to and approved by the Council, and from breaking up the said road without the consent of the Council, and, further, why they (the respondents) should not be ordered to pay the costs of this application. Mr. Benjamin was for the appli-tion.

The affidavit of Mr. Westhuysen, the clerk of the Divisional Council, stated that the respondents were, in March last, directed to remove certain rails which passed over the main road within six months, unless they were prepared to give an undertaking to construct an overhead bridge within twelve months for the conveyance of the ordinary road traffic. So far as he was aware, no steps were taken to comply with the said order until the early part of September, when the department intimated that they were constructing a temporary road pending the erection of a bridge. The applicant Council objected to the erection of the said bridge until plans had been submitted to them. The Council specially objected to the gradient of the proposed road, as they believed it was to be 1 in 20, which gradient was found in the case of the existing bridge to be dangerous and inconvenient.

The answering affidavit of Mr. J. D. Shannon, district engineer of the C.G.R., stated that on the 1st July last he wrote to the Council informing them that a temporary diversion of the road would be necessary. He denied that there had been any refusal on the part of the Railway Department to show plans of the proposed bridge to the Divisional Council, in fact, rough plans had been shown to the Council's engineer, and all available information had been given, but complete plans could not be shown now, as they were being prepared by the consulting engineers in England. The Divisional Council had been informed that complete plans would be shown to them as soon as they arrived. With regard to the gradient, deponent pointed out that 1 in 20 was the gradient of the present bridge at Salt River, and of the bridge at Claremont. He was not aware that the existing gradient had been found to be dangerous or inconvenient. There were several streets and roads in Cape Town which had equally steep gradients. On the 29th June last a temporary road was commenced, and it was completed in September. They had commenced to break up the road, so as to prepare for the erection of the bridge. If the work were to be delayed until the plans arrived from the consulting engineers in London, it would be quite impossible to complete the bridge within the time specified by the order of Court.

The replying affidavit of Mr. Shand, engineer of the Council, said that no plans had been shown to him of the proposed bridge. With regard to the gradient, he considered that 1 in 20 would, in view of the volume and character of the traffic over the road, be highly inconvenient to say the least.

Mr. Benjamin for the applicants; Mr. Schreiner, K.C., for the respondents.

Council were then heard in argument.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (October 14):

Kotzé, J.: This is an application by the Cape Divisional Council to make absolute a rule nisi calling upon the Colonial Government to show cause, firstly, why it shall not be restrained from proceeding with a certain overhead bridge across the main road at Salt River until the plans for the said bridge have been submitted to and approved by the Divisional Council, and, secondly, why it shall not be restrained from breaking up the said main road. It appears that in March last there was an action in this court between the parties, and the Court then ordered the Colonial Government to take up or remove certain rails or a line of railway, which had been laid across the main road within six months, unless the Government should within twelve months commence and complete a bridge over the said main road. This judgment of the Court was given on the 9th of March, and on the 7th July, nearly four months afterwards, the Government intimated to the Divisional Council that it had decided to erect the bridge and also at the same time stated that a temporary deviating road had been commenced, and that when that temporary road was finished due notice of it would be given to the Divisional Council, so that it might be used for public traffic. The Divisional Council now seeks to restrain the Government from commencing this bridge until the plans have been submitted to and approved by it, and it does so for two reasons. It is alleged by the Divisional Council, firstly, that it has a right to satisfy itself that a proper gradient will be made from the road to this bridge, and, secondly, that it has a right also to satisfy itself that proper provision is being made for drainage and storm water. Now, this is not a case of the Government constructing a new main road, and then handing it over again to the Divisional Council, but it is a case where a bridge has to be made to connect two portions of an already existing main road. Seeing that, by the Act, the care and maintenance of the main road are entrusted to the Divisional Council, it appears to me that the Council has a locus standi in the matter, and a right to inspect the plans of the proposed bridge, which will connect the two portions of the main road under its control. The Government, in the affidavit which has been filed in its behalf, says that it is perfectly prepared to allow and give an inspection of the plans of the bridge when these plans have been prepared and completed, and also that it had never been asked for inspection, nor had it refused any inspection of plans. In answer to that, it is said that there were no plans to inspect, because the affidavit states that these plans have been sent for examination to England by the consulting engineers there, and have not yet been returned to South Africa. That, it appears to me, does not relieve the Divisional Council from its preliminary duty of, in the first instance, having shown that an application was made for an inspection of plans, and had been refused by the Government. Therefore, so far as the first branch of the rule is concerned, I think that the Divisional Coun-cii has been premature in coming to the Court, and moving the Court for a rule and a temporary interdict. Then, in regard to the second portion of the rule, which seeks to restrain the Government breaking up this main road, I think the Divisional Council must be taken to have consented, and to be bound by the judgment of the Court in the action, which I have mentioned, and, therefore, when a bridge is to be made, and the Council was a party to that and is bound by it, it follows that it must be taken to have consented to all those things that are necessary as preliminaries and preparatory work for the erection of the bridge. All that appears from the affidavits is that this road has been broken up on two sides for the purpose of commencing the erection of the bridge, and the Divisional Council must be taken to have agreed to that, and to be bound by it. But, then, it has been urged by Mr. Benjamin that in section 8 of the original affidavit, not merely does the Divisional Council complain that the road is being broken up, but that the Government, through the Railway Department, has also used the material of this broken up portion of the road for the temporary deviating road, and that this the Railway Department had no right to do. Well, of course, the material of the road broken up does not belong to the Railway Department, and the Railway Department, therefore, should not have used it in this way, but that does not form any portion of the rule. The rule does not call upon the Government to show cause why it shall not be restrained from further removing this material, and using it for its own purposes, but merely that the Government shall be restrained from breaking up the road. There is nothing before me to show that this road has been broken up in an improper manner, and that it is not necessary for commencing the preparatory work for the erection of the bridge. That being so, I must discharge the rule, and I think the rule must be discharged with costs.

Ex parte SWEEGERS AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Buchanan moved for an order authorising the transfer of certain property, in which minors were interested. The Master recommended that the application be granted.

An order was granted in terms of the Master's report.

IMMELMAN V. VISSER.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for leave to sue by edictal citation. Respondent had been domiciled at Fraserburg until six months ago, but his present whereabout were unknown. Applicant wished to sue to recover the purchase price of certain property sold and transferred by him to Visser.

Kotzé, J., said he was not disposed to grant service by edict, because it did not appear that respondent had left the Colony. All that was said was that he had left the district of Fraserburg. He thought proceedings should be taken in the ordinary way, and he would direct that besides service at the last place of residence the process should also be published in a Dutch newspaper, circulating in the district of Fraserburg.

Mr. De Villiers: That is, an ordinary summons.

Kotzé, J.: Yes.

Ex parte READ.

Mr. Alexander moved for leave to mortgage certain property for the purpose of building on property belonging to minors. The Master's report was favourable.

An order was granted in terms of the Master's report.

RAKOFF V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. Howel Jones moved, on behalf of the Government, for leave to sign judgment against the plaintiff, in default of filing his declaration. An affidavit sworn by Mr. Allan Reid, of the firm of Reid and Nephew, stated that the defendants' costs had been taxed, but plaintiff had failed to pay the same.

Order granted.

ACHMATT AND ANOTHER V. BRUYNS. { 1903. Oct. 13th.

Rule 329D—Ignorantia Juris.

Judgment having been obtained under Rule 329d against the applicants by the respondent, the Court refused, upon their application, to set aside the judgment and give them leave to plead.

This was a motion for an order setting aside a certain judgment of the Court, and giving leave to the applicants to enter appearance and defend the action. The affidavit of Alli stated that he was one of the defendants in the original application in May, 1903. The respondent brought an action in the Magistrate's Court, Cape Town, against deponent and the other applicant for £28 3s. 9d., for goods alleged to have been sold and delivered. The action was tried on the 26th May, 1903, and absolution from the instance granted therein. Deponent and the other applicant were under the impression that they had won their case, and they thought it would not be possible to bring another action against them arising out of the same matter. He and the other applicant were Indians, and he did not know that the respondent could bring another action for the same thing. Afterwards, on his calling at the office of the Deputy-Sheriff, a summons was tendered to him by the Deputy-Sheriff's officer, but he declined to accept it, and said it must be served upon him at his place in Loop-street, and the officer then threw the summons at his feet. Subsequently, on consulting his attorney, he found that judgment had been granted against them for £28 3s. 9d. in the Supreme Court, under Rule 329d, on the 12th September, 1903. Deponent denied that he owed the sum of £28 3s. 9d., or any part thereof. The other applicant, Alli Ahmed, had gone to India, and had not yet returned.

The answering affidavit of Andries Bruyns, of Lakeside, Muizenberg, stated that the debt was one for sand, clay, and lime supplied by him personally to both the applicants, to enable them to build their house at Lakeside. He swore positively that he supplied these goods. There could be no defence to the action. The affidavits of Frederick Wm. Herbert, Deputy-Sheriff's officer, deposed to serving the summons on the applicant at his office. The affidavit of one Shurkley, a clerk deposed to one of the applicants calling at the office with respect to the Supreme Court summons, and being urged to defend the case or come to a settlement.

Mr. Benjamin (for the applicant): Leave should be granted to the applicant to purge his default. He thought that absolution from the instance in the Magistrate's Court concluded the case. Judgments under Rule 329d can always be re-opened.

[Kotzé, J.: Not as a matter of right.]

No; but this is exactly one of those cases in which the Court should allow the case to be re-opened. In this case there was a gross breach of confidence as between attorney and client. I would like Schiffman (Karie's clerk) here to cross-examine him, and as he is not here I object to his affidavit.

[Kotzé, J.: What do you say to the affidavit of the Sheriff's officer?]

He thought that there was nothing to compel him to come into Court. There is no evidence of service on the second applicant, and if he can have the case re-opened, so can my client. The applicant denies the debt, and his reasons for being in default are easily explained.

Mr. Upington (for respondent): The applicant can only say that he thought that absolution from the instance concluded the whole case; but it is clear that this judgment was brought to the knowledge of his agent, who must have known what was meant by "absolution from the instance," and then he allows judgment to go by default. The other plaintiff must have known that when served with a summons it was his duty to appear. I submit that no cause has been shown for setting aside the judgment and re-opening the case.

Mr. Benjamin was not heard in reply.

Kotzé, J.: In this matter, it appears that both applicants were sued in the Magistrate's Court for the sum of £28, and the Magistrate granted absolution from the instance. After that a summons was taken out in this Court against the applicants by the now respondent—the plaintiff in the action—who obtained judgment on account of the non-appearance—the default—of the present applicants. Now the applicants come here and allege that they did not know the nature of the proceedings in this Court, that they were under the impression that, when judgment was given by the Magistrate for absolution from the instance, that finally settled the matter. Well, supposing for a moment that the applicants were under that impression at the time, surely that impression must have been removed from their minds when the fresh summons was taken out in this Court, personal service of which was made upon one of the applicants by the Sheriff's messenger.. It also appears that the law agent of the applicants had notice of this summons from the Sheriff's officer. A person cannot be allowed to set up ignorance of the law in this way. It is a well-known principle that ignorance of the law will not excuse, and the applicants cannot now come and say that, when the messenger served the summons taken out in this Court, the idea in their minds was that that was simply a nugatory performance and a void act. I am quite satisfied that the applicants must have known that it was a solemn document, and that they were called upon to enter appearance and plead any defence they had in the action. They did not do that, and I do not see any sufficient cause to justify me in setting aside the judgment. The application must therefore be refused, with costs.

[Applicants' Attorneys:: Freidlander and Du Toit; Respondent's Attorney: H. P. Hughes.]

SIPIKA V. NONKOMANISI AND OTHERS.

Mr. Upington appeared for the applicants, Aliel and Elias Sipika, to move for an order to have certain property transferred to them, as heirs of one Manisi, under native law and custom. The matter was before the Court (Aug. 20—13 C.T.R., 766).

[Kotzé, J.: Is there any affidavit of service?]

No; there is only a certificate by the messenger.

[Kotzé, J.: There should be an affidavit.]

Mr. Upington said there was an irregularity in this respect, but he would suggest that the Court should hear the case and make an order subject to an affidavit being made. Proceeding, counsel said that when the matter was before the Court on the previous occasion, it was ordered to stand over in order that service might be effected upon the parties interested. It was then an ex parte application, and no notice had been given to these persons, and the Court ordered that service should be made on the persons interested, and also suggested that a statement should be given by the Resident Magistrate as to what the native law and custom were. The petition set forth that petitioners were natives, and were the sons of the late Manisi, who died in 1895, possessed of the property now in question. Manisi had married three wives according to native law and custom, and petitioners were the elder sons of the first two wives, the third having died without male issue. They claimed to be the heirs of Manisi, and prayed that the property registered in their father's name should be transferred to them. A certificate was now produced in which the Magistrate stated that the applicant, Aliel Sipika, was the heir according to native law and custom, being the eldest son of Manisi by the chief wife. Aliel Sipika made a supplementary affidavit to the same effect. Counsel said it would appear that only the first-named petitioner was entitled to transfer.

[Kotzé, J.: Elias Sipika may show some good reason why the other applicant should not have transfer.]

Mr. Upington said that the original petition, which had not been amended, asked for transfer to both.

[Kotzé, J.: The matter had better stand over for the production of an affidavit of service.]

DELL V. ESTATE RICCI. { 1903. Oct. 13th. Nov. 11th.

Proof of debt—Contingent claim—Partnership.

A partner, having a claim against his co-partner, cannot prove in respect thereof against the separate estate of the co-partner while any of the joint creditors are unpaid.

This was a motion for an order as to the ranking of a counter claim, compelling the Master to admit and rank a proof of debt tendered by the agent of the applicant at the third meeting of creditors in the insolvent estate of Ricci held on the 24th July last, which proof of debt was refused by him on grounds unknown to the applicant. The affidavit of Alfred

Samuel Fowler set forth that he acted as agent for J. P. W. Dell under power of attorney. On the 20th August, 1902, Dell executed a deed of partnership with George da Costa Ricci, in connection with a hotel business at Claremont. In the deed of partnership, it was provided that applicant should contribute £5,000 to the partnership business, payable £1,000 on the 1st September, 1902, and £1,000 on the 1st October, 1902; that at the expiration of six months from the date of the partnership, the position of the business should be ascertained, and if it be found that the state of the business was such as to warrant its being successfully carried on, the applicant should contribute the further sum of £3,000, making the total £5,000; and that if, at the end of one year from the date of the partnership, it should be found that there was no prospect of successfully carrying on the business in future it should be open to the applicant to give notice to withdraw from the partnership, in which case it would be incumbent upon Ricci to make restitution of the money paid by applicant. The affidavit went on to state that on ascertaining the position of the business six months after date of the partnership, applicant gave notice to withdraw from the partnership. The estate of Ricci was placed under provisional sequestration by order of the Supreme Court on the 23rd May, 1903, and was finally adjudicated on May 30. On the 15th June, deponent, in his capacity as agent for Dell, duly filed a claim on the estate of Ricci for the sum of £2,000, being the amount paid into the partnership by Dell. On the 19th June, at the second meeting held in the estate, Mr. Colton, acting under power of attorney, presented the claim of the applicant, and on objection being taken thereto, it was deferred until the third meeting of creditors. At the third meeting a week later, Mr. Colton again presented the claim, but the Acting Master refused to admit the claim, without assigning any reason for his refusal. The secured debts, amounting to £42,000, were contracted prior to the 1st September, 1902, as also were large portions of the concurrent claims.

The answering affidavit of Mr. G. W. Steytler, one of the trustees in the insolvent estate of Ricci, referred the Court to the report of the trustees. Therein it was stated that before Dell gave notice to terminate the partnership certain liabilities were incurred, and were in existence at the time of the report, and for these the trustees held that Dell was undoubtedly liable. At the second meeting proof of debt was presented on behalf of Dell for £2,000. The trustees took legal advice, with the result that the claim was not admitted, the advice given by counsel being that Dell's claim could not rank with those of the other creditors, he being in the position of a partner, and that the liabilities to him could only be defined after the liabilities to the partnership creditors were liquidated.

Mr. Upington (for applicant): Dell wishes to prove on the insolvent estate for £2,000, said to be owing by Ricci. The trustee says that Ricci is responsible for all debts owing to applicant. I admit that Ricci has no preference in respect of the other creditors. As to the voice of the majority of debtors, see Copestake v. Alexander (2 Juta, 137). In the resent case some such relief should be granted as was conceded in that case.

[Kotzé, J.: Is Ricci's private estate sequestrated?]

Yes, I submit that it is. It is not clear from the trustee's report that there is any movable property in the estate. The only thing before the Court is a statement by the insolvent. There is nothing else to show what the liabilities of Ricci and of Ricci and Dell are. If Dell has any claims against the estate he should be allowed to prove contingently on his paying out the joint creditors. Of course, a partner cannot compete against joint creditors, but that is not the present case.

Mr. Schreiner (for respondent): The first point to determine is whether the Master is bound to admit Colton's proof of debt. Under section 27 the Master must either admit or refuse to admit the debt. The applicant relies chiefly on section 31, which is quite inapplicable to the present case. It is admitted that a partner cannot compete in case of insolvency with partnership creditors; but this is a question of debts contracted before the partnership was carried on. When applicant's counsel admits that Dell could not claim in preference to partnership creditors, he admits my whole case. All the assets are now in the hands of Ricci. The whole business was carried on in his name. Possibly Dell may have a good defence should he be sued personally for the firm debts, but the fallacy of the counsel for the applicant was that he did not seem to acknowledge Dell's liability. Dell may have been a silent partner, but even if that was so, he was liable for his share of the £45,000. I submit that the applicant cannot prove on the insolvent estate.

[Kotze, J.: Why cannot he prove subject to the claims of the preferent creditors?]

The law makes no provision for such a case as this. Dell put his cash into the business, and by the deed of partnership was bound to share loss as well as profit. The first point to be determined is: "How much was swallowed up by repairs?" and the Master must either admit or reject this or any other claim. I would not object to the applicant proving his debt, but I do say that even a sleeping partner cannot prove as against ordinary concurrent creditors, even if he has advanced money to the firm. Copestake v. Alexander (2 Juta, 137) is quite a different case from this.

[Kotze, J.: Would Dell be liable for partnership debts contracted before he became a partner?]

Not personally, but if he put money into the firm, that money would be liable. All the Master had to do was either to admit or reject the proof of debt. The only other case I can find bearing on the point is Watermeyer v. Kerdel's Trustees (3 Menz., 424). I quite admit that the judgments of Wylde, C.J., and of Kewich, J., are against me, but that of Menzies, J. (who goes very fully into the Common Law authorities) is quite in my favour.

[Kotze, J.: I feel bound by the decision of the Court.]

Of course, but that case was not quite the same as this. Here Ricci has no estate, as far as we know, save partnership assets. In Watermeyer's case the majority of the Court found there was no partnership; had they found that there was one ,they would, no doubt, have gone as far as Menzies, J. See also Pothier (Chap. 2, Secs. 102, 160, and 161).

Cur. adv. vult.

Postea (November 11).

Kotze, J.: This is an application to compel the Master to admit and rank a proof of debt tendered on behalf of J. Dell at the third meeting of creditors in the insolvent estate of George da Costa Ricci, but which was refused by him. On the 30th May, 1903, the estate of George da Costa Ricci was finally sequestrated, and, on the 19th June, Messrs. J. J. Wessels and G. W. Steytler were elected trustees. It appears that Ricci, the insolvent, carried on an hotel and sanitarium at Claremont, and, in order to secure further capital for the purpose of continuing and carrying on the business, he, on the 26th August, 1902, entered into an agreement of partnership with Dell. By this agreement it is stipulated: (1) That the partnership shall commence on the 1st September, 1902, and shall continue for the term or period of five years, unless it shall be sooner determined under the provisions hereinafter contained. (2) That Dell shall contribute £2,000 towards the partnership capital in order to carry on the business of the said hotel on the following terms, viz.: £1,000 to be paid by Dell on the 1st September, 1902, and £1,000 on the 1st October, 1902, this latter sum of £1,000 to be for the exclusive use of Ricci. At the expiration of the first six months the position of the business was to be ascertained, and, should it then appear to Dell that the position was such as to justify a successful carrying on for the future, he undertook to contribute a further sum of £3,000, which said sum should also be for Ricci's exclusive use and benefit. It is also expressly stipulated that if at the end of the year it should be found that there is no prospect of successfully carrying on the said business in the future, it shall be at the option of Dell to give notice that he withdraws from the partnership, and in that event it shall be incumbent on Ricci to make due restitution of the sum of £2,000. (3) Ricci shall submit the goodwill, valued at £2,000, for the benefit of the partnership, and absorbing into the partnership the whole of the property at present occupied by him and conducted as an hotel, valued at £45,000. (4) the profits and losses of the business shall be shared equally by both parties, but neither partner shall be responsible for the debts or engagements of the other contracted before the entering into of this partnership. (5) Both partners shall devote their whole time and attention to the partnership business. (6) At the expiration of six months, should it be mutually decided to continue the said business, then six months' notice on either side shall be required to terminate the partnership, such notice to be in writing; the partner so giving notice shall be entitled to receive not more than £5,000 as his share of the partnership.

Dell duly paid to Ricci £2,000 in two instalments of £1,000 each, as provided by the deed of partnership, and, having ascertained the position of the business at the expiration of six months from the date of the partnership, he gave notice to Ricci, withdrawing from the partnership, and did so withdraw. This withdrawal was about three months before the sequestration of the estate of Ricci, who continued the business. Dell now seeks to prove in the insolvent estate of Ricci for the amount of £2,000, maintaining that ,by the deed of partnership, on his withdrawing from the business, it became incumbent on Ricci to repay him that sum. The trustees of the insolvent estate of Ricci oppose this application on the ground that the proof cannot be accepted until the partnership creditors are paid in full. It is admitted on behalf of the applicant that he cannot claim or prove against the partnership estate in competition with joint creditors, but it is contended that he is entitled to prove his claim as a contingent one against the estate of Ricci. It is difficult to see how the claim of Dell to be repaid his £2,000 advanced for the purpose of the partnership can be regarded as contingent within the meaning of section 31 of the Insolvent Ordinance. Reference was made to Copestake v. Alexander (2, Juta, 137), where this Court, by a majority, allowed a proof of debt by a late partner on an insolvent estate contingently on his having to pay any of the debts of the late partnership. The decision in that case was, however, arrived at in view of circumstances differing from those of the present application. Alexander, who with one Fisher, traded as Alexander and Co., retired from the partnership, which was dissolved under an agreement, by which he was to receive £500, and leave all the assets to Fisher, who undertook, by reason of the cession of all the assets of the firm to him, to hold Alexander harmless against all claim and demand which might be made against him in respect of the co-partnership, and all losses, damages, and costs which he might incur in respect thereof. The Chief Justice, in his judgment, made the following observations: "The indemnity given to him must surely constitute him a creditor of Fisher for any moneys he may pay in respect of debts which were owing to the firm of Alexander and Co. at the time of the dissolution of partnership. Even without such an indemnity he would, after paying the joint debts of the firm, have been entitled to prove as a separate creditor for the amount of the share which ought to have been paid by Fisher . . . . . The respondent has, therefore, been properly admitted as a creditor of Fisher's estate for the amounts due by him to the creditors of Alexander and Co., but he is merely a contingent creditor, and until the condition upon which his debt depends shall be performed, he is only entitled to a dividend upon such sum as represents the value of the debt." In the present case Dell is not seeking to prove against the separate estate of Ricci for joint debts of the partnership, which he has paid. The £2,000 paid by Dell to Ricci is expressly stated by the agreement entered into between them to be a portion of the partnership capital in order to carry on the joint business of the partnership. Although the agreement provides that on the retirement of Dell from the partnership Ricci shall be obliged to repay him the £2,000, this will not entitle Dell to prove on that account against the insolvent estate. It has been held that a partner, who has a claim against his co-partner, cannot prove in respect thereof against the separate estate of the latter, while any of the joint creditors are unpaid, because by so doing he would diminish any surplus of the separate estate, which, after satisfying the separate creditors, might be coming to the joint estate. (Ex parte Carter, 2, Glyn and Jameson, 233, and ex parte Ellis, Ib., 312). It may be said that the proof should be allowed subject to the contingency that, after all, the joint creditors are paid, a surplus shall be found to exist. But that is entirely problematical, and until it appears that there will be a surplus, no question as to its application or distribution can arise. As was observed by Lord Chancellor Cairns in Vanson v. Gordon (L.R., 1, App. Co., 203), "It is not the habit of the Court, and would not be right in the Court, to investigate what might be called the outcome of the accounts, in order to determine, a priori, whether the rule ought or ought not to be applied." I see no reason why the Master should be ordered to allow the proof of debt, which he has rejected. The application must be refused, with costs.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Michau and De Villiers; Respondents' Attorneys: Van Zyl and Buissinné.]

KRAEMER v. KLEINBACH.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved to make absolute a rule nisi calling upon respondent to show cause why an order should not be granted restraining the police authorities from parting with certain moneys, pending an account being filed. Counsel said the matter had been postponed from the previous day, owing to there being no proof of service. An affidavit of service was now produced.

The rule was made absolute.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

Ex parte COPPIN. { 1903. Oct. 14th

Mr. Benjamin moved on behalf of the petitioner, who is Bishop and head in South Africa of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, for an amendment of the transfer of a certain plot of ground at Claremont, acquired by the local branch for church purposes. It appeared that the property, which was purchased in June last, had been registered in the name of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, and was thus vested in the board of trustees, resident in America, with the result that there was no one in this country who was competent to deal with the property It was desired that the land should be transferred to the trustees of the Claremont Station, as they were anxious to raise a mortgage to meet the bills of the contractor, who was engaged in erecting a building on the ground.

[Kotze, J.: I do not see how we can transfer land from the board of trustees of the Church, even though they are resident in America, without the consent of the trustees.]

Mr. Benjamin said that the trouble had probably arisen from an error on the part of the conveyancer. The purchase price of the property was only £52, the building operations had been commenced, and it was of the utmost importance that there should be no delay in raising a mortgage on the land and buildings.

A rule nisi was granted, calling upon the board of trustees of the Church to show on the 1st February next why an amendment of the transfer should not be made as prayed.

Ex parte DE PAARLSCHE GANDAAUL-COOP MAATSCHAPPIJ.

Mr. Benjamin moved for confirmation of the report presented by the official liquidators in this matter. The report, he said, had been laid open for inspection, as ordered by the Court, due publication had been made, but there were two special orders that were now asked for: (1) that the Court should fix a day on or before which all claims must be filed, the liquidators suggesting a period of 30 days; and (2) that they should be authorised to institute and prosecute such legal proceedings, as they might be advised, to recover £600 and interest, originally advanced to one D. F. du Toit and others, and also to proceed for the recovery of damages against the estate of F. J. G. Perold, and if so advised, against the directors of the defunct company.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte HOFMEYR.

Mr. Buchanan moved for an order authorising petitioner's examination as a notary public. It appeared from the petition that Mr. Hofmeyr had been admitted as an attorney of this Court, and that he had formerly been in practice in Johannesburg, having been admitted as a notary of the Supreme Court both prior to and since annexation of the Transvaal.

Mr. Upington intimated that the Incorporated Law Society raised no objection to the application.

Order granted as prayed.

VAN DER HORST v. THE COLONIAL GOVERNMENT. { 1903. Oct. 14th. „ 20th.

Rule 333D—Discovery—Privilege.

In obedience to an order for discovery under Rule 333, the respondent in an affidavit stated that he has in his possession "voluminous departmental correspondence," and objected to disclose this on the ground that such correspondence is privileged. In an application to compel the respondent to disclose and produce this correspondence.

Held (1) that official correspondence as such is, in the absence of some further or special circumstances, shewing that it would be contrary to the policy of an Act of Parliament or injurious to the public interest, not privileged from disclosure;

(2) that sufficient information should be given with regard to the documents comprising the correspondence, in order to enable the Court to judge whether any or all such documents are privileged.

The Court consequently directed that the respondent should file a further and more complete affidavit, setting forth with sufficient accuracy the particular grounds for such objection.

Chester & Gibb v. The Big Ben G.M. Company (4 H. C. 374) followed.

This was an application upon notice of motion calling upon the Government to show cause why they should not disclose and produce the correspondence which had passed between the Commissioner of Public Works and the Cape Government Railway Department, and between the various departments of the C.G.R., relating to matters connected with the subject of the suit.

The affidavit of Mr. Van der Byl, plaintiff's attorney, stated that the applicant had instituted proceedings against the respondents for the recovery of £5.000, as and for damages sustained through injuries received owing to the negligence of the Railway Department. Pleadings had been closed, and the case had been set down for hearing on the 4th November next. On the 1st September last applicant obtained an order in this Court requiring the respondent to make discovery of all documents relating to the subject matter of the action. Upon the said order being served on the respondents' attorneys, they filed an affidavit disclosing certain documents, and stating that there were other documents, which they declined to disclose. Thereupon certain correspondence ensued, and it transpired that the respondents' attorneys declined to make discovery of voluminous departmental correspondence, and of the letters between the General Manager and Messrs. Reid and Nephew (attorneys to the Railway Department) and Messrs. Reid and Nephew and the General Manager. Applicant contended that the affidavit filed by the respondents was not sufficient, and was not in compliance with the rules of the Court, and that departmental correspondence were not documents which were privileged. The answering affidavit of Mr. McEwen, General Manager of Railways, stated that he had, to the best of his knowledge and belief, disclosed all documents relating to the matter, save and except voluminous correspondence and letters addressed by him to Messrs. Reid and Nephew, and by Reid and Nephew to himself, which were privileged.

The affidavit of Mr. J. H. Reid, respondents' attorney, stated that, so far he knew, in no case had departmental correspondence in any action against the Colonial Government been disclosed, such correspondence not being regarded as relating to the case within the meaning of the Rule of Court.

Mr. Benjamin (with him Mr. Van Zyl), for applicants; Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. H. Jones), for respondents.

Mr. Benjamin said that the application came before the Court, under Rule 333d, which set forth that any party might apply to a judge for an order for the discovery of any document which might be in possession of the other side relating to any matter in question in the action, saving all lawful and just exceptions. It would be his contention that the only "lawful and just exception" to the rule was privileged matter, and practically the only privileged matter was the matter that had passed between the respondents and their legal advisers. There was a similar rule in force in the English Courts, which had been interpreted by a number of decisions. In the 1903 edition of the "Annual Practice" (p. 399, rule 12), the editor defined such documents as should be disclosed thus: "Documents containing information which may either directly or indirectly enable the parties seeking discovery, either to advance his own case or damage that of his adversary, or which may fairly lead him to a train of inquiry." Counsel contended that he was entitled to the discovery of all such documents, quite apart from the fact of whether they were relevant or admissible at the trial. The only exception was privileged matter, and it rested upon his learned friend to prove that the documents which were not disclosed were privileged.

[Kotzé, J.: What is the point in the case?]

Mr. Benjamin said the case arose out of an explosion on the railway. An employee was sent on the railway——

Mr. Schreiner (interposing): No, not an employee.

Mr. Benjamin: Well, we contend that it was an employee who was sent on the railway with some dynamite, and in delivering this dynamite he threw it out of the window. An explosion took place, and the plaintiff, who was travelling in one of the carriages of the train at the time, was injured by the explosion, and his wife was also hurt.

[Kotzé, J.: Then the point seems to be whether the man who had charge of the dynamite was an employee of the C.G.R. or not.]

Mr. Benjamin (continuing his argument) said he was entitled to have discovery of any documents which might throw some light on the question of whether this person was an employee. He proceeded to cite the cases of the Compagnie Financiers v. Peruvian Guano Co. (Vol. 48, Law Times Reports, p. 22), and Buyskes v. White (Vol. 34, Law Times Reports, p. 385). He contended that the Government enjoyed no greater privilege than a private individual.

[Kotzé, J.: According to your argument, secrets of State would have to be disclosed?]

Mr. Benjamin: That is a privilege, my lord. There is nothing on affidavit here to show that this is a secret of State. If they could make an affidavit to that effect here, then they may claim that privilege. Continuing, counsel said that it had been held in an English case that a plaintiff was bound to disclose a letter, written to him by his mercantile agent, though the letter contained only a personal opinion on the plaintiff's chances of success, based on no more knowledge than was common to the parties, and was quite irrelevant to the action. In what different position was the Government to a private individual? Counsel submitted that plaintiff was entitled to have disclosed any documents in the possession of the other side, which were not privileged. On the question of what could be privileged, counsel quoted from page 376 of the Annual Practice, where under the head of "Legal Professional Privilege," it was stated that privilege did not exist in respect to any person except a legal professional agent. He also cited the case of Wheeler v. L'Marchant (17, Chancery Division, pages 681, 682) and the Colonial cases of the London and South African Exploration Company v. the Beaconsfield Municipality (3, High Court Reports, p. 182), Kendrick v. Central Diamond Mining Company (3, High Court Reports, p. 352), Chester and Dibb v. Burtam Gold Mining Company (4, High Court Reports, p. 374), and Milcrist v. European Diamond Mining Company (2, Appeal Cases, p. 78). He submitted that as far as this Court had gone it had adopted the interpretation given to the rule by the English Courts.

Mr. Schreiner referred to the case of Fraser v. Sivewright (3, Juta, p. 375), and contended that this showed the clear privilege which attached indubitably to communications which passed between a minister and the officers of his department. The ruling in that case absolutely deprived the plaintiff of any right to claim that departmental documents should be disclosed. What would the position of the Government be if it were open to any person to come with a fishing application and demand to see such documents? It was not for this particular case that one was contending, it was for a principle of very great importance. The privilege which attached to departmental official communications was in exactly the same category as the privilege which attached to counsel's opinion. Counsel quoted from Taylor on evidence (9th edition, paragraph 937), and went on to argue as to the difference between the meaning of the terms "discover" and "disclose."

[Kotze, J.: I would like to hear Mr. Schreiner on the point whether it was sufficiently clear that this departmental correspondence fell within the second or third head of the classification mentioned by the Chief Justice in the case of Fraser v. Sivewright.]

Mr. Schreiner submitted that it did fall within the second head. He admitted that the General Manager's affidavit might have been amplified in this sense that the correspondence could have been more fully described. He submitted that it was sufficiently clear from the words "departmental correspondence" that the documents referred to were the official communications which passed between the different officers of the department and came within the classification of the Chief Justice, and "made by a subordinate official to his superior officer in obedience to some law or order."

Mr. Benjamin said there was absolutely nothing in the affidavits to show why the correspondence was privileged. He contended that the applicant was entitled to an order for the production of the documents, because it had not been established that they were privileged. He submitted that if there was a document in existence instructing the man to carry this dynamite from the stationmaster that document could not be held to be privileged. There was absolutely nothing before the Court to show that the production of these documents would be injurious to the public interest.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (October 20th).

Kotzé, J.: This is an application to compel the Colonial Government, the defendant in an action at suit of the plaintiff, to disclose and produce certain correspondence which has passed between the Commissioner of Public Works and the Cape Government Railways Department, and between the various departments of the Cape Government Railways, relating to matters in question in the above suit. The action is instituted for the recovery of £5,000, as and by way of damages for injuries said to have been sustained by the plaintiff and his wife, by reason of alleged negligence on the part of certain employees or servants of the Railway Department. On the 1st September the applicant obtained an order, under Rule 333, directing the respondent to make discovery on oath of all documents, papers, and writings which are or have been in his power, possession, or control, or in that of his attorneys or agents, relating to matters in issue in the suit. Thereupon the General Manager of Railways made an affidavit on the 9th September, in which, after stating that he has in his possession certain documents set forth in a schedule annexed, he proceeds to say that he has not any other document or copy, or extract from any document, material to the matters in issue, "save and except such documents as are privileged." Upon its being pointed out by letter from the plaintiff's attorney that the defendant must state what these documents are, and upon what grounds he objects to produce them, the General Manager on the 24th September made a further affidavit "that the documents referred to as being privileged in the affidavit sworn to by me on the 9th day of September, 1903, consist of voluminous departmental correspondence, and letters addressed by me to J. and H. Reid and Nephew, and by J. and H. Reid and Nephew to me." The applicant, while admitting that the letters to and by Messrs. Reid and Nephew, the solicitors of the respondent, are privileged, maintains that departmental correspondence is not privileged from disclosure unless it is made sufficiently to appear that the production of this correspondence would be detrimental to the public interest. The applicant contends that there is nothing before the Court to show that this is so in the present instance. It is provided by Rule 333c, which is similar to the rule existing in England on the subject, that a party against whom a discovery order is made shall in his affidavit specify which, if any, of the documents therein mentioned he objects to produce. In the form given in the Appendix No. 2 to this rule, it is said that the party should state upon what grounds the objection is made, and verify the facts as far as may be. In the cases of the London and South African Exploration Co. v. The Beaconsfield Municipality (3 H.C., 182) and Chester and Gibb v. The Big Ben Gold-mining Co. (4 H.C., 374), the High Court of Griqualand West ruled that particulars should be stated as to the documents with regard to which privilege from production or disclosure is claimed, and the grounds upon which it is based. In the latter of these two cases, it was held that it is not sufficient merely to allege the existence of certain correspondence, and to object to produce the same on the ground that it consists of "professional and confidential communications." In most of the English cases the objection to produce or disclose certain documents on the ground that it would be contrary to the public interest to allow their production has been taken at the trial, and not in an application for discovery. An attempt was made on behalf of the present applicant to draw a distinction between disclosure of a document in evidence during a trial of an action, and disclosure in obedience to an order for discovery. It was contended that many documents which cannot be put in as evidence at the trial, have nevertheless to be disclosed on discovery. That, no doubt, is a statement which cannot be disputed, but it does not follow that, so far as privilege from disclosure of a document on the ground that it would be contrary to the public interest to allow its production is concerned, this distinction applies. No authority has been cited in support of it, and there is at least the opinion of Wills, J., against it. In Hennessy v. Wright (21 Q.B.D., 521), which was an application for discovery, the learned Judge says: "It is obvious that whatever difference may exist between the case of evidence asked for or tendered at the trial, and that of an application for discovery or inspection is altogether in favour of a refusal to order discovery in the earlier stages of the case." In that case, like in Fraser v. Sivewright (3 Juta, 375), the more important English decisions are reviewed, but it is not now necessary to consider them. I will merely refer to Smith v. The East India Company (1 Phill., 50), where Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst held that official correspondence is not privileged as such. It is only so when it would be contrary to the policy of an Act of Parliament, or injurious to the public interest to allow its production. Hence, in Fraser v. Sivewright it was held that an official report made by Sivewright as General Manager of Telegraphs to the Postmaster-General, with whose department Sivewright had no direct official connection, the responsible head of the Telegraph Department being the Commissioner of Crown Lands and Public Works, and the responsible head of the Postal Department being the Colonial Secretary, was not privileged from disclosure. It has been urged on behalf of the respondent that the departmental correspondence mentioned in the affidavit of the General Manager of Railways falls within the second class of official communications, which were said by the Chief Justice in Fraser v. Sivewright to be privileged from disclosure, viz., those made by a subordinate official to his superior officer in obedience to some law or legal order. But now the affidavit of the General Manager of Railways simply says that the documents in his possession consist of "voluminous departmental correspondence." There is nothing to show that the responsible executive head of the department, that is the Commissioner of Public Works, objects to the production of this correspondence or any portion of it, nor is there anything before me from which I can judge and decide whether the disclosure of any or all of these documents will be contrary to the public interest. The allegation that the correspondence is departmental may amount to a statement that it is principally official, but that is not enough, for official correspondence, as such, is not in the absence of some further or special circumstance privileged from disclosure. As suggested during the argument, there may be letters written by the Railway Department to the alleged employe or servant, through whose negligence the injuries are said to have been caused, directing him or consenting to his removing by a passenger train certain packages of dynamite, the explosion of which seriously injured the plaintiff and his wife. The pleadings show that whether one Pearce was or was not in the service or employ of the Railway Department is a principal, if not the main issue in the case, for the defendant denies such service or employment. The Court must, therefore, have some more definite information before it in order to be able to say whether or not the departmental correspondence or any document or documents comprised thereunder are privileged from production. In Hennessy v. Wright the affidavit of the plaintiff, the Governor of a colony, stated: "I have in my custody, but acquired and held by me in my capacity of Her Majesty's Governor of Mauritius, and subject to the directions of the H.M. Secretary of State for the Colonies, a number of copies of various despatches, reports, and other communications, with the enclosures referred to therein, which passed either between H.M. Secretary of State and myself, as such Governor aforesaid, or between the Royal Commissioner appointed by Her Majesty to inquire into the affairs of Mauritius and myself as such Governor, or between the said Royal Commissioner and the said Secretary of State. The attention of the Secretary of State has been directed to the nature and dates of the said documents, and he has directed me not to produce or disclose the said documents and to object to their production in these proceedings on the ground of the interest of the State and of the public service In consequence of those instructions and of the rules and regulations of Her Majesty's Colonial Service, I am unable to produce the said documents, and I object to produce them on the ground aforesaid." The case was one of an application for discovery made by the defendant in a libel action, brought against him by the Governor. Although there was no affidavit by the Secretary of State for the Colonies that he had examined the documents and considered them State papers, or that their production would be injurious to the public interest, and although no copy of the rules and regulations of the Colonial Service appears to have been submitted, the Court, consisting of Field and Willis, J.J., held, after a consideration of the authorities, that there was sufficient information before the Court that the documents in question were privileged from discovery, and consequently refused the application. There could not be any doubt as to the nature of the documents in that case. According to the description given of them they were either State papers, or of a kind which it would have been contrary to the public interest to have ordered to be produced. In the present instance, it cannot be said that there is enough before the Court to enable me to rule that the correspondence referred to is privileged. The documents comprising this correspondence must be more particularly described and detailed. The administration of justice between party and party is a matter of public concern, and although it may be quite true that the interest of a party to a suit cannot weigh against what is contrary to the interest of the State, it must sufficiently appear that this will be the case before the Court will hold that documents relating to the matter in dispute are protected from disclosure. The onus of establishing privilege from production rests on the parting claiming it. I will follow the course adopted in Chester and Gibb v. the Big Ben G.M. Co., which I venture to think is a proper and correct one to adopt, and order the respondent to file a further and more complete affidavit setting forth with sufficient accuracy the particular documents which he objects to produce and the particular grounds for such objection.

Ex parte VAN DER WALT.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for an order authorising the registration of certain property, which the petitioner and one Sweegers had purchased from a certain estate, part by private sale and part at a public auction. The sum paid was certified to be fair and reasonable. The petitioner was one of the executors dative in the estate from which purchase was made. He was not an executor at the time of the private sale.

Kotzé, J.: The matter had better stand over, in order that an affidavit may be made by the executor, from whom petitioner purchased privately.

Ex parte SAIT.

Mr. Bisset moved for leave to raise a certain sum of money on mortgage in order to make improvements on property belonging to the heirs under the joint will of petitioner and her deceased husband. Petitioner had ordered the improvements under the belief that she was the absolute heiress, whereas she only had a life interest.

The matter was ordered to stand over for further information as to the value of the property and the ages of the two heirs.

Postea (October 16): On the required information being furnished on affidavit, an order was granted as prayed.

Ex parte THE WORCESTER BUTCHERY CO. (LTD.).

Mr. Buchanan presented the second report of the liquidators.

The report was ordered to lie for inspection as usual, and to be published in certain four newspapers.

Ex parte WHITE.

Mr. Upington moved for leave to dispose of certain property. The property belonged to the two children of petitioner, one of whom was a minor, and it was stated that a very high price could be obtained for the land, the market being exceptionally good at present. The property had been sold, subject to the leave of the Court. The major heir had decided to sell his half-share. The Master's report was favourable.

An order was granted in terms of the Master's report.

Ex parte GIDDY AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Buchanan moved for leave to transfer a certain farm in the district of Barkly East to one of the executors dative in the estate of the late John Frank Giddy. The property was offered for sale by public auction, and after spirited bidding, was knocked down to Edward Wm. Quinn Giddy, one of the executors, for £3,700, which was considered a fair and reasonable price.

Leave was given to effect transfer as prayed.

SOLOMONS V. ROSENBERG.

This was an application for an order compelling plaintiff (Solomons) to furnish security for costs.

From the statement of counsel, it appeared that the present applicant was the defendant in an action for malicious prosecution, and the matter came before the Court on notice of motion calling upon Solomons to show cause why he should not be required to furnish to the defendant or his attorneys sufficient good security for costs in the action. The affidavit of David Rosenberg stated that summons was issued against him on the 14th March last, and as he believed that plaintiff was domiciled in the Transvaal, he instructed his attorneys to write to plaintiff asking for security. This the attorneys did on the 18th March, but the plaintiff's attorneys replied stating that plaintiff was not domiciled in the Transvaal, but in this colony. In view of this assurance, deponent took no further action at the time, but in September last, being satisfied that plaintiff was domiciled in Johannesburg, and outside the jurisdiction of the Court, again instructed his attorneys to write to the plaintiff. Solomons replied offering the guarantee of Mr. W. B. Shaw for the sum of £40 as security for costs, but applicant, not knowing the financial positon of Mr. Shaw, was not satisfied with the guarantee, and therefore brought the present application. Applicant had ascertained that plaintiff had come to this colony from the Transvaal as a refugee, and had returned before the end of the war.

The answering affidavit of Mr. W. B. Shaw stated that plaintiff had made the offer, and still made it, to give security for £40. He objected, however, to paying this sum in cash to the present applicant—for several reasons, one being that applicant would not give security for the sum if deposited. Deponent made a statement as to being worth over £40.

Mr. Buchanan for applicant; Mr. Rainsford for respondent.

After hearing counsel,

Kotzé, J.: The order I shall make will be that the plaintiff in the action—the present respondent—shall give security to the satisfaction of the Registrar of the Court for the amount of £40, and that the costs of this application be costs in the cause.

Ex parte EYBERS.

Mr. De Waal moved for leave to mortgage certain property, in which minors were concerned. The petitioner was curator dative. The Master recommended that an order be granted in terms of the prayer of the petition.

An order was granted accordingly.

REX V. STERN. } 1903. { Oct. 14th.

Bechuanaland Proclamations Nos. 64 and 113—Bastards.

Bastards are included in the term Native under Proclamation No. 64. It is not essential to prove that Bastards are descended from aboriginal natives or are living as members of a native community or kraal. Consequently the Court upheld a conviction for the sale of liquor to Bastards in the district of Gordonia.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Gordonia. The accused was charged with a contravention of section 2 of Bechuanaland Proclamation 64 of 1869, as amended by Proclamation 113 of 1881, in that he unlawfully sold or supplied liquor to two Bastards named Maasdorp and Moitong. He was convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine of £10, or to undergo fourteen days' imprisonment. The appeal was made on the grounds that the conviction was unsupported by the evidence, and was contrary to law, and that the Court of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Gordonia had no jurisdiction in the case, inasmuch as he tried the case upon an allegation of facts which could not constitute such an offence in terms of the Proclamation, which only applied to natives or persons of mixed race, or Bastards resident in the district of Gordonia, and did not apply to men domiciled in German South-west Africa, where Maasdorp and Moitong were stated to be domiciled. In their evidence, the men Maasdorp and Moitong said they were resident in German South-west Africa. They deposed to having been supplied at Stern's store, the one with four and the other with twelve bottles of brandy, which they stated they intended for consumption at their own homes. The bottles of brandy were found by the police in the wagon which they were driving.

In his reasons the Magistrate stated that the word "natives" figured in the summons, but "Bastards" had been substituted without any objection being made at the time. The whole case hinged upon the question whether Bastards domiciled in German territory were on the same footing as residents of Gordonia. It was contended at the trial that the men Maasdorp and Moitong had only to observe the laws of their domicile, but the Court could not take this view of the case. Even if this were so, it was not the bastards who were charged, but the defendant was charged with an offence committed by him in Gordonia. The men were originally of one people, who resided in Gordonia, and were engaged in transport work between Gordonia and German South-West Africa.

Mr. Gardiner for the appellant. Mr. H. Jones for the Crown.

Mr. Gardiner said that the term "native" included aboriginals whether full or half-caste. "Aboriginals" referred to natives belonging to the country in question, for which the legislation was passed, and it could not be held that someone born in German South-West Africa could be an aboriginal native of British Bechuanaland. He contended that the natives in question were not "Bastards" of British Bechuanaland, but of the adjoining German territory. Proclamation 64 distinctly specified "aboriginal native." He submitted that the law should be administered as favourably as possible in a matter of doubt such as this, and especially where foreigners to the district were concerned, who were not specifically referred to.

Mr. Howel Jones said his friend's argument seemed to be so weak that it was difficult to know what to say in reply.

He contended that the persons in question were embraced in the definition set out in the Proclamation, and that it was of no importance whether they actually belonged to the district of Gordonia or not.

Mr. Gardiner in reply.

Kotzé, J.: This is an appeal from the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Gordonia. It appears that one Wm. Stern was charged before the Magistrate with selling a quantity of liquor to two persons, who are described in the charge as "Bastards," viz., one Maasdorp and one Moitong, and there can be no doubt, according to the evidence of these two persons themselves, that they are "bastards," and there is nothing on the record to rebut that. Therefore, the Court must take it as proved that these two people are "Bastards" to whom the liquor or brandy was sold. Now, it is argued by Mr. Gardiner that these two persons do not fall within the definition of the word "Bastard," as defined by Proclamation 113. Well, Proclamation 113 refers back to Proclamation 64, that being, apparently, the first Proclamation on the subject, and that Proclamation in section 2 says that whoever shall sell, whether licensed or unlicensed, to any native in British Bechuanaland any spirituous liquor commits a criminal offence and it also goes on to say that the word native shall for the purposes of this section mean "any aboriginal native belonging to any native tribe or community, and shall include half-castes, and all persons of mixed race, living as members of any native community, tribe, kraal, or location." This Proclamation was extended by Proclamation 113 to "Bastards." The Proclamation provides that the word "native" in the Proclamation No. 64, "shall for the purposes of the said Proclamation, so far as the district of Gordonia is concerned, be taken to include all persons of mixed race commonly called Bastards in the said district, whether such persons be living as members of any native community or not." Mr. Gardiner has very ingeniously argued that the Court, in order to come to a right conclusion as to what is meant by a Bastard under this Proclamation 113, must consider the previous Proclamation No. 64, where the word native is defined as meaning an aboriginal native or a person of mixed race living as an aboriginal native in a kraal. But the Proclamation 113 does not say that the words aboriginal native shall be taken to be extended to "Bastards," but it says that the word "native," as it is defined in Proclamation 64, shall also be taken to include "Bastards or persons commonly called Bastards in the said district of Gordonia." That evidence shows that these two people, who were at the time doing transport with their wagons in the district of Gordonia, described themselves as being "Bastards" in that district, and, that being so, I think that they fall within the term "Bastard" as mentioned in Proclamation No. 113. I am, therefore, of opinion that the decision of the Magistrate on that point was correct, and that this appeal should be disallowed.

REVIEW CASE.

REX V. BOLINKI.

Mr. Benjamin moved, under the 190th rule of Court, for the review of certain proceedings before the Assistant Resident Magistrate of King William's Town in a case in which Bolinki was convicted of supplying liquor to an aboriginal native.

Mr. Howel Jones appeared for the Crown.

It appeared that the proceedings had been before Mr. Justice Sheil for review, and that he had confirmed the sentence.

Mr. Justice Kotze said he was doubtful as to whether one judge of the Supreme Court could adjudicate in a case which another judge had already confirmed on review, but, in any case, he thought it desirable that the matter should be heard by a full bench, and he therefore ordered that it should stand over.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZÉ.]

A REFERENCE.

REX V. MAWABE. { 1903. Oct. 15th.

Mr. Justice Maasdorp said that, in the case of Rex v. Mawabe, heard in the High Court of Southern Rhodesia, a point had been reserved, and the Supreme Court was asked to appoint counsel to appear for the prisoner, who had not got means to appear. His Lordship asked Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers to accept the reference.

Mr. De Villiers acquiesced.

ADMISSION.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved for the admission of Robert Charles Farquharson as an attorney-at-law and notary public.

Application granted, oath to be taken before the Resident Magistrate of Queen's Town.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

COLLEY V. PARKINS.

Superannuated judgment—R.M. Court—Revival.

In the absence of any authority the Court refused to revive a R.M. Court judgment which had become superannuated.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for a sentence passed in the Court of the Resident Magistrate of Vryburg to be revived, and for provisional sentence to be decreed upon the following amounts: £20 11s. 2d., £28 2s., and £17 10s. 4d. Counsel said that the judgment, which was given in 1895, had become superannuated, and it was now sought to put it in force.

[Maasdorp, J.: Can this Court revive a judgment which has been superannuated?]

Mr. Bisset: Yes. See Van der Linden (Bk. 3, Part 1, Chap. 3, Sec. 3).

[Maasdorp, J.: Can this Court revive a judgment of a lower Court.]

Yes; the only effect of our going back to the Magistrate's Court would be to multiply costs. A portion of this debt has been admitted.

[Maasdorp, J.: Since that admission was made the respondent may have had a counter claim.]

But see Bank of Africa v. Kimberley Mining Board (2, Appeal Court,).

[Maasdorp, J.: How can we direct a lower Court to revive its judgment?]

[Kotzé, J.: I understand that this summons has not been personally served?]

It has been served in accordance with the Rule of Court. See Garlick v. Broido (7 C.T.R., 159). That case differs from the present, (1) because there was no evidence that any writ had been issued on that judgment. (2) because it was a judgment of a foreign inferior Court.

[Maasdorp, J.: What is the difference between reviving a judgment in an inferior Court and in a superior Court?]

There the inferior Court was a foreign Court. See Kenny v. Murray (7 C.T.R., 207). A wide distinction must be drawn between cases in which objection is taken to a judgment being revived and those in which no objection is raised. Should your lordships order us to go back to the Magistrate's Court costs will be multiplied unnecessarily.

Maasdorp, J.: I think the ordinary practice should be followed in this case of going to the Court where the judgment was given, and there to have it revived. Then application should be made to this Court to have execution taken. In the absence of any authority that this Court should revive a judgment of the Magistrate's Court that has become superannuated, no order will be made in this case.

Applicant's Attorneys:
Respondent in default.

BARRY BROS. V. MOLYNEUX.

Mr. Smith moved for provisional sentence for £92 17s., with interest from the 15th July last, upon a dishonoured cheque drawn on the Port Elizabeth branch of the Standard Bank.

Order granted.

STROTHER V. HADIEN.

Mr. Smith moved for provisional sentence for £200 on a mortgage bond, and interest at the rate of 8 per cent., the bond having become due by three months' notice, and also asked for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable, and costs.

Order granted.

ESTATE HERTZOG V. MCMULLEN.

Mr. Nightingale moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £1,000, with interest, less the sum of £14 12s. 6d paid on account, and on a further bond of £3.023, with interest, both having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest. Counsel also asked for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

The defendant (McMullen) said he should like a month's time in which to realise, so as to satisfy the debt.

Maasdorp, J., advised the defendant that the best course would be for him to approach the plaintiff and try to arrange about grace.

Provisional sentence granted as prayed.

TABLE BAY HARBOUR BOARD V. GARDINER AND EASTON.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for the discharge of the provisional order for the sequestration of the defendant's estate.

Provisional order discharged accordingly.

VAN DER BYL V. BOOYSEN.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for provisional sentence for £800 on a mortgage bond, and interest, and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable, and costs. The proceeding was by edictal citation. The Court had allowed substituted service, and the summons had been duly advertised.

Order granted.

LOUBSER V. MATESDORF.

Mr. Pyemont moved for provisional sentence for £300 on two promissory notes—one due on the 8th August for £150, with interest, and the other due on the 25th August, with interest—and also costs of suit.

Order granted.

BRAND AND OTHERS V. VAN DER MERWE.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for the provisional order for the sequestration of the defendant's estate to be made final. He stated that he had seen a copy of the affidavit sworn by the defendant, and he failed to find any reason for refusing the application.

Order granted.

ASSERSOHN V. BUTCHINSKY.

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence on a judgment of the High Court of King's Bench Division in England for £304 4s., with taxed costs, £10 10s.

The defendant said he was willing to pay the amount by instalments, and to deposit his deeds as security. He had only been in this country about six weeks, and he was hoping when things improved to meet this obligation. He was an auctioneer.

Order granted.

DE VILLIERS V. KEUN.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved for provisional sentence for £383 17s. 6d., balance due on a promissory note for £505

Order granted.

OLIVER AND CO. V. MADDOCKS.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon a judgment of this Court for £18 3s. 6d., with costs.

Defendant said he had no means, and was surrendering his estate. He was an auctioneer, and owed a great deal of money. He was at present earning £30 a month. He offered £5 a month. He owed about £40,000.

Maasdorp J. (to Mr. De Villiers): You had better take the £5.

Defendant said he would be able to pay the first instalment of £5 to-morrow.

Order granted; to be suspended on payment of £5 per month.

LAITE V. WHALES.

Mr. Alexander moved for provisional sentence on a bill of exchange for £25 14s. 3d., with interest, and also judgment under rule 329d, for £3 5s., goods sold and delivered.

Order granted as prayed.

ESTATE VAN NOORDEN V. ADAMS.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for provisional sentence for £80, on a certain mortgage bond, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent., and for the property specially hpyothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

MALMESBURY BOARD OF EXECUTORS V. VAN DER WESTHUYSEN.

Mr. Searle, K.C., moved for provisional sentence on two mortgage bonds for £200 and £400 respectively, with interest, the bonds having become due and payable by reason of the non-payment of interest; and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

MANSON V. MADDOCKS.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for provisional sentence for £141 11s. 9d., amount due to the plaintiffs on a judgment obtained against the defendant in the first Civil Magistrates' Court at Johannesburg.

Order granted.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

COLONIAL GOVERNMENT V. MOLYNEUX. { 1903. Oct. 15th

Mr. Howel Jones moved for judgment under rule 329d for £2,781 5s. 10d., Customs duties upon goods illegally removed from the Bonding Warehouse at Port Elizabeth by the defendant.

Judgment as prayed.

LIQUIDATORS OF THE FRENCH BANK V. MATESDORF.

Mr. Buchanan moved for judgment under rule 329d, for £157 16s. 11d., cash lent and advanced, less £10 paid on account. The summons, he said, was addressed to Edward Matesdorf, and the real defendant was Ernest Matesdorf, and counsel asked for amendment of the summons accordingly.

Maasdorp, J., pointed out that service had been effected on Edward Matesdorp.

Mr. Buchanan said that under the circumstances he would not press for the amendment of the summons.

Judgment as prayed.

HENDRICKS V. ALY.

Mr. Upington moved for judgment under Rule 329d, for £50, being rent, and costs.

Order granted.

REHABILITATION. { 1903. Oct. 15th.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the rehabilitation of Jacobus Johannes Hooper, whose previous application had been standing over pending the production of a proper balance sheet. The balance sheet had now been supplied. The estate was sequestrated in December, 1883, and only realised sufficient to pay the expenses of administration.

Granted.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

FICK V. FICK.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved, on behalf of the petitioner, for a decree of divorce, in default of compliance with an order for the restitution of conjugal rights, plaintiff to have custody of the minor children, and defendant to be declared to have forfeited the benefits of marriage in community.

Decree granted in terms of prayer.

ASHMAN V. ASHMAN.

Mr. Buchanan moved on behalf of the petitioner (the wife) for a decree of divorce, in default of compliance with an order for the restitution of conjugal rights, for a division of the joint estate, custody of the minor children, and payment of maintenance at the rate of £2 per month for each child until such child attains the age of sixteen, and costs. The plaintiff was willing to accept as an alternative, £500, and a cession of an insurance policy.

Maasdorp, J., said he was not willing to order the payment of £500 from the defendant's estate, without any evidence that the defendant consented.

Mr. Buchanan said he believed the defendant was quite willing to make this payment, but he had no definite information on the point.

Maasdorp, J., said that the defendant should be communicated with, and the case mentioned again later.

Ex parte STIDWORTHY.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for a rule nisi granted under the Derelict Lands Act to be made absolute.

Order granted.

Ex parte HENNING.

Mr. De Waal moved that a certain rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act be made absolute.

Order granted.

Ex parte VAN DER MERWE.

On the motion of Mr. Benjamin, a certain rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act was made absolute.

Ex parte VAN HEERDEN.

Mr. Van Zyl moved to make absolute a certain rule nisi granted under the Derelict Lands Act.

Order granted.

Ex parte WILCOCKS.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved that a certain rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act be made absolute.

Order granted.

COETZEE V. RICH.

This was an application upon notice calling upon respondent to show cause why his return as a member of the Divisional Council of Namaqualand should not be declared null and void, why his seat should not be declared vacant by reason of his not possessing the requisite qualifications, and why he should not pay the costs of the application. It was stated on affidavit that respondent was the only candidate for the seat, and was duly declared elected. Applicant had since discovered that, according to the Divisional Council valuation, respondent was the registered owner of property in the division to the value of £400 16s. 8d., whereas it was required that a member of the Council must be the registered owner of property to the value of not less than £500.

Mr. Benjamin moved.

Maasdorp, J., said it was quite clear that respondent was not qualified to be elected as a member of the Divisional Council, and consequently the election must be declared null and void, and the seat declared vacant, respondent to pay the costs.

VAN RENSBURG V. GEORGE LICENSING COURT AND FOTHERINGHAM.

New Liquor Licence—Memorial Voters' List—Act 25 of 1891.

This was a motion calling upon respondents to show cause why the proceedings of the Licensing Court of George, held on the 2nd September, regarding the granting of a liquor licence for premises belonging to the respondent Fotheringham, should not be set aside on the ground that the provisions of sub-section 1 of section 13 of Act 25 of 1891 had not been complied with in that the memorial lodged by Fotheringham in favour of the granting of the licence was not signed by a majority of the registered voters. Counsel read affidavits to show that two memorials were lodged, one, in favour of the application, containing 138 signatures, while the other, against, contained 74 signatures, all of persons purporting to be duly registered voters. The Licensing Court pronounced the voters' list to contain the name of 229 voters. They also reviewed the memorials, and found that 21 of the 229 registered voters had signed both memorials. The Court removed this number from the memorial in favour, and also removed the names of three persons for valid reasons. This left 114 valid signatures to the memorial in favour, but the Court then wrongfully removed the 21 names appearing on both memorials from the voters' list. This reduced the number of registered voters to 208, and the Court held that there was a majority of ten voters in favour of the application. It was contended that the Court acted wrongly in removing the 21 names from the voters' list, and that, the number of registered voters being 229, the 114 names on the memorial in favour of the application did not constitute a majority of the registered voters as required by the Act.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved, and stated that the facts in this case were similar to those in the recent case of Strydom v. Uniondale Licensing Court (13 C.T.R., 628).

Maasdorp, J.: In this case it appears that the respondent Fotheringham applied to the Licensing Court for a new liquor licence. It is provided in sub-section 1 of section 13 of Act 25 of 1891 that it shall not be lawful for a Licensing Court to grant a new licence unless there shall be lodged with the Resident Magistrate of the district, at least four days before application is made to the Licensing Court to consider such application, a memorial or memorials, signed by a majority of the voters for the Divisional Council within the limits of the Divisional Council district. In this case memorials were lodged with the Licensing Court both for and against the granting of this licence, and it appears that after examining these memorials it was found that the memorial in favour of this licence contained 114 valid signatures. There appeared to be on the voters' roll the names of 229 voters. The 114 therefore would just fall short of one-half the number of voters on the list, and consequently that memorial, containing 114 valid signatures, would not contain the signatures of a majority of the voters for the Divisional Council in that district. The question therefore solves itself, and the Licensing Court had no power to grant this licence. It appeared that upon these different memorials 21 signatures appeared, which were the signatures of the same voters, and in terms of the Act these were struck off as of no effect. The question was then raised in the Licensing Court whether in striking off these signatures the names of the voters should not also be struck off the voters' roll. In that case the voters' roll would have been reduced and the 114 signatures would have been the signatures of a majority of the voters, but there is no provision made in this law for interfering with the voters' list. The number of voters on the voters' list remains the same, however many names may be struck off the memorials, because the voters had signed both. The only effect of the provision is that the voters who signed both may be regarded as not having signed at all. That is really the only effect which the provision has; it excludes these double signatures from memorials. Under the circumstances, it appears that the memorial in favour of granting this liquor licence did not contain the signatures of a majority of the voters of the Divisional Council, and consequently the licence should not have been granted. The Court will therefore order that this licence be cancelled, and that the respondent Fotheringham pay the costs of this application.

Kotzé, J., concurred.

BEELER V. COLE.

Mr. Greer moved for leave to sue by edictal citation for money advanced on a mortgage bond, for interest, and for property specially hypothecated to be declared executable. Respondent was now resident in England.

Leave was granted to sue by edictal citation, personal service to be effected if possible; otherwise service to be made by one publication in the "Daily Telegraph." The citation was made returnable on the 12th January.

WILSON V. WILSON.

Mr. Searle, K.C., moved that a certain deed of separation entered into between the parties should be made a rule of Court. The parties had been previously before the Court, in a case in which the husband sued for restitution, the Court then refusing his application.

Maasdorp, J., said that it was a rule of the Court that it would not be a party to separation unless there were legal grounds for such separation.

Mr. Searle said that at the time of the previous proceedings it pretty clearly appeared that the parties could not live together again.

An order was granted as prayed.

GLASS V. GLASS.

This was a motion for an order on the respondent—the husband—to pay to applicant the sum of £50, to enable her to institute an action for judicial separation, and to pay the sum of £10 per month for the maintenance of applicant and her daughter, pending the hearing of the action.

The affidavit of the applicant stated that she was married to the respondent in London in 1887. She made allegations of cruelty against the respondent. The respondent owned property to the value of £2,000, and earned money as a builder and carpenter. An affidavit was made by applicant's sister in support of the charges of cruelty. Applicant now supported herself and daughter out of the profits of her boarding-house.

In an answering affidavit, respondent denied the charges of cruelty, and said there had only been slight altercations, incidental and peculiar to married life. He had been obliged to dispose of the property he was stated to possess for the sum of £1,500, of which he had only received £100, the balance going to pay off mortgage and other debts contracted in improving the property. His weekly earnings did not amount to more than £2 10s., and he was unable to work regularly.

After hearing counsel on the facts,

Maasdorp, J., said that, under the circumstances, as it appeared that respondent was a man of some means —though not of very large means—the Court would order him to pay over to the attorney of the applicant the sum of £20. No order would be made as to maintenance. Costs of the application would be costs in the cause.

BUFFALO SUPPLY CO. v. FEDERAL SUPPLY CO. { 1903. Oct. 15th. „ 27th.

Arbitration—Act 29 of 1898—Construction of deed of submission.

The F. Co. had agreed to take over the business of the B. Co. on certain terms. Disputes having subsequently arisen between the parties as to whether the B. Co. had not misrepresented its profits to the F. Co., it was agreed to refer the matter to arbitration. On the matter being brought before the arbitrator, the B. Co. alleged that the F. Co. had abandoned all claim to compensation in respect of any misrepresentation made by the B. Co., in consideration of the latter abandoning certain claims against the former. This abandonment was alluded to in the Deed of Submission, but was therein excluded from the scope of the arbitration. The arbitrators now asked for the ruling of the Court as to whether it was competent for them to receive evidence regarding the abandonment by the B. Co. of the said claims.

Held, that this evidence was admissible.

This was a special case submitted by certain arbitrators for the decision of the Court as to the construction of a certain deed of submission entered into between the above parties.

The application was made under section 27 of Act 29 of 1898.

The case stated was that the Federal Supply Company was formed to take over the business of the Buffalo Company. After flotation, certain disputes arose between the two companies. The Buffalo Company claimed £167,608, and the Federal Company claimed £73,140. The latter included a claim of £60,000 for damages, founded upon alleged false representation guarantee as to the profits of the Buffalo Company's business, and upon which representation and guarantee the Federal Company was floated. There were three heads of claim: (a) The question of demurrage re the Highland Lassie, and liability for the Sussex cargo; (b) liability by the Federal Company for certain stock shipped from Buenos Ayres; (c) the Federal Company's claim for damages. By the deed of arbitration which was entered into between the parties, (a) and (b) were excluded from the arbitration, the Buffalo Company having agreed to take over the liability of (a), and the Federal Company having agreed to take over the liability for certain stock. The Federal's claim for damages still stood. In the course of the arbitration proceedings, one of the witnesses (Mr. Williamson) was re-examined by Mr. Wiggins as to whether the Federal Company did not agree to abandon their claim for damages on the Buffalo undertaking to pay demurrage. Counsel for the Federal Company objected to evidence being led on this point. The arbitrators now wished to know whether, in terms of the deed of submission, these questions could properly be gone into, and they asked the Court for a ruling on the point whether it was admissible for evidence to be led before the arbitrators, to show that, in consideration of the Buffalo Company agreeing to pay the demurrage of the Highland Lassie, the Federal Company agreed to waive their right to claim damages.

Mr. Searle, K.C., for the arbitrators; Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Burton) for the Buffalo Supply Company; Sir H .Juta, K.C., for the Federal Supply Co.

Mr. Schreiner said that he left the matter entirely in their lordships' hands. If the Court desired to see the documents, of course they would leave the question in the hands of the Court. He was not in possession of the claims respectively filed by the two companies. If necessary, the documents could be wired for to East London, and the question could be argued on another day. This was the first case of the kind that had come before the Court.

[Kotzé, J.: Can the arbitrator go into the question of abandonment?]

Mr. Schreiner: Oh, undoubtedly, my lord, because this deed, I submit, is perfectly clear that it does not refer to this particular claim. We say that when the deed was signed the claim for damages was dead and done for. They chose to put in this claim or any other cock-and-bull claim, or any other settled claim, and bring it before the arbitrators, and then they said, "You must not lead any evidence for the defence," because we show that before the deed was signed we agreed to take upon ourselves the responsibility for claim (a), referred to in the deed in consideration of their giving their assurance that they abandon the claim for damages, which we have always repudiated and denied.

Sir H. Juta said that this was an agreement between two parties to submit certain things to arbitration, and upon this deed must depend the decision whether a certain thing could be submitted to arbitration or whether it could not. The deed was perfectly clear; it said that all disputes between the parties should be referred to arbitration, bar two. His learned friend (Mr. Schreiner) said there were three. He (Sir H. Juta) contended that, the parties having entered into a contract in the form of this deed of submission, they could not add to alter or vary it by any parole evidence to show that there was another large and most important claim that had been omitted from the arbitration. It was part and parcel of the deed that the Buffalo Co. should pay this demurrage. The Buffalo Co. now said that the consideration for this clause in the deed was the abandoning by the Federal Co. of the large claim for damages, which was not in the deed at all. In other words, it was attempted to show that a consideration was included in the written document, which was altogether outside the written document. They were told that the payment of the demurrage was conditional on the claim for damages being abandoned.

[Maasdorp, J.: Is this deed of submission a contract?]

Surely it is. The parties agree to certain terms, and we say that no parol evidence can be admitted to vary those terms.

[Maasdorp, J.: May it not be that the one party has abandoned certain claims in consideration of the other party giving up others?]

The agreement says: "We will drop certain claims. I will pay one and you shall pay the other; and now they want to go back on this.

[Maasdorp, J.: Suppose they said: "We will not press if you charter ships to bring cattle from Buenos Ayres?]

Should we fail to do so, surely the Court would not uphold such an agreement. The written document is an undertaking to pay, but now an attempt is made to show that this agreement was varied by a subsequent mutual understanding. We cannot go back from the written contract.

Mr. Schreiner (in reply): All we wish to do is to give effect to the deed and not to vary it in any particular. The whole point is that the respondents object to our proving our claim, and we contend that we have a right to do so.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (October 27):

Maasdorp, J. : It appears that an agreement was entered into by the Buffalo Company and the Federal Company, by which the latter company agreed to take over the business of the former. Disputes and differences arose between the two companies which they were unable to adjust, and they ultimately agreed to submit their differences to arbitration. Amongst their differences was a dispute as to liability to pay demurrage in connection with the ship Highland Lassie, and to bear the loss on a shipment of mutton; and another dispute as to a claim made by the Federal Company for damages sustained through misrepresentation of profits of business by the Buffalo Company. In the deed of submission to arbitration, it is recited that certain differences have arisen between the parties as to the terms of sale and purchase, and the carrying out of agreements between the parties, and they were desirous of referring the said differences and disputes to arbitration, under the provisions of the Arbitration Act of 1898. They therefore agreed that all differences and disputes between them shall be referred to two arbitrators. Two matters in dispute were excluded from arbitration, one of them being a dispute as to demurrage claim in connection with the ship Highland Lassie, and any loss in regard to the third shipment of mutton which has been directed by the Buffalo Company for delivery to A. Bergl, Cape Town, for sale. The Buffalo Company hereby accepting full responsibility in respect of these two matters, and agreeing to pay as between the Federal Company and themselves. It is provided in the deed that the differences to be decided are to be all claims and disputes which the parties shall notify to each other in writing within three months. Among the claims sent in by the Federal Company is one for £60,000, being damages for misrepresentation already mentioned. When this claim came before the arbitrators, the Buffalo Company proposed to prove that the Federal Company had abandoned it in consideration of the Buffalo Company giving up the claim for demurrage in connection with the Highland Lassie. Evidence to that effect was adduced, but objected to. The question arose in the minds of the arbitrators whether it is admissable under the deed of submission for the Buffalo Company to lead evidence to show that its agreement to pay the demurrage on the Highland Lassie, as stated in the deed, was in consideration of the Federal Company agreeing to abandon any claim for damages for misrepresentation it might have against the Buffalo Company. This point the arbitrators have now submitted as a question of law for the opinion of the Court, under section 27 of Act 29 of 1898. The Court has now to construe the deed of submission in order to ascertain whether there is anything contained in it which debars the Buffalo Company from resisting the claim for damages, from proving that it gave up its claim for demurrage, on condition that the Federal Company abandoned its claim for damages. As I understand the contention of counsel for the Federal Company, it amounts to this, that the deed of submission is an agreement within the four corners of which we must look for all the consideration which passed between the parties as an inducement for them to go to arbitration. In other words, that the consideration for the abandonment of the claim of the Buffalo Company lies inside the agreement to refer, and cannot be looked for in some prior agreement which is not recited in the deed. To put it more pointedly, that the consideration for the Buffalo Company's withdrawal of their claim for demurrage was the consent of the Federal Company to submit all other differences to arbitration. If this latter position were really borne out by the terms of the deed then I think it would not be open to the Buffalo Co. to set up any consideration other than that mentioned in the deed. The question is whether that is the true construction of the deed. That the deed does not say so in so many words is quite clear, otherwise I do not think this difficulty would have arisen. Upon reference to the wording of the deed we find that the question of demurrage is spoken of as one of the differences between the parties, but it is excluded from the arbitration, and the Buffalo Company accepted full responsibility for it, and agreed to pay it. Taking the ordinary meaning of these words, it would amount to no more than saying that the Buffalo Company undertook to pay moneys for which they had at one time contended the Federal Company was responsible, and the matter was consequently no longer one of the differences which the arbitrators had to deal with. Why the Buffalo Company agreed to pay, and why they abandoned the claims is not mentioned. The question now arises whether it is a necessary implication of law upon the true construction of the deed of submission that they abandoned the claim in consideration of the Federal Company submitting all the other differences to arbitration, or in consideration of the other stipulations contained in the deed. I am of opinion that in adopting this implication we should put too strained and narrow a meaning upon the words employed in the deed, and that it is not inconsistent with the deed to hold that the claim for demurrage was abandoned for a consideration not specified. If that be so, there would be nothing to prevent the Buffalo Company from proving that such consideration was the abandonment of some claim by the Federal Company. The main object of the parties was to get certain differences settled by arbitration, and in specifying the differences which were referred, and those which were excluded, it would not be necessary for them to go into detail as to the conditions upon which the latter were settled or compromised. It was urged that if the contention of the Buffalo Company is allowed, the claim for damages would virtually be withdrawn from the consideration of the arbitrators. But that would not be the case any more than it would be in respect of any other claim with reference to which either party offered evidence of settlement or compromise. I am of opinion, therefore, that it is open to the arbitrators to inquire whether the agreement to pay the demurrage in the Highland Lassie was in consideration of the Federal Company agreeing to abandon their claim for damages, and the question submitted by the arbitrators must be answered accordingly. Question of costs left to that arbitration.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

SHOYER V. SHOYER AND THERON. { 1903. Oct. 16th.

This was an action brought by Harry Shoyer against his wife, Nellie Sophia Shoyer (born Aspinall) for decree of divorce, and for £100 damages against the second defendant, Stephen Theron, by reason of the adultery of the two defendants.

The declaration set forth that the plaintiff resided at Rondebosch, and the defendants at Maitland. Plaintiff and the first defendant were married without community of property at Cape Town in April, 1897, and the said marriage still subsisted. There was issue of the marriage—a boy, four years old. After the birth of the child differences arose, and the parties entered into a notarial deed of separation. In 1902 and 1903, and at divers places, the first defendant committed adultery with the second defendant, and by reason of the wrongful acts of the said defendant plaintiff sustained damages to the extent of £100. The plaintiff claimed a decree of divorce, custody of the child, and forfeiture of all benefits under the ante-nuptial contract, against the first defendant, and £100 damages with costs against the second defendant.

Mr. Gardiner for the plaintiff. The first defendant in default. The second defendant in person.

Mr. Gardiner said that the plaintiff would not press for damages against the second defendant.

The second defendant said that that being so, he did not oppose the prayer of the declaration.

Charles William Henry Smith, clerk in the Colonial Office in charge of the marriage register, produced a copy of the certificate of marriage.

Harry Shoyer, a Government water borer, said he was married at St. John's Church, Cape Town, in 1897, under an ante-nuptial contract. There was one child of the marriage. Witness and his wife lived happily at first, but subsequently trouble arose, and they entered into a notarial deed of separation. Witness desired to have custody of the child.

Philip John van der Byl, farmer, Constantia, said the second defendant had been working on his farm. In February of this year he came to the farm, accompanied by a woman, who he said was Mrs. Theron, and by a little boy. They stayed on the farm about six months.

Decree of divorce granted, with custody of the child to the plaintiff, and forfeiture of the benefits of the marriage, the second defendant to pay the costs.

DE KOCK V. DE KOCK.

This was an action for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce, on the ground of malicious desertion of the plaintiff by her husband. Mr. Buchanan appeared for the appli cant, and the suit was undefended.

Charles W. H. Smith, clerk at the Colonial Office, in charge of the marriage registers, produced a duplicate copy of the record of the marriage.

Maria Daisy Ermina de Kock, the plaintiff, said she was married to the defendant at Simon's Town, on the 17th March, 1897. They first lived a few months at Muizenberg, and afterwards went to Wynberg. Differences arose, and the defendant joined the Army Service Corps, and proceeded to Bloemfontein. He remained away for two years, and then returned in March, 1902. They had no home, and they did not live together. About two months afterwards he went away again with the Army Service Corps, and proceeded to Port Nolloth, where he stayed about three months. She saw him on his return at Green Point with the A.S.C. He gave her £2. She asked him to provide her with a small home, but he said he could not be bothered to do it now, and he told her he would get her a room for the month. She obtained an order against him in the Magistrate's Court for maintenance at the rate of £1 5s. per week. He had only made two contributions under that order.

Order granted, calling upon the defendant to restore conjugal rights to the plaintiff on or before the 14th November, or, failing that, to show cause on the 12th December why a decree of divorce should not be granted. As to the question of maintenance, the Court stated that plaintiff might make a subsequent application if the defendant failed to obey the order of the Magistrate's Court.

TOWNSEND V. TOWNSEND AND THOMAS.

This was an action for divorce brought by the husband against his wife on the ground of her adultery with one Andrew Thomas, of Woodstock. Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers appeared for the plaintiff, and the defendants were unrepresented.

The declaration set out that the plaintiff resided at Observatory-road, Cape Division, and the first and second defendant were living together at Woodstock. The plaintiff and the first defendant were married at Cape Town in March, 1900, and there had been issue of the marriage—one child. In March, 1902, the first defendant went and lived with the second defendant in Buitengracht-street, Cape Town, and she was still living with him in adultery at Woodstock. The plaintiff sought as against the first defendant a decree of divorce and custody of the child, and as against the second defendant, £100 damages and costs.

Chas. W. H. Smith, clerk in the Colonial Office, in charge of the Marriage Register, produced the record of the marriage.

Wm. Isaac Townsend, the plaintiff, said that after the marriage they lived together at Observatory-road about eighteen months. After that they entered into a notarial deed of separation, the reason being that he suspected his wife of keeping company with other men. He had contributed regularly £5 a month towards her maintenance. About three months ago, in consequence of certain information, which came to his knowledge, he employed an inquiry agent.

Henry Dickson, a private detective, spoke to finding two people living together in Plein-street, Woodstock, as Mr. and Mrs. Thomas. She referred to Mr. Thomas as her husband. The woman proved to be the plaintiff's wife. Witness went again, when Mr. Thomas was at home. Mrs. "Thomas" was in bed suffering from neuralgia. Witness took certain snapshots of Mrs. Thomas (produced).

By Maasdorp, J.: He did not think the woman was aware that he was taking her photograph. She thought he was taking a photo of the child simply.

James Platt, landlord of the house, said that he let the house to the defendants on the understanding that they were married. The rent had been paid by both of them at different times. The snapshot photograph of Mrs. "Thomas" was a good one.

Plaintiff, recalled, said he was willing that the child should remain with its mother.

Decree of divorce granted, the second defendant being ordered to pay costs.

DORAN V. DORAN.

This was an action brought by Maud Elizabeth Doran against her husband, Charles Henry Doran, for divorce on the ground of his adultery with one Frances Stanley. Mr. Upington was for the plaintiff, and the defendant was not represented.

The declaration set forth that the parties resided in Cape Town, and were married in community of property there in October, 1900. On the 25th August, 1903, the Supreme Court granted a decree of restitution of conjugal rights against the plaintiff, cause to be shown by the 15th October why a decree of divorce should not be granted, the plaintiff to have custody of the child pending a further order of Court. About the 2nd September, 1903, and at Sir Lowry-road, the defendant committed adultery with one Frances Stanley, and the plaintiff now claimed a decree of divorce, forfeiture of all benefits accruing under the marriage in community, custody of the minor child, and any other child which might be born of the marriage.

Mr. Upington said that at the last trial the plaintiff sued the defendant for judicial separation on the grounds of cruelty, but the Court held that there was not sufficient evidence, and found for the defendant in his claim in reconvention for restitution of conjugal rights.

Maud Elizabeth Doran (the plaintiff) said that she sued her husband for judicial separation, and judgment was given for the defendant in his claim in reconvention for restitution of conjugal rights. Before the return day, however, she obtained certain information, and her father employed a certain Mr. Karie, a private detective. She claimed custody of the child and any child that might be born of the marriage.

Frances Stanley, a Colonial girl, said that last month she went to a shop in Sir Lowry-road, where she met the defendant in the present case. That was the first time she spoke to him, and subsequently the defendant came out of the shop and followed witness down a lane, where the defendant brought her to a house, and adultery took place. She was met by Mr. Karie, who said except she told him everything he would run her in. The photograph produced was that of the defendant.

Henry Ford Karie, private detective, said he was employed to watch the defendant, and for a week witness himself had been watching him. On the 3rd September he was outside the shop, and saw the last witness come out of a lane in the neighbourhood of the shop. Witness followed her and asked her what business she had there at that time of night, and she handed him over the five shillings paid to her by the defendant, and told him what had occurred.

Decree of divorce granted, plaintiff to have custody of the children of the marriage, forfeiture of benefits to be declared, and the defendant to pay costs.

OHLSON V. OHLSON.

This was an action for judicial separation brought by Sarah Ohlson against her husband, Henry William James Ohlson, on the ground of cruelty. Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers was for the plaintiff, and the defendant was not represented.

The declaration set forth that the parties were married in community of property at East London in September, 1882. Since 1885 they had resided at Claremont, and there were five minor children of the marriage. In August, 1903, the defendant cruelly treated the plaintiff by kicking her, and during the past four years he had only contributed £80 towards her maintenance. He was of very intemperate habits, and of late had been getting worse. Plaintiff claimed a decree of separation, custody of the children, and maintenance for herself and children, in lieu of which she should be declared sole owner of the household furniture, with costs of suit.

Sarah Ohlson (the plaintiff) said that there was no ante-nuptial contract executed between defendant and herself. The defendant first ill-treated her in 1896, when he beat her in a shop at Claremont. In August last he came home very noisy, and when the plaintiff remonstrated with him he threatened to put her through the window, and kicked her. During the past eight years the defendant had been very intemperate, and latterly he had been getting worse. During the last four years he had contributed about £80 towards the maintenance of the family. She kept a boarding-house, and all the furniture and effects had been bought out of her money. The defendant would not leave the house.

[Maasdorp, J.: Where is he now?]

Witness: He is laid up with rheumatics at Claremont.

Is he sober?—He is sober this morning, but he was not yesterday.

Willie Ohlson, son of the last witness corroborated the plaintiff in regard to the ill-treatment in August last.

Frances Taylor said she remembered that on the 16th August last the defendant struck the plaintiff with his fist outside the house. He was of very intemperate habits.

Decree of separation granted, the community of property suspended, plaintiff to have custody of the children, and the furniture awarded to the plaintiff by way of maintenance, and defendant to pay costs of suit.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

JACOBSON V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

This was an application on behalf of the defendants in the above action for an order compelling the respondent to furnish security for the costs.

The affidavit of the applicant's attorney set out that when an appearance had been entered by the defendant in the action a letter was sent to the plaintiff's attorney asking him to furnish satisfactory security for costs should the plaintiff lose the action. On June 2 plaintiff's attorney wrote, guaranteeing £40 and undertaking to arrange any further security, while the case was proceeding. It was found that this sum would be inadequate to cover the expenses entailed through bringing witnesses and collecting evidence from Port Elizabeth and De Aar, and the plaintiff's attorney was asked to guarantee an additional £100 towards the costs.

The affidavit of the plaintiff's attorney set out that he had written to their local agent in the Transvaal, but he had not yet received a reply. Owing to the short notice arrangement could not be made in time.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for applicant): The defendants had no right to set down a case for trial unless they were prepared to give security.

Mr. Close (for respondent): I quite admit that security should be given; but we have not had sufficient notice of this application.

[Maasdorp, J.: As to costs: are you prepared to pay to-day's costs?]

Yes, we can arrange that.

Mr. Schreiner: I would suggest £100 as security.

Order granted, the respondent to give further security in the sum of £100 by the 23rd inst. to the satisfaction of the Registrar, failing which the setting down of the case for trial to be discharged, the respondent to pay costs.

DUMBLETON AND OTHERS V. BARNARD.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for an order joining Donald Arderne McIntyre in the motion of Dumbleton and Others v. Barnard and Another, for the delivery of certain deeds of transfer.

Order granted.

DUMBLETON AND OTHERS V. BARNARD AND ANOTHER.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for an order compelling the respondents to deliver up certain deeds of transfer in order that an amended title deed of a farm might be obtained. The parties resided in the district of George, and the applicants represented three-fourths of the aggregate property.

The matter was ordered to stand over for the production of evidence as to whether the documents were really necessary.

Subsequently Mr. Bisset produced a certificate from the Surveyor-General's Department to the effect that the title deeds would be necessary before the amended title could be drawn up.

An order was granted requiring respondents to produce and submit to the Surveyor-General their deeds of transfer of their shares of the farm before November 15, for the purpose of an amended title being granted, respondents to pay costs of the motion.

ESTATE LUCKE V. ANDERSON.

Mr. Rainsford moved for leave to sue by edictal citation, for the purchase price of certain land. The petitioner was George William Steytler, sole trustee in the estate of Edward Lucke, and the petition set forth that in November, 1901 certain plots of land in the estate were sold by public auction at D'Urban-road. A certain purchaser, named Anderson, who gave his address as Wynberg Station, had failed to pay the purchase money of sale, and all efforts to trace him had failed.

Leave to sue granted, returnable December 12, personal service to be effected, failing which one publication in the "Gazette" and "Cape Times."

AFRICAN BANKING CORPORATION V. HILLS AND OTHERS.

Mr. McGregor, for the applicants, moved for an order in terms of a petition, consented to on the part of the defendants' attorneys, setting forth that it had been found unnecessary to take certain evidence in London on the case, and praying that the trial might be set down for an earlier date than November 12.

Trial ordered to be set down for October 28.

Ex parte STUTTAFORD AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved for an order, supplementing an ante-nuptial contract by a clause whereby the petitioner settled on his wife Ada Stuttaford (born Steele) the sum of £3,000, to be invested for her yearly income, the survivor to receive the capital on the death of either husband or wife.

Order granted, in terms of prayer, without prejudice to the rights of any creditors.

Ex parte FAGAN.

Mr. Buchanan moved as a matter of urgency for a temporary interdict restraining Jorgensen and Svendsen, of Somerset West, from removing any stone, sand, or other material, or making any excavations from a certain piece of land at Somerset West, sold by the petitioner to the said firm. The petitioner stated that he sold portion of a property to the firm for £400, that no part of the purchase money had been paid, that the said firm had made a deed of assignment to Mr. E. R. Syfret for the benefit of their creditors, that Mr. Syfret had consented to the cancellation of sale, that the sale had accordingly been provisionally cancelled, but that the said firm refused to quit the property, and had been busy removing stone, sand, and other materials from the property.

Rule nisi granted, calling upon the respondents to show cause why they should not be interdicted as prayed, on Thursday, the 22nd inst., rule to operate meanwhile as an interdict.

Postea (September 22).

The rule was made absolute.

THE MASTER V. CHAPMAN.

Mr. Howel Jones moved for an order requiring the respondent, as trustee in the insolvent estate of Richard Joff, to file a liquidation account and plan of distribution.

Order granted.

COLONIAL GOVERNMENT V. PADDON.

Mr. Howel Jones moved for the attachment of certain property ad fundandam jurisdictionem, and for leave to sue by edictal citation. The petitioner was the Assistant Treasurer of the Colony, and he sued the respondent in his capacity as trustee for and on behalf of the British Bechuanaland Syndicate for £39 7s. 6d., in respect of certain quitrent for land situate in Kuruman, which had not been paid since 1895. It appeared that the said Paddon resided in London, but his exact address was unknown. The company was stated to have a certain address in London.

Order granted for the attachment of the property, with leave to sue by edictal citation, citation to be made returnable on the 12th June, personal service to be effected, or at the address given in the petition.

JOHNSON V. VAN DER WALT. { 1903. Oct 16th. „ 19th.

Rebel—Booty—Spoliation—Onus probandi.

During the late war the Military had seized a certain horse, the property of J. No receipt was given to show that the horse had been duly "requisitioned." After passing through various hands the horse was sold by one of the military to W. J. had joined the enemy before the horse was seized, but there was no evidence to show that the military were aware of this fact at the time of seizure. After peace had been proclaimed, J. had taken his horse out of W.'s custody, whereupon W. sued him in the Magistrate's Court for re-delivery of the horse (or its value) and damages. The Magistrate gave judgment for the plaintiff.

Held on appeal (1) that the private property of alien enemies, or even of rebels, is not "booty."

(2) That the onus lay on W. to show a good title to the horse, and that as he had failed to discharge that onus, and the horse was therefore (to all appearance) illegally seized, J. was spoliatus.

(3) That the appeal must, therefore, be allowed with costs.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Acting Resident Magistrate of Colesberg, in an action brought by the present respondent against the appellant for delivery of a blue pony, or its value, £16, and, in addition, the sum of £4 damages for wrongful seizure. The Magistrate gave judgment for the plaintiff for £16, or the return of the horse, with costs.

From the evidence led in the Court below, it appeared that during the late hostilities the horse in question was taken by Colonel Crabbe's column from the farm of the defendant's father, in the district of Steynsburg. It subsequently passed through various hands, and was ultimately bought by the plaintiff from Sub-Inspector Powell, of the Cape Police, to whom it had been given by Mr. Hill, an intelligence officer, in consideration of services he had rendered to Mr. Hill. On the 29th April last the defendant appeared on the plaintiff's farm at Vlakfontein, and saw the pony, and claimed it as his own. Plaintiff protested that he had no right to take it away, but the defendant insisted that the animal was his property, and he removed it. The defendant, in his evidence, said the horse was presented to him by his father, and it was removed by the military while he was absent on commando. He was a Colonial, not a burgher, and he joined the Boers on the 15th January, 1901. The defendant's father said that the horse was his son's, that it was taken by Colonel Crabbe's column along with 22 other horses, and that he had got two horses back from the Protection Camp at Graham's Town. Witness had put in a claim for the horses; his claim at first included the defendant's horse, but when his son got back the animal he instructed his attorneys to amend the claim.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for his judgment, said there was some doubt whether the horse in question was taken for protection purposes. It was probable, he thought, under the circumstances, that the horse was taken for that purpose. The horse was subsequently placed in the Remount Camp by the military, and passed through the hands of others. If the horse had been taken for protection purposes, in view of the decisions in the cases of Coetzee v. Prinz and Visser v. Van Zyl (13 C.T.R., 284), he would have found accordingly. He did not, however, consider that the defendant should benefit by the falsehood told to the military authorities by the defendant's father, and accordingly he gave judgment for the plaintiff.

Mr Burton (for the appellant) said it was not apparently found that the claim for damages for seizure was established. As the case was brought the onus of proof lay, no doubt, on the defendant to defend his seizure of the horse, and he had to show that the horse was his in the first instance. But when once he established that, he did not think there could be the slightest question upon the evidence that this horse, to whomsoever it passed afterwards, was in the first instance his property. Then he submitted the onus was shifted upon the plaintiff to show that his title to the horse was a good one. The Magistrate seemed to have taken rather a peculiar view of the circumstances. Their lordships would see that he found that the horse was taken by a military column from the farm of the defendant's father, and he also said clearly that there might have been some doubt as to the purposes for which the military authorities took the horse, but he was inclined to believe, seeing that two horses taken at the same time were recovered from the Protection Camp, that the lot were taken for the purposes of protection, and he said if that had been the issue in the case he would have found accordingly. He then said if the military had known that the defendant was admittedly a rebel at the time, actually away on commando, they would have had the right to take the horse belonging to him as booty. The Magistrate said that, whatever their evidence was, they must read that legal right into the action of the military. Counsel submitted that the Magistrate had erred in that finding. He quoted, in support of his contention, that appellant was entitled to the return of his horse, the case of Coetzee v. Prinz.

Mr. Upington said that in the case of Coetzee v. Prinz he appeared for the appellant, and that case turned on two very essential differences from the present case. In the first place, the appellant was not a rebel, and in the second place, alienation of the stock took place after the declaration of peace, and at a time when there were no hostilities. In the case now before the Court the appellant actually was on commando, he was an enemy, and he was not entitled to the privileges of a man who had sat still. The military seized the horse at a time when it was the property of an enemy.

[Maasdorp, J.: How does the present case differ from the case of Visser v. Van Zyl?]

In the case of Visser v. Van Zyl it was found that the horse belonged not to the rebel, but to his father.

[Maasdorp, J.: The question of whether the appellant was or was not a rebel should be left out entirely, and the case should be argued quite apart from that point.]

I submit that it did not matter what the military knew, or what they did not know when the horse was taken.

[Maasdorp, J.: Intention is everything.]

The military took possession of the animal and put their brand on it.

[Maasdorp, J.: But was it taken by requisition?]

It was not taken by requisition. I contend that the horse was taken from a rebel by way of capture or booty, and that any military officer could have taken the horse in question, without giving any receipt or any kind of acknowledgment. The point is, had the military the right to take the horse. I maintain that it was immaterial what their knowledge was at the time of capture; if circumstances came to their knowledge afterwards that justified their action that was sufficient. I submit that the respondent's predecessor-in-title had a good title to the horse, and that, apart altogether from the fact of whether the appellant was a rebel, the horse was properly the property of the respondent.

Mr. Burton was heard in reply.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (October 19).

Maasdorp, J.: In this case, which is an appeal from the Resident Magistrate of Colesberg, the plaintiff in the court below claimed from the defendant a horse, which he alleged was his property, or the sum of £16, the value thereof. It appears that the defendant deprived the plaintiff of the peaceful possession of the horse in a way which amounted to spoliation, but the question of spoliation is not now raised, except for the purpose of deciding upon whom the onus of proof rested. Under the circumstances, it is incumbent upon the defendant to prove that the horse was his, and he has succeeded in showing upon very clear evidence to the satisfaction of the Magistrate that in 1901 it was his property. Thereupon it became necessary for the plaintiff to prove that the defendant was legally divested of the ownership, and that it vested in him. He produced evidence to show that he bought the horse from Powell, who had obtained it from Hill, an intelligence officer, for services rendered by him. Hill in his turn had got the horse from Captain Beadle, a remount officer, in exchange for one of Hill's horses. The question now arises whether Captain Beadle had any legal right to dispose of the horse to Hill. At the end of 1901 the animal was running on the farm of the defendant's father, and was removed from there by the military to a protection camp. The next time it was seen by the witnesses was when it was given as a remount by Captain Beadle to one of Hill's scouts. The case set up by the plaintiff was that the horse was properly and regularly requisitioned by the military authorities for military purposes, and that the defendant thereupon lost the ownership in it, while he became entitled to compensation in respect of such requisition. If the plaintiff had succeeded in proving this he would have been entitled to recover. There is, however, no direct evidence that such requisition ever took place. Hill says that this horse, being serviceable, would never have been taken to the protection camp, and would have been taken into remount at once. But the defendant's father says the horse was taken for protection into a protection camp by Col. Crabbe's column, and that he got a receipt to that effect. The Magistrate found it proved upon the evidence that it was taken into a protection camp. Hill also says that serviceable horses brought in by farmers used to be taken into remounts, and receipts given to the owners. No such receipt was given in this case. The question remained whether in the absence of direct evidence the Court could take the fact that the animal was in the possession of a remount officer, and bore the military brand, and was dealt with by him for military purposes, as proof that it had been requisitioned. The Magistrate does not find as a fact that the horse was requisitioned, and I do not think we can, upon the evidence, find that there is proof that it was. The defendant was consequently not divested of the ownership in it by way of requisition. The Magistrate has, however, given judgment for the plaintiff on another ground. It appears that the defendant was a rebel in active service with the enemy during the war, and the Magistrate held that if this fact had been known to the officer in command of the column, the horse would certainly have been commandeered, and on its arrival at Steynsburg, would have been placed in the remounts, as actually happened eventually. And I am of opinion the Magistrate was wrong in basing his judgment upon his opinion as to what the military would have done if they were aware of facts of which they happened to be ignorant. In dealing with the acquisiton of property, the question of intention is everything; and if it does not pass as the result of the actual dealings between the parties, it cannot be allowed to pass, because it would have done so if some other transactions had intervened. It is, therefore, not necessary ,now to consider the legal effect of the Magistrate's finding, and I shall only observe that it raises an important question. The private property, even of rebels or alien enemies, cannot be dealt with by a military officer in the cavalier manner which the Magistrate seems to regard as proper and regular. The disposal of such property depends on laws and principles which require careful consideration, but upon which we are not now called upon to decide. The plaintiff having failed to prove that the defendant was ever divested of his property in a manner recognised by the Court as effectual, the appeal must be allowed, and the Magistrate's judgment must be altered to one of absolution from the instance, with costs in this Court and in the Court below.

Kotzé, J., said he was of the same opinion. There was no satisfactory evidence of the requisition in the ordinary sense of the term by the military of the horse, and consequently of the change of ownership.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

REVIEW.

REX V. ABRAHAM CAROLUS. { 1903. Oct. 19th.

Magistrate's ordinary jurisdiction.

A Magistrate who convicts a prisoner of stock theft after trying such prisoner under his ordinary jurisdiction cannot impose any term of imprisonment exceeding three months.

Kotzé, J.: This case came before me as judge of the week of the King against Abraham Carolus, in which the prisoner was charged before the Resident Magistrate of Prince Albert with the theft of two goats. The Magistrate, on a plea of guilty, and after taking some evidence, found him guilty, and sentenced him to a year's imprisonment with hard labour. The Magistrate, according to the record, tried this case under his ordinary jurisdiction, and in the charge the accused was not charged with having violated or committed a breach of the Act 35 of 1893, but simply with the theft of stock, and, consequently, this must be treated as a case entirely under the ordinary jurisdiction of the Magistrate. Under his ordinary jurisdiction, he could only award a sentence of three months' imprisonment with hard labour, and not a sentence of twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour, which he could, under the Act 35 of 1893. The sentence must, therefore, be reduced to three months' imprisonment with hard labour.

GENERAL MOTION.

Ex parte BRADLEY.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the appointment of a provisional trustee in the insolvent estate of W. K. Saunders and Co., pending the election of a trustee by the creditors. Petitioner, who represented the South African Trading Co., said that Saunders and Co.'s estate was sequestrated on the 15th October, that insolvent was a carriage and coach builder, that he had plenty of work on hand, and that it was in the interests of the creditors that the business should be continued until the unfinished orders were completed, and that Messrs. Harry Gibson and George Wm. Steytler might properly be appointed provisional trustees, with power to carry on the business until the election of a trustee by the creditors.

Order granted as prayed.

SOLOMONS V. ROSENBERG. { 1903 Oct. 19th.

Malicious prosecution — Reasonable and probable cause.

The plaintiff had given to the defendant a certain cheque, and had by so doing obtained money from him. It was admitted that the plaintiff had no funds at the Bank to meet this cheque, and the Court found, as a fact, that the plaintiff had not informed the defendant of this. The defendant, finding the cheque dishonoured, had the plaintiff arrested, as he was about to leave Table Bay. The plaintiff was charged before the Magistrate with fraud and was acquitted. Plaintiff now sued the defendant for malicious prosecution and false imprisonment.

Held, that as the defendant had not acted without reasonable and probable cause, judgment must be given against the plaintiff with costs.

This was an action brought by Samuel John Solomons, commercial traveller, of Johannesburg, against David Rosenberg, boarding-house keeper, of Long-street, Cape Town, for £250 damages, for false and malicious prosecution and false imprisonment.

The declaration set out that on the 11th March, 1903, the defendant wrongfully, unlawfully, falsely, and maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause, made an affidavit before a Justice of the Peace charging the plaintiff with fraud. He accused the plaintiff of attempting to defraud him of £5 10s., by inducing him to give the plaintiff the said sum for a cheque drawn by the plaintiff for that amount, by representing it to be good and available for the said sum, although the plaintiff knew that he had no funds in the bank to meet it. He was arrested, and charged with fraud, and brought up in custody before the Resident Magistrate at Cape Town. The defendant gave evidence in support of the said charge, but the Magistrate dismissed the case on the following day, the 12th March, and discharged the plaintiff, who was proved not guilty. The charge was made against the plaintiff falsely, maliciously, unlawfully, and without reasonable and probable cause, and plaintiff had, in consequence, been much inconvenienced in his business, his trade and reputation having been injured. He claimed damages in the sum of £250.

The defendant admitted who the parties were, and also the statement as to the charge, but he denied that this charge was made maliciously or unlawfully, or without reasonable and probable cause.

Upon the foregoing pleadings, issue was joined.

Mr. Burton (with him Mr. Rainsford) for plaintiff; Mr. Buchanan for defendant.

Evidence was then called by Mr. Burton.

The plaintiff, Samuel John Solomons, a commercial traveller, at present of Johannesburg, said he was the manager for Messrs. W. J. Luyt and Co., paper merchants, of Cape Town and Johannesburg. He was also traveller for the firm. He first met defendant in Johannesburg in 1897. Plaintiff was then living with his mother. Rosenberg boarded with witness's mother. When the war broke out they all came down to Cape Town as refugees. Rosenberg and witness's mother set up a restaurant in partnership in Long-street. This did not last long. There were disputes as to the carrying on of the business. After the dissolution of partnership in 1900, the defendant continued to live in the same building; he had a shop below and a room upstairs. The defendant remained there until August, 1901, when witness left for Port Elizabeth. In the early part of that year, witness was pressed for money, through being out of work. In March he applied to the defendant for money. He asked Rosenberg to post-date a cheque for him for £5 10s. The cheque was dated 20th March. He explained his position to the defendant. He told him that he had no money at that time, but he expected to have some money in a few days; he had £30 to £40 due to him from a friend in Port Elizabeth, which would enable him to meet the cheque. When the time came for the cheque to mature he had not the money. He saw the defendant, and asked him to hold payment of the cheque over for a few days. He promised to see that the cheque should not go through. The defendant afterwards told him that the cheque had been returned to him. He asked defendant to keep the cheque until he had money to redeem it. He told the defendant the day he was going away to Port Elizabeth that he was leaving, and that as soon as he had sufficient money he would send it round to him. He remained in Port Elizabeth until June, 1902. Then he left for Johannesburg, and in February of this year he returned to Cape Town. He met defendant at the house of his sister, Mrs. Bernstein, where a gathering was being held for circumcision. He told defendant he would pay the money before he went away. He stayed in Cape Town about a month. On the 11th March he was going to Port Elizabeth by steamer. He met the defendant, and told him that he was going. He asked the defendant to meet him at his sister's house at lunch, when he would pay him the money. He drew £20 for his travelling expenses. The defendant did not keep his appointment. He left the money with his sister with instructions to be paid over to Rosenberg, when he called. Witness went to the steamer at three o'clock. When aboard he was arrested by a detective, and taken to Wale-street, and was subsequently removed to Roeland-street Gaol, where he was detained until the following morning. He was charged before the Magistrate next morning, and although defendant gave evidence, witness was acquitted. He was, as a consequence, delayed in his business rounds. He lost his passage money, £3 10s. He had to go to Port Elizabeth by train, and was four days late in his arrival. He lost several orders on his rounds through being late. He lost an £180 order with Mr. Brewster, of the "Port Elizabeth Advertiser." He would have had 2½ per cent. commission and expenses on that order. He lost an order at Cradock for £68, and for a lot of stuff at Bloemfontein.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He had not paid the debt. The money had been offered to Mr. Rosenberg, but he had refused to give up the cheque. He got a statement in February, 1901, from the bank, showing that he had only 3s. 9d. to his credit there. He averred that the defendant told him in March that he had deposited the cheque with the bank. He could not send any money from Port Elizabeth, when he went there in August, 1902, because he was laid up with typhoid fever. On the day when he was to leave for Port Elizabeth in March last, he had money to pay the debt, but when he saw the defendant he had not the cash in his possession, and he arranged with the defendant that he should call at his sister's for it. His brother was in difficulties at the time when he borrowed the money, but he did not know that he used the money for the purpose of helping his brother. He was a compositor by occupation. He was not a bookmaker; he was not a "punter" on the racecourse. The money had been ready ever since last March if Rosenberg had only been willing to give up the cheque.

By the Court: The defendant did not appear to be displeased with him before witness was arrested. They were not on unfriendly terms.

Sarah Bernstein, sister of the plaintiff, said she knew the defendant well. Prior to her marriage, the plaintiff and the defendant saw one another frequently. On the day of her brother's arrest, he gave her £5 10s., but Mr. Rosenberg did not call for the money. She knew nothing of the offer her brother made to Rosenberg after his arrest, but plaintiff himself knew of that.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Witness was not in London in March, 1901. The plaintiff did not want the £5 10s. to take his brother out of trouble. When her brother was arrested, she sent her husband down to the defendant to pay the money, but the latter would not give up the cheque.

Jacob Bernstein, husband to the last witness, said that prior to his brother-in-law's arrest, he remembered the defendant saying that he had to get £5 10s. for the plaintiff. This took place about a week before the arrest. When the plaintiff was arrested, his wife gave witness £5 10s. to take to Rosenberg. The defendant was willing to take the money, but he would not return the cheque. When the defendant was asked to withdraw the case, he replied, "Serve him right." The defendant further refused to give a receipt for the money. Rosenberg was informed that the money would be at witness's house any time he wanted it.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He did not give any evidence before the Magistrate. At the ceremony, witness did not ask the defendant not to say anything about money matters, as it was against "religion."

Harris Trafford Moorhouse, bookkeeper to Messrs. Luyt, produced the books, showing two payments made to the plaintiff of £10 each for travelling expenses.

Mr. Burton closed his case.

Mr. Buchanan called

Henry Percy, ledger-keeper at the A.B.C. Bank, who identified the cheque, which was presented to the bank after the 26th March. The cheque was sent back to the Bank of Africa marked "Refer to drawer." The plaintiff opened an account in December 1900, and on February 13 his balance was 3s. 9d. The account was closed the following December.

David Rosenberg, defendant, said that previous to the war he met the plaintiff in Johannesburg. He never lent the plaintiff a shilling; in fact, he did not trust him. Witness was never in partnership with plaintiff's mother. Plaintiff came up to him and asked him to cash a cheque for £5 10s., telling him that he had plenty of money at the bank. That was about 3.30 p.m. on 26th March, and the plaintiff explained that he wanted the money, as his brother was in trouble. Next morning, when the cheque was presented, a clerk at the A.B.C. Bank said that there was no money. Shortly afterwards, when witness went up to the house, plaintiff's mother ordered him out. A couple of days later the plaintiff said that he had put money in the bank, and that if witness would call the next morning, the cheque would be honoured. The cheque was again presented, with the same result. Witness never saw the plaintiff between March and August, and at that time his sister was in England. When the "solemn ceremony" at Bernstein's house was over, the plaintiff again promised to pay the money next day, but he failed to keep the appointment next day. Later on witness saw him in Wale-street, and invited him to the Police-station to settle it, but the plaintiff persuaded him to wait until nine o'clock that night. When witness heard that the plaintiff was leaving Cape Town, he lodged a complaint with the C.I.D. The affidavit was sworn to about one o'clock, and there was no arrangement that witness should be at his sister's house at that time to receive the money.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: Witness would not trust anybody. He wanted everything paid in advance. Witness would admit that he was very quick with his policeman. He presented the cheque at the A.B.C. Bank on the 1st April, and he went again on the 4th to see if there was any money to the plaintiff's credit. After he gave the plaintiff the money, he did not see him again until the evening before he presented the cheque. He would not have given the plaintiff a post-dated cheque. He was not on such friendly terms with the plaintiff as to have given him a post-dated cheque. His daughter looked at the almanack, and told him that he need not be frightened; he could go the following day and get the cheque cashed. The reason why he took the proceedings was that he wanted his money. He went to the police and lodged a complaint, and the Superintendent of Police said he would investigate. As a matter of fact, he wanted to run the plaintiff in two days after he received the cheque. No single relative of the plaintiff's ever came to him and offered him a sixpence. He did not take legal advice before he lodged the prisoner in gaol. He had not taken steps to enforce payment of the debt since the proceedings, because he had been unable to obtain the plaintiff's address.

Re-examined: He left the matter of the prosecution entirely in the hands of the police.

By the Court: He had never been in partnership in business with the plaintiff's mother. There was no appointment made for him to go to the plaintiff's sister for the money.

Rose Karlish, daughter of the defendant, said she lived with the plaintiff's mother in Johannesburg for about a fortnight, and she had no knowledge of any partnership with the latter. She remembered the plaintiff asking her father to change a cheque in order to release his brother, who was in trouble. The plaintiff said he had plenty of money in the bank. The cheque was given on the 26th March. She remembered her father running back from the bank, and saying "Oh, Rosie, there is no money in the bank!"

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: The plaintiff's mother said when defendant called, "You have locked one son up, and now you want to lock another up." "Sam" (plaintiff) never took her to the Gaiety.

Joseph Rosenberg, son of the defendant, said he was with his father when they met the plaintiff in Wale-street on the day of his arrest. The defendant said, "We are outside Wale-street Police Station, and we had better go in." The plaintiff made no mention of his sister having the money.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: The plaintiff was not at the ceremony on the second occasion.

Hermon Karlish, son-in-law of the defendant, said that he remembered the defendant speaking to the plaintiff after the prayers were read at the ceremony. The plaintiff promised to put in an appearance at the postponed function, but failed to do so.

Charles Wm. Fisher, detective, produced the complaint laid by the defendant at the C.I.D. After the affidavit was sworn to, witness went down to the boat, and arrested the plaintiff. After arrest the plaintiff said he had left the money at his brother-in-law's house, and that the defendant knew the cheque was a post-dated one.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: Witness would read from the complaint that the defendant had not seen the plaintiff until shortly before the arrest.

Mr. Burton, having been heard in argument, the Court intimated that it would be unnecessary to hear Mr. Buchanan.

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiff in this case sues the defendant for the recovery of £250 as damages sustained by him because of a malicious prosecution instituted against him by the defendant. The plaintiff complains that criminal proceedings were taken against him by the defendant maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause. It appears that the charge laid in the criminal proceedings was that the plaintiff had fraudulently given out that a cheque for the sum of £5 10s. upon the African Banking Corporation, which he then delivered to the defendant, was a good and available cheque, and of the value aforesaid that there were funds in the bank to meet the said cheque, and that it would be paid by the bank on presentation, and by this means obtained from the defendant the sum of £5 10s.; whereas the plaintiff well knew that the said cheque was not a good and available cheque of the value aforesaid, and that there were no funds at the bank to meet the said cheque. Now, the plaintiff alleges that this charge was made against him without reasonable and probable cause. If the plaintiff succeeds in proving that the defendant had no reasonable and proper cause for making this charge, he ought to succeed. If, on the other hand, the defendant proves that he had reasonable cause, the defendant ought to succeed. Now, it seems to me, that the evidence upon which the Court has to decide that point is of the most conflicting character. The plaintiff and the defendant contradict each other on almost every little incident from the initial stages of the transactions that took place between them until the moment of the arrest. If we accept the evidence of the plaintiff then I think it is clearly established that at the time when he entered into those transactions with the defendant, he fully explained all his circumstances to him, told him what his pecuniary position was, and said he required help, because he was in difficulty. He told him that he had no money at the bank, but that he thought he would get a remittance from Port Elizabeth shortly, and would then be able to meet this cheque. If all that was explained by the plaintiff to the defendant, then it is quite clear that the defendant could not have been under the belief that there were funds in the bank to meet the cheque. The plaintiff further proceeds to say that he and the defendant had for a long time been on a friendly footing, and he believed that was the motive why the defendant assisted him in this matter; that after this transaction had gone through and the cheque delivered to the defendant they met on several occasions, on each of which the plaintiff again explained his difficulty, and every time he satisfied the defendant that his intentions were bona fide, and the defendant was prepared to wait. Now, it seems to me that if that case was made out by the plaintiff there could not have been the slightest grounds for believing he was guilty of any fraudulent intention, but, on every point, he is contradicted by the defendant. The defendant says that the relationship between them was that of the barest acquaintanceship, that he hardly ever spoke to the plaintiff at all, that the plaintiff came to him on the 26th March, and asked him for assistance, because he was pressed in consequence of some difficulty into which his brother had got, and he expressly told the defendant if he proceeded to the bank on the next morning he would find funds there to meet the cheque, and the only reason the plaintiff did not go himself was because it was after bank hours. There would seem to be a direct conflict of statements between the plaintiff and the defendant, and the Court has to decide which statement to accept as true. As to the circumstantial evidence in this case, there is very little to guide the Court in the documentary evidence. I thought at one time that the counterfoil being dated the 23rd March and the cheque 25th March was corroborative of the plaintiff's evidence that he gave the cheque on the 23rd, and then explained that it had been post-dated for the 26th, because there was no money in the bank. But that circumstance itself is not of sufficient importance to outweigh others which are unfavourable to the plaintiff, which I shall mention afterwards. Then there is some documentary evidence which is favourable to the defendant's case. The defendant says that he was disappointed in not obtaining the money on the 27th, that he met the plaintiff on 31st March, and then complained to him that he had deceived him, and that the cheque had been dishonoured, whereupon the plaintiff explained that there was no money at the time, but that there would be money on the following day. We find on that day the cheque was placed by the defendant in the hands of his bank for the purpose of presentation to the plaintiff's bank, and we find that, according to the deposit receipt, the presentation of the cheque took place on the 1st April. That circumstance, I think, corroborates the statement of the defendant that on the 31st March he did press the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff then told him that the money would be in the bank the following day. Now after observing the manner in which the defendant gave his evidence, I think one cannot help coming to the conclusion that the defendant, if any money was due to him, would certainly be very anxious to obtain it, and that he is likely to press for the payment of that money, and if at any time he thought his disappointment arose from any dishonest action, that he would be doubly anxious to obtain his money. However, we have the plaintiff saying that, although he disappointed the defendant on four separate occasions, that on each occasion the defendant continued to be on friendly terms with him, and never expressed his displeasure. It am not prepared to accept that statement. I don't believe that on several occasions the plaintiff met the defendant and explained his difficulty, and on each of these occasions the defendant was satisfied to delay the settlement of this account; and if once upon that ground the evidence of the plaintiff is set aside as unreliable, then, I think, there will be little difficulty in arriving at a correct conclusion upon this case, because then we can turn to the evidence of certain other witnesses who directly corroborate the statement of the defendant. I particularly allude to the evidence of his daughter, which I am prepared to accept as true. The vivid description she gave of the events as they took place on the 26th March and the following day impressed me as a circumstance which established the truthfulness of her evidence. She says on the 26th March for the first time the plaintiff came to the defendant and obtained the money on the cheque, which was presented and dated the 26th March. She referred to the almanac to see if the money could be obtained at once, and then she told her father he could obtain his money the next morning, and then what happened the next morning seems to be strongly corroborative of the plaintiff's statement. She says he came back from the bank in a very excited condition, when he found out that the £5 10s., to which he seems to attach very great weight, was not forthcoming, and at once he proceeded to look for plaintiff in his mother's house, and that there was unpleasantness. If the statement of the daughter is accepted on that point, that upsets the evidence of the plaintiff on the most material point in the case, and I therefore come to the conclusion, on the whole, we must decide that at the time when defendant made the charge, he had good grounds for believing that the plaintiff intended to commit a fraud by giving out that there were funds in the bank to meet this cheque, and that he knew perfectly well there were none. Under the circumstances, judgment must be given for the defendant, with costs.

LABUSCHANGE v. MULLIGAN. 1903. Oct. 19th. Nov. 23rd.

Costs—Appeal.

The plaintiff having suffered much inconvenience from the public trespassing on his land, gave public notice that a certain road over his land was not a public road, and he placed an obstruction of stones across the road. The defendant's son, however, drove the defendant's wagon and oxen over the road, and the plaintiff brought an action in a Magistrate's Court for trespass against the defendant, who pleaded several exceptions and the general issue. The Magistrate gave judgment for the plaintiff for one shilling damages, but ordered each party to pay his own costs.

Held on appeal, that as the plaintiff had properly brought his action to assert a substantial right and had succeeded, the Court below ought to have awarded him his costs.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the R.M. of Dordrecht in an action brought by the plaintiff for £5 damages for trespass over a certain road on his farm, the plaintiff being awarded nominal damages of 1s. The facts sufficiently appear from the Magistrate's reasons, and from the judgment on appeal.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said that during the late war most of the fences around the farms in that district, where the military operations were carried on, were destroyed, and in many instances new roads were made across farms, and where fences had not yet been restored, were still being so used by the public. Across the farm in question, there was a public road, but it was in a bad state of repair until recently, when the Divisional Council was able to resume its work in this connection. The new road across the farm made during the course of military operations was generally used by the public. The plaintiff, desiring to put a stop to its being so used, put a notice in the local paper, warning persons against trespassing, as the farm was about to be fenced, although no mention was made of this particular road. The plaintiff informed his neighbours and others of the notice that he had caused to be published, and all such persons as he acquainted discontinued using the road. He (the magistrate) did not take the evidence of the plaintiff on the record. The fact was, however, recorded that young Mulligan was caught by plaintiff travelling on the road, that Mulligan's wagon was the only one that passed over that road after the notice had been inserted, and that he did not at any time invite the defendant's attention to the notice in the paper. He (the magistrate) felt satisfied that young Mulligan drove over the road, believing it to be a proper road. Under the circumstances, he awarded the plaintiff the nominal damage of 1s. As nearly a month had elapsed till the issue of the summons, and as the plaintiff had admitted that the fact of the defendant being stopped had had the desired effect, he regarded the case as trumpery, and with a view of discouraging actions of this kind, he refused to make an order as to costs.

Mr. Upington for the appellant, Mr. Buchanan for the respondent.

Postea (November 23rd).

Mr. Upington said that trespass was proved. That was a wrong for which the plaintiff was entitled to, and did recover damages. The parties were on fighting terms, there had been no misconduct on plaintiff's part, and the Magistrate was not justified in designating this as a trumpery case. The fact that the damages were merely nominal was no reason for depriving the plaintiff of his costs. He submitted that the Magistrate should in the ordinary course have awarded the plaintiff his costs.

Mr. Buchanan contended that the Magistrate was quite right in his judicial capacity in making this order. The boy was driving across an accustomed road, and he was not aware of the prohibition issued by the plaintiff. He submitted that this was not a matter of asserting a right. Nominal damages were awarded, and the Magistrate was quite justified in ordering each party to pay his own costs. The plaintiff really did not prove any damages.

De Villiers, C.J.: If this had been a trumpery case of defamation of character, in which the Magistrate had seen fit to award only a shilling damages, I should certainly never have disturbed the finding of the Magistrate when he ordered that each party should pay his own costs; but the action was brought for the substantial purpose of preventing trespasses that were going on upon the plaintiff's land. The plaintiff had inserted notices in the newspapers warning the public against trespassing on his land. In spite of this warning, the defendant's son went over a road during the night time, notwithstanding some obstructions of stones which were across the road. Thereupon an action was brought for trespass against the defendant. The defendant did not tender anything, he did not admit his liability, he did not admit his trespass at all, but instead of that he took a number of exceptions. His agent excepted that the summons was bad and embarrassing for the following reasons: "That the name of the defendant's son is not entered, that the summons does not say who had occupation of the farm on the 9th August last, the date of the alleged trespass, and thirdly, that no specific damages are alleged"—trivial exceptions all of them—"and in case the above exceptions are overruled and not otherwise, then the defendant pleads the general issue." Under the general issue he puts the plaintiff to the proof of the allegation that a trespass had been committed, and of all the other allegations in the summons. It was, therefore, a very material issue for the Magistrate to have tried, whether in this case there was trespass. The Court continually remarks that a person whose rights are infringed should not take the law into his own hands, and should have his case tried before a proper tribunal, and if such a person does so assert his rights, it is hard that he should have to bear the costs, not for a frivolous action, but for asserting a substantial right. The Magistrate therefore, in my opinion, erred in treating this as a trivial matter. No doubt the amount awarded was small, but the principle declared was important. The appeal will therefore be allowed, with costs in this court, and judgment entered for the plaintiff in the Court below for one shilling damages, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZÉ.]

HENNESSY v. CORTIS. { 1903. Oct. 20th.

Principal and agent — Agent's authority.

This was an action brought by Alfred Theodore Hennessy, broker and estate agent, Cape Town, against Antonio Cortis, building speculator, Woodstock, to recover £24 2s. 2d., interest alleged to have been paid for and on behalf of the defendant at his request.

The declaration set out that on or about the 8th June, 1903, the plaintiff paid for and on behalf of the defendant at his request, £24 2s. 2d. The said sum was interest due and payable by the defendant on a certain bond for £1,000, recently passed by one C. W. J. Petersen in favour of one Mrs. Inglesby, which defendant took over from the estate of the said Petersen upon the purchase by the defendant of a certain property. The defendant took over the said bond, subject to the conditions contained in a broker's note, which provided that the purchaser was to pay all arrears of interest which may become due and payable on the said bond up to the date of transfer. The said sum was portion of the said arrears of interest. The request of the defendant to the plaintiff to guarantee the sum to Mrs. Inglesby was implied by verbal authorisations on the part of the defendant, and also by the plaintiff being employed by him as his agent. The defendant refused to pay the said sum of £24 2s. 2d., or any portion thereof.

The defendant, in his plea, admitted the statement as to the parties, but denied paragraph 2. He denied that the said sum of £24 2s. 2d. was due and owing by him to the said Mrs. Inglesby. He said that the allegations as to his transactions in respect of the bond in favour of Mrs. Inglesby were wholly irrelevant to the present case, and prayed that the same be struck out. He denied that he expressly or impliedly authorised the plaintiff to pay the said sum of £24 2s. 2d. to the said Inglesby. He denies the allegations in paragraph 4, save that he admitted he refused to pay the said sum or any part thereof.

The replication was general.

Mr. Rainsford for the plaintiff; Mr. C. W. de Villiers for the defendant.

Mr. De Villiers submitted that the third paragraph should be struck out of the declaration as wholly irrelevant to the case. The plaintiff claimed as agent of the defendant, and he said he paid a certain sum as and on behalf of the defendant at the defendant's request, while in paragraph 4 he said the request was implied by the general course of business.

Mr. Rainsford said that before the money was paid by the plaintiff, he first gave a verbal guarantee to Mrs. Inglesby, and before doing that he had a conversation with the defendant. Mrs. Inglesby had agreed to pay the balance due on this bond of £54 odd. The defendant authorised the plaintiff to give this guarantee, and after this verbal guarantee was given, the balance was paid over by the plaintiff for and as the defendant's agent. The case was that the money was paid by the plaintiff for and on behalf of the defendant at his request, as his agent.

Evidence was then called in support of the claim.

Alfred Theodore Hennessy, the plaintiff, said he was a broker and estate agent, carrying on business in Cape Town. He had had various business relations with the defendant, who was a building speculator. He had acted as defendant's agent in raising money on mortgage. and also in buying on his behalf. In July, 1902, the defendant, through witness, bought a certain property, the document produced being the duplicate original of the broker's note. The defendant, he took it, understood the condition as to the payment of interest, witness having carefully explained the matter. The interest referred to was the arrears of interest upon the bond in the estate of Petersen, which should become due and payable. He had a conversation with the defendant. The property was bought for £1,150. The bond was security for a building loan granted for £1,000, upon which £954 or so had been paid out to Petersen. The balance of £54 odd had to be paid by Mrs. Inglesby. He told the defendant that it would be necessary to be responsible to Mrs. Inglesby for the interest, and the defendant authorised him to guarantee the interest. He gave the guarantee to Mrs. Inglesby's accountant, Mr. Arthur Syfret. The sum of £54 19s. 9d. was paid by Mrs. Inglesby to witness, who put it to Cortis's credit. He paid to Mrs. Inglesby's attorneys, Messrs. Scanlen and Syfret, £24 2s. 2d. as interest. The period covered by the interest was from the 26th May, 1902, to the 20th October. Witness had a second bond on the property. The defendant paid five months' interest on the second bond to witness. It was a recognised custom to pay money in this way on behalf of a client.

Cross-examined by Mr. De Villiers: He was a joint trustee in the insolvent estate of Petersen. He acted for the defendant, who was also a joint trustee, and he signed the broker's note. The defendant read the broker's note. He explained to the defendant very carefully what was meant to be conveyed by the clause rates and taxes and interest. He was unable to tell the defendant at the time what amount would have to be paid. He explained to the defendant that the bond had been passed on a certain date, and that no interest had been paid. Defendant would have some means of knowing approximately how much he would be liable for. He paid the interest on the 9th June, and although he had returned the defendant's papers to him before that date, he was bound to pay this interest in accordance with an arrangement made with Mrs. Inglesby's representatives, and which had been sanctioned by the defendant. He denied that so far as this payment was concerned his authority had been revoked. He was called upon by Messrs. Scanlen and Syfret to pay the interest.

Alfred Hugo, clerk in the office of Messrs. Syfret, Godlonton and Low, said that the amount of £24 2s. 2d. was guaranteed to the firm by the plaintiff, and that he was subsequently called on several occasions to pay the amount. Witness received a letter (produced), from Mrs. Inglesby, on or about June 5, in which she told witness to get the interest from Mr. Hennessy. Witness understood Mr. Hennessy represented the defendant Cortis in giving the guarantee.

Cross-examined: Hennessy did not give the verbal guarantee to witness. Witness did not ask for the written guarantee.

John Carmichael, plaintiff's head clerk, said that before the sale he pointed out to defendant that he would have to pay arrears of rates and so on, as provided in the broker's note. Witness was quite sure defendant understood he had to pay the interest on the bond. Witness did not know the amount until January. Defendant always intimated that if Hennessy paid the amount he would refund it.

Mr. Rainsford closed his case.

Mr. De Villiers called,

Antonio Cortis, the defendant, who said the property was first offered to him for £1,200, but eventually the price was fixed at £1,150. The broker's note was made out by Hennessy, who read it to witness. Witness could not read English. Previous to this they had discussed the conditions of sale, and no mention was made of arrears of interest or of rates and taxes. Witness did not understand he was undertaking to pay arrears of interest. He was prepared to pay rates and taxes and interest from the date of the bond.

[Maasdorp, J., handed a document, type-written in English, to the witness, and asked him to read it.]

The witness perused it, and in answer to the Court said he had read it.

[Maasdorp, J.: How, then, can you say you can't read English?]

Continuing, witness said that in November he received an account for £40 odd, which he paid. No mention of interest was made in that account. On the day transfer was passed (November 19) witness ceased to have any dealings with Hennessy. No mention was made of interest until the letter of the 1st May, to which witness did not reply.

Cross-examined: Witness took away a duplicate of the broker's note after Mr. Hennessy read it to him. He did not afterwards read it. Witness had paid arrears of interest for five months on another bond to the estate of Petersen. He took Mr. Hennessy's word for the accuracy of the account in which this arrear interest was included. Witness did not get any loan of £1,000.

In reply to Kotzé, J., witness said he had been speculating and dealing in land in Cape Town for the last ten years.

[Kotzé, J.: So that you know the practice very well?]

Yes, more or less.

Mr. De Villiers closed his case.

After hearing Mr. De Villiers and without calling upon Mr. Rainsford, the Court gave judgment for plaintiff for the amount claimed with costs.

Maasdorp, J.: In this case the plaintiff claims from the defendant payment of the sum of £24 2s. 2d., said to be due by the defendant to the plaintiff for moneys paid by the plaintiff as the defendant's agent at the special request of the defendant. Now, in a case of this kind it is not necessary for an agent to prove that the moneys which he is instructed to pay on behalf of the defendant are actually due. If he receives instructions to pay, and he pays, and it ultimately turns out that the debt was not due, that might raise questions as between the creditor and debtor as to the refunding of the money, but the agent would be entitled to be repaid what he had paid at the request of his principal. Now in this case it appears that upon the broker's note there is a condition that certain moneys due as interest shall be paid by the defendant. The plaintiff and the defendant had an interview, at which they seemed to come to the conclusion that this interest was due and payable, and the defendant, being under the impression that the interest was payable, instructed the plaintiff to pay. I am satisfied upon the evidence that is put before the Court that there was the clearest instruction given by the defendant that, in the first place, the plaintiff should guarantee payment of this money, and that when the money became due he should pay upon such guarantee. It seems that the plaintiff went to the defendant and explained to him that he could not obtain certain further advances for the purposes of expenditure on building unless the payment of the interest which, it was said by the agent, was due was guaranteed, and I think it is proved that the defendant thereupon told him that under the circumstances he authorised him to guarantee the amount. The plaintiff was at the time the agent of the defendant for transacting his business in the matter of purchasing properties and raising mortgages, and the defendant gave him the instruction, under such general powers, to pay this amount when it fell due. Now, if that is once proved, then we need not go into the further question of whether the moneys were actually due; but at the same time, even upon that point, we must find against the defendant. It appears that he bought the property for £1,150, and also agreed to pay the interest which was then due upon a certain bond, under which the property was mortgaged. After the sale it was arranged privately between the parties that the whole sum of £1,150 should not be paid in cash, but that the liabilities under the bond should be taken over by the defendant, and that the balance should be paid in cash. That bond was taken over, and I am satisfied it was taken over with the interest which was then due. Not only so, but it appears that some of the interest actually fell due after he got possession of the property, because he got possession of the property in July, and interest was paid up to October. I am satisfied he took over the indebtedness for interest even before the time when the purchase took place under this clause in the broker's note. On the whole of the evidence, therefore, I come to the conclusion that this interest, amounting to £24 2s. 2d., was due by the defendant to Mrs. Inglesby, and I am further of opinion that there was express authority given to the plaintiff to pay it. Judgment must, therefore, be given for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, with costs.

GROENEWALD v. HOWE. { 1903. Oct. 20th.

Surety — Co-principal debtor — Excussion.

The plaintiff had supplied certain goods to the mother of the defendant with whom the defendant lived. The Court found on the evidence that the defendant had guaranteed payment for the goods already supplied, but had made no promise as to payment for future supplies.

Held on appeal, that plaintiff's promise did not constitute him a co-principal debtor.

Held further, that as it had not been shown that he had received any consideration for such promise, he was not legally bound thereby.

Semble: Had he guaranteed payment for future supplies, and had the plaintiff in consideration of such promise continued to supply goods, he would have been liable as a surety, but would have been entitled to avail himself of the beneficium excussionis.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Uniondale in an action brought by the present respondent for £36 19s. 2d., for goods sold and delivered, the Magistrate having given judgment for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, with costs.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said that the plaintiff, the widow Howe, who was a storekeeper, sued for £36 19s. 2d., goods sold to the defendant and his mother (who died in July last), and for which the defendant made himself expressly liable. After plaintiff's agent had closed his case, the defendant's agent excepted, on the ground that the defendant was sued upon a verbal undertaking to pay for goods sold to his mother, and to the jurisdiction of the Court. He believed the defendant gave a verbal undertaking to be responsible for the goods sold and delivered, and as it appeared that the defendant had lived with his mother in the position of head of the family, and had actually purchased goods and paid instalments, and so reduced the account sued for, and for his assistance to and maintenance of the family he had received a quid pro quo, by having the erf of land transferred to him by his mother at a price equal to the amount advanced by the plaintiff for the building, the Court considered that the defendant could fairly be looked upon as the principal debtor, and not as a surety under promise. A portion of the goods was converted by the defendant to his personal use. The exception was overruled. The exception being overruled, the defendant declined to call evidence, and consequently, on the evidence before the Court, judgment was given for the plaintiff, with costs.

Sir H. Juta K.C., for the appellant. Mr. Burton for the respondent.

Sir H. Juta submitted that, although the summons said that the claim was for goods sold to the defendant and his mother, it appeared from the evidence that nearly the whole of the debt had been incurred by the mother. The plaintiff spoke to the defendant about the account, and he said that he would see if he could pay. That was the undertaking which the plaintiff relied upon. If it were an undertaking, it was by way of suretyship; and if so, the account was beyond the Magistrate's jurisdiction, and the principal debtor should have been summoned. Then there was the third ground, that if a man said he would pay a past debt if he could, then there must be consideration. Counsel submitted that the Magistrate's finding was incorrect. The evidence of the plaintiff was perfectly clear that the goods were sold to the mother. She herself said that she sued the defendant on a verbal promise to settle the account. Counsel contended that not only was the case beyond the Magistrate's jurisdiction, but he submitted that there was no undertaking on the part of the defendant that could be supported. The principal debtor ought to have been first sued. The plaintiff ought to have gone against the estate of the mother.

Mr. Burton said the summons was one for goods supplied to the defendant, and the Magistrate found, as a fact, that the summons had been borne out by the facts: that these goods were supplied to the defendant. There was evidence that the erf belonging to his late mother was transferred to the appellant for one-third of its real value. Counsel referred to the evidence to the effect that defendant said he would sell the cow and calf, and with that would settle the debt. This, he contended, amounted to an admission that the goods were supplied to the establishment of which defendant was the head. Defendant took part in and enjoyed the benefits of the goods supplied, and he (Mr. Burton) submitted that the Magistrate was right in finding that he was the principal debtor.

[Maasdorp, J.: What is the evidence on which you say he was the head of the establishment, and had to support his mother?]

Towards the end of his examination-in-chief, when she is speaking about this erf, plaintiff says: "I asked him what he paid, and he said he gave a cow. I said: 'How is that, when the erf cost your mother £53?' and the defendant said it was because he had to support his mother. He lived with his mother in the house." Continuing, counsel said that if the Court held that defendant was not the principal debtor, then there would be an end to the case. He contended that on the facts the Magistrate was correct in saying that, looking at the evidence fairly as a whole, the defendant was liable.

Maasdorp, J.: If the appellant is successful in this case upon the merits, then it will be unnecessary to go into the question of whether this was a guarantee, and not a debt for goods sold and delivered. I shall, therefore, first consider how the case stands upon the merits. It seems that the plaintiff sued the defendant for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant and his mother, and supplied to his order, for which he made himself expressly responsible by specially undertaking to pay therefor. In the first place, the question arises as to whom these goods were supplied to. Referring to the evidence of the plaintiff herself, it appears that she says: "I sold these articles I sue for to the defendant's mother, on his promise that he would pay for them." Well, if we take that statement by itself, then there is clearly evidence by the plaintiff herself that she supplied the articles to the mother. But then I think that is supported by the evidence that follows. It was only when the account had reached £37 that the defendant first promised to assist in paying for the articles. Now, if it were necessary for the defendant to make a special promise, after the goods were supplied, that he would pay for the articles, then that is proof that the articles were not supplied to him; because if the articles were supplied to him and his mother, he would have been liable to pay, without an express promise afterwards made that he would so pay, and I think that it establishes the point that, in the mind of the plaintiff herself, was the belief that she had sold these goods to the defendant's mother. Further on, she says: "I think it was in December, 1902, when I first spoke to the defendant with a view of getting him to pay his mother's account." I should say that, upon reference to to the books, it is proved that the plaintiff herself regarded the account as the account of the mother, and not the account of the defendant. Then the question arises whether after these goods had been supplied to the mother there was a special promise made by the defendant to pay for them. Now, if that promise was simply confined to the debt which had been already contracted by the mother, then in the absence of any consideration passing to the defendant himself he would not have been liable upon such promise even if he had made it. If the evidence, therefore, ended there, then there would have been no liability upon the defendant even upon such promise. If, on the other hand, there was a promise on the part of the plaintiff to continue to supply goods upon his promising to undertake the liability for the past and future debts, then a consideration did exist, and if the promise were made the defendant would be liable. But I find upon the evidence of the plaintiff herself that the supply of future goods was not promised, and that it formed no consideration for the undertaking by the defendant. She says: "I did not say that I should supply further goods." There is some doubt as to the exact words upon the evidence taken, but whichever view is taken, either that which appears upon counsel's notes, or as it appears on the documents before the Court, which should be the original, the result is the same—that there was no undertaking to supply goods in the future. In another part of her evidence the plaintiff says that the defendant gave an undertaking to pay for the goods already supplied, and she says, "I believed his promise, and so the account went on." She does not say that the account went on as a consideration for the promise made by the defendant, but she merely casually states that she believed that promise, and so the account went on. If she accepted the promise and afterwards on the strength of that promise supplied the goods, that does not make the supplying of the goods a consideration for that promise. On the evidence, therefore, as presented to the Magistrate by the plaintiff herself, and uncontradicted, I think it appears that the goods were supplied to the mother, and that there is no binding promise made by the defendant to pay for them. Referring to the reasons given by the Magistrate, it seems to me that he had introduced reasons for his judgment, which are not at all sound. He seems to have thought, because the defendant lived with the mother, and had the benefit of these goods, and that to some extent he had from time to time assisted the mother and paid part of that debt, that he could fairly be looked upon as the principal debtor, and be so made responsible for the amount of the account. That seems to be very unsound reasoning for making the defendant a principal debtor. He could only become principal debtor by his undertaking to be so, and not because he had enjoyed the benefit of the goods supplied to the mother. Under the circumstances, the appeal must be allowed, and the judgment will be altered to one of absolution from the instance, with costs, respondent to pay the costs of the appeal.

SMITH AND SON v. CAPE TOWN TOWN COUNCIL. { 1903. Oct. 20th.

Agency—Estoppel.

One D., a servant of the Colonial Government, had ordered certain goods from the plaintiffs for public purposes. The orders were made out on Town Council forms, and plaintiffs having sued the Council in the Magistrate's Court for the price of these goods, the Magistrate granted "absolution from the instance," with costs.

Held on appeal, that as the goods had not been ordered by any official of the Town Council, the Council could not be held responsible, and that as no Town Council official had held out the Council as liable, the Council were not estopped from denying liability, and that the Magistrate's judgment must, therefore, be affirmed and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Acting Resident Magistrate of the Cape. The appellant brought an action in the Magistrate's Court for £75, for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant Council, and supplied to their order, at their request and for their use. The defence was that the Colonial Government was responsible, and not the Town Council, the goods not having been ordered by the Town Council nor used by them. The evidence in the Court below of the plaintiff, George Smith, was to the effect that he supplied the Corporation of the city with 100 disinfecting lamps and 50 lamps on the 12th and 15th March, 1901. He produced the orders for these goods, written on Town Council order forms. Appellant had first made application to the Government, but was referred to the Town Council for payment. The lamps were for use in bubonic plague work. The evidence for the defence was that the person who signed the orders (one McDonald), and the receipts were Government officials. The Town Council had given temporary accommodation to Government plague officials in the Mutual Hall (the offices of the Town Council Health Department), where the goods were ordered to be sent. It was not known how the Government officials came into possession of the Town Council forms. The Council did not order these goods or receive them. It was arranged between the Government and the Town Council in February, 1901, that money on account of plague expenses should be paid on behalf of the Government on the certificate of McDonald by the City Treasurer, whose services were lent by the Council. The Government paid money into a special account, called "City of Cape Town plague account," which money was supplied to reimburse the Council for out-of-pocket expenses. The Council disbursed money on the certificate of McDonald for about six months until the Government Plague Department was properly organised. There were no Government funds in hand now to meet disbursements of this sort.

In his reasons the Magistrate said it appeared from the evidence that, though the orders were made out on Corporation forms, why this was done did not appear. The orders were signed by one McDonald, a Government official from the Colonial Office, who was in charge of the expenditure of the Plague Department, which department was apparently at the time under the control of the Government. The receipts were not signed by Town House officials. Other goods supplied to the Plague Department had been paid for by the Corporation out of the special fund into which the Government paid money, and cheques thereon were drawn by Mr. De Villiers, not in his capacity as City Treasurer, but in his private capacity. Under the circumstances, the Magistrate did not see his way to give judgment against the Corporation, and therefore granted absolution from the instance with costs.

Mr. Alexander for the appellants. Mr. Schreiner, K.C., for the respondents.

Mr. Alexander submitted that McDonald was constituted an agent of the Town Council, and that even if he were not their agent, if, in fact, he were a Government official, the Town Council were now estopped from setting up that case by reason of their conduct in setting up McDonald as their agent. He argued that the Town Council had by their conduct led the appellants to believe that McDonald was their (the Council's) agent.

Maasdorp, J., asked Mr. Schreiner if he could give any reason for the action of the Government in the matter in refusing to pay the amount.

Mr. Schreiner said that while one must sympathise with the appellants, one could not give away the money of the ratepayers, as the Town Council were asked to do.

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiff in this case sued the defendant for moneys due for goods sold and delivered, and the magistrate has found that it was not proved that the goods were sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants. I think I need hardly add anything to the reasons given by the Magistrate in his judgment; he seems to have taken a correct view of the case, and has stated very clearly upon what grounds he founded his judgment, and upon the evidence I think the conclusions he arrived at are correct. It is necessary for the plaintiff to prove that the goods were ordered by the defendants and supplied to the defendants, and we have the very clear evidence of the secretary of the Corporation that the goods were ordered by persons who were not in the employ of the Corporation at all, and were also supplied and delivered to persons who were not in the service of the Corporation. If that is taken to be true, then the plaintiff must fail. and if we refer to the evidence of one of the plaintiff firm, Mr. Smith, then it seems quite clear that he is not in a position to contradict the evidence given by Mr. Finch, because he never came into personal contact with the persons who ordered the goods or to whom they were delivered. Consequently, Mr. Finch's evidence stands uncontradicted, and we must take it that the goods were ordered by and delivered to persons who were not in the employ of the Corporation, and for whom the Corporation were not responsible, and consequently the goods were not sold and delivered to the defendants. It is said that even if it is not proved that the goods were sold and delivered to the defendants, still the defendants ought to be held liable on the principle that they made representations which led the plaintiff into the belief that he was dealing with them and giving them credit, but even that has not been proved, because there were no representations made by any official in the Corporation's service at all. The only representations that were made were made by Mr. MacDonold, who was in the service of the Government, and the representation referred to is in the form of the orders that were sent, upon which it would appear that the orders were in the name of the Corporation. But those order forms were used, not by an official in the employ of the defendants, but by a person with whom they had no connection at all. Consequently the representation of that person could in no way bind the defendant, and the representations of Mr. McDonald cannot now be used as an estoppel to prevent the defendants from setting up the defence that the things were not ordered by them or supplied to them. Under the circumstances, I think the judgment of the Magistrate was correct, and the appeal must be disallowed, with costs.

Kotzé, J., concurred.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

WORCESTER MUNICIPALITY AND OTHERS v. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

1903. Oct. 21st. „ 22nd. 1904. Mar. 14th.

Municipality — Powers — Ordinance 9 of 1836—Agreement as to water.

In 1874, the Commissioners of the Municipality of W., which was constituted under Ordinance 9 of 1836, agreed with the Government that water from a stream, to which the inhabitants had a common right, should be allowed, free of charge, for temporary and permanent railway service. The requirements of the Government were for about 9,000 gallons a day, but in consequence of the extension of the Railway system, the requirements increased in 1904 to over 60,000 gallons a day. No regulation existed authorizing the Municipality to supply water to others than inhabitants.

Held, in an action brought by the Municipality against the Government for a declaration of rights, that the Municipality had no power under the Ordinance to enter into the agreement.

This was an action instituted by the Municipality of Worcester, together with George Joseph Roos, an erf holder, Jacobus Franeman, and Adam October, two residents of the location in the said Municipality, against the Commissioner of Public Works administering the Railway Department of the Colonial Government, for a declaration of rights, an interdict, and damages.

The declaration was in the following terms:

1. The first-named plaintiff is the Municipal Council of Worcester, which is a Municipality brought in 1895 under the operation of the Municipal Act No. 45 of 1882, but theretofore constituted under the provisions of the Municipal Ordinance No. 9 of 1836.

2. The second-named plaintiff is the registered owner of an erf in the town or Municipality of Worcester, and is as such owner legally entitled not only for domestic use, but also for irrigation, to the use of water from the supply hereinafter mentioned.

3. The third and fourth-named plaintiffs are residents lawfully occupying houses and plots of ground in the duly-constituted native location, forming part of the town and Municipality of Worcester, and as such resident occupiers they are legally entitled to a certain use of the said water for domestic purposes and for irrigation.

4. The first-named plaintiff more directly represents the ratepayers within the Municipality, and the second, third, and fourth-named plaintiffs join in this action for the enforcement of their rights in so far as they may for that purpose be inadequately represented by the first-named plaintiff.

5. Before, in, and since the year 1874 there has been and is a supply of water collected and distributed by Municipal and other works for the supply of the town and Municipality of Worcester, and of the inhabitants thereof, including householders, ratepayers, erf-holders, and resident occupiers of the native location, and the said supply was in 1874, and subsequently until 1895, under the control of the Commissioners of the said Municipality within the limits of the law existing in regard to supplies of water to which the inhabitants of a Municipality are entitled, and thereafter within similar limits has been and is under the control of the Municipal Council of Worcester, duly constituted under the provisions of Act No. 45 of 1882.

6. In the same year, 1874, and continuously thereafter, the defendant and his predecessors in office administering the Railway Department of, and representing the Government of this colony, has diverted, taken, and used, free of charge and without payment, large and varying, but from time to time, increasing quantities of water from the said supply of water to which the town, Municipality, and inhabitants of Worcester were and are entitled.

7. The said diversion, taking, and using, of water by the defendant's predecessor in office commenced under leave and licence given or granted to the defendant's predecessor by the then Commissioners of the said Municipality, who in that year resolved "That water for temporary and permanent railway service be allowed free of charge, but water leadings by pipes from the eastern reservoir shall have to be paid for at the same charges as paid by resident householders," and the defendant and his predecessor have thereafter continued to claim under the said gift or grant a right to divert, take, and use water as aforesaid.

8. The said Commissioners, and thereafter the Municipal Council of the said Municipality, had and have no legal right or power either to give or grant as aforesaid, or in any manner to sell or concede to the defendant or his predecessors in office, the right either temporarily or in perpetuity to divert, take, or use the said water as aforesaid, but they did submit to and acquiesce in the temporary taking, diversion, and use, which the defendant and his predecessors in title accordingly enjoyed free of charge or payment.

9. The defendant and his predecessors in office have taken and used, and continue to take and use, large quantities of water for purposes not included in the original grant of leave and licence, and not being for Government railway service, to wit, for domestic use in connection with the residences of workmen, for irrigations of land and plantations, and for the railway service of the Cape Central Railways, whose railway undertaking is connected at Worcester with the Government Railways, all which was not contemplated by the said commissioners. The defendant and his predecessors in office have moreover taken and used, and continue to take and use quantities of water largely increased beyond what was contemplated by the said commissioners in the year 1874.

10. All the aforesaid diversions, taking, and use of the said water, specified in the last preceding paragraph, have been ab initio wrongful and unlawful on the part of the defendant and his predecessors in office.

11. On or about the 4th September, 1900, the firstnamed plaintiff lawfully gave notice to the General Manager of Railways, who properly represented the defendant to receive such notice, that the arrangement under which the said diversion, taking, and use of water was made by the defendant, must terminate after the 31st December, 1900, and it became and was the duty of the defendant to comply with the said notice and to cease to divert, take, and use water, as aforesaid on and after the 1st January, 1901.

12. From time to time, especially during the dry season of the year, the inhabitants, and more especially the owners of erven, including the second plaintiff, in regard to irrigating, and the resident occupiers of the native location, including the third and fourth named plaintiffs, in regard to domestic use and irrigation, have suffered and suffer loss and damage through scarcity of water caused by the aforesaid diversion, taking, and use, done and made by the defendant and his predecessors in title in regard to the said supply of water.

13. The defendant by the said General Manager of Railways wrongfully and unlawfully refused to accept the said notice, or any notice whatsoever from the first-named plaintiff terminating the said arrangement and wrongfully and unlawfully refused to cease upon the said 1st January or thereafter, or at any time the said diversion, taking, and use of water, and wrongfully and unlawfully contends and claims that he and his successors in office are entitled in perpetuity to divert, take, and use water from the said supply in unlimited quantities for the railway service and also for the purposes referred to in paragraph 9 hereof, and wrongfully and unlawfully continues accordingly to divert, take and use such water for the said purposes, to the great detriment and damage of the plaintiffs.

14. The plaintiffs claim damages in the sums of £500, £15, £10, and £10 respectivly.

Wherefore the plaintiffs pray:

(a) For a declaration that the original granting of water by the aforesaid commissioners was ultra vires and illegal, and that the defendant is not entitled thereunder either temporarily or in perpetuity to continue to divert, take, and use water for all or any of the purposes aforesaid.

(b) A perpetual interdict restraining the defendant and his successors in title from diverting, taking, or using any of the said water as aforesaid either for railway service or for any other purpose or in the manner set forth in section 9 hereof.

(c) Judgment for the sum of £500, £15, £10, and £10 respectively; or

(d) That they may respectively have in the premises such further and other relief, or, as this Honourable Court may deem fit, together with costs of suit.

The defendants admitted paragraphs 1 to 7, with certain minor reservations. They denied paragraphs 8 and 9, and said that all the purposes for which the water was used were purposes within the meaning of the agreement. They denied paragraph 10. They denied paragraphs 12, 13, and 14, and said that the plaintiff had sustained no damages whatsoever. They prayed that the claim of the plaintiffs should be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Sir H. Juta, K.C.), for plaintiffs. Mr. H. Jones (with him Mr. Nightingale) for the defendants.

Mr. Schreiner read correspondence which had passed between the Municipality and the Railway Department, dating back to the '60's, relating to the water used for railway purposes.

John Brown Ellis said he was a civil engineer for many years in the service of the C.G.R. He produced a plan for the purposes of the case. In Worcester they had two reservoirs and a tank, with a capacity of fifty-nine thousand gallons, and the engines and railway cottages were supplied from these sources. The total consumption of the railways—the C.G.R. and the C.C.R.—including engines and domestic purposes, amounted to seventy thousand gallons per day. There was a considerable flood of water down through the railway yard drainage, and a large quantity of Municipal water was used for flushing purposes. The railway premises had grown enormously since 1878.

Cross-examined by Mr. Howel Jones: The few cottages that existed in 1878 were railway cottages. His calculation was an approximate estimate. Between forty and forty-five trains passed Worcester daily, and he put the trains down for two thousand gallons per day. The furrow was a diversion from the main stream. He had seen the water flowing into railway premises, but he would not say that the railway made the diversion.

Mr. Schreiner put in plans supplied by the Government, showing the piping of the water within the station area, and the drain from the station yard.

Frederick Lindenberg, attorney, said he had been for 20 years past Municipal secretary and clerk at Worcester. The correspondence put in during the past twenty years had gone through his hands. It had not been possible to bring any of the town commissioners to court. There were two living still, but neither was fit to give evidence. He knew the station, and the surroundings. The cottages stood on the hillside opposite the station. There were flower gardens, fruit trees, and vegetables around the cottages. The only water used for this cultivation was drawn from the reservoir. There was a new railway reservoir immediately adjoining the old, but the water was not taken from this new reservoir. He had only recently seen the new reservoir. The water sent down in the pipes was used for the railway engines, for flushing the urinals, for watering the station platform, also for the refreshment-room, the stationmaster's quarters, the locomotive shed, and the workshops. The water from the tank at the station was also supplied to the New Cape Central Railway. There had been no approach from the Government to the Municipality to recognise their claim to payment. This water came from the railway reservoir, and was carried down in a 9 in. main. He had not seen water thus obtained conveyed in tanks on the Cape Central Railway. The dry season usually lasted from October almost to the end of April. There was a good deal of irrigation in the town, and there was also the location below the town, where irrigation was also in existence that required water. They had summer rains between October and April, but it was the exception rather than the rule to have rains. During the last three seasons there had been a good deal of summer rains. When they had no summer rains they had got into severe straits for a supply of water, and they had been compelled to divide the water used for irrigation between the lower and the upper town. It had also been necessary to give up watering the streets. The main pipe from the Eastern reservoir went through the town. That reservoir was constructed under the Act of 1863. It was the only service reservoir that the Municipality had. For the rest the water came in an open furrow after it had gone past the mill. For water from this open furrow no charge was made. Erf holders led water from the furrow, according to a recognised system of distribution. Erf holders had always had this right as far as memory went. The Municipality's right was founded upon a half share of the Hex River. The open furrow passed down Tulbagh-street, and was then divided, running down the cross streets. From that course the water was taken that flowed down the drain in the station yard. The Municipality had never directed that its water should be diverted as far as the records disclosed. The embankment of the main furrow had been cut open, and there had been a continual flow into the drain at the station yard. He did not know that this had been done until recently. It was quite impossible for the water so diverted to come back to the town supply. Really speaking, the drain was a ditch. The water finally ran off in the direction of the Government plantation. The erf-holders and the people in the location had constantly complained to the Council about the scarcity of water. The Council had never taken any steps against the Railway Department hitherto. He remembered the case brought by Mr. Joubert against the Council and the Government. It was then stated that 37,000 gallons of water per diem were used by the department. Since 1895 the Government had made a largely-increased use of water. Witness did not produce any figures. A return had been furnished by the Government as to their use of the water. In 1876 the quantity used was 9,000 gallons per diem. In the present year their user was admitted to be 54,000 gallons, independently of the consumption at the cottages. Witness spoke to the considerable growth and expansion of railway property during that period involving an immensely increased consumption of water by the department at Worcester. The diversion of water by the Railway Department was of some moment to the Municipality. A considerable quantity was taken by the cottages. A charge of 1s. 6d. per 1,000 gallons ought to have been paid by the department for the water supplied to the Cape Central Railway.

Cross-examined by Mr. Jones: He would say that the gardens were watered from the kitchen taps. Up to recently the Cape Central Railway's engines were under the control of the Government when they came on the Government lines. The quantity of water was getting less since 1885, with the exception of the last few years, but that was due to exceptional summer rains. It was certainly kind of the Government to put a weir in the Hex River.

By Maasdorp, J.: The increase during the last few years was not due to the weir.

Cross-examination continued: The bags and bushes that had been placed in the Hex River formerly were serviceable enough, and the stone weir did not increase the supply on account of the washaway. Worcester was entitled to take about half the Hex River. The town would be much better off if they were allowed to irrigate with the water below the mill. It was possible to find a volume of seven and a quarter million early in December, but in January it dropped to two millions. The sole object of the action was not the fact that the Government had not paid for the water. There was no consideration given by the railway for having put their premises where they did. The station was on a commonage. The Municipality first took up the matter in April, 1881, but no steps were taken to have the agreement cancelled. Witness, in 1887, drew attention to the fact that the C.G.R. was selling water to the C.C.R. He had never changed his mind about the validity of the agreement. Worcester itself had made a considerable increase in population, but he pointed out that the requirements of the Railway Department had increased in a greater proportion, there having been a considerable growth in through traffic. He was not aware of any water regulations in existence within the Municipality in 1874. The distribution would probably have been by blocks. Before the reservoir was constructed, the rate was a general one, though it was known to the old inhabitants as a water rate, because, he supposed, it was the only benefit they could see for what they had to pay. He believed it would be impossible to take water from the Eastern Reservoir to the Railway Reservoir to feed the engines. By the authority of the Governor's Proclamation, the certificates of occupancy, with rights as regards water, were given to one of the plaintiffs in the suit. The lower furrow was not a stormwater drain at the station yard, and it was never dry. He could not say that the Government had diverted the water.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The water had not been diverted from the furrow to the station yard by the Municipality, and there was no record that any correspondence took place between the Government and the Municipality. It was many years before 1900 that the Municipality decided to take some action. The flow of the Hex River he had known to be as low at two million and a half gallons. All the railway cottages were on commonage, and they had never paid for that. Three hundred thousand gallons was the limit they could take above the mill. The Government constructed the weir to relieve the Municipality, but in the dry summer months it would not divert any more water than that of the old system.

By the Court: The water diverted from the furrow would be sufficient for irrigation. The loss of the water had a material effect on the whole town.

Jacobus Petrus Malan, Mayor of the Worcester Municipality, said he had been resident thirteen years in the town. He was a member of the firm of Malan and Van der Westhuysen, who carried on business as millers, and were lessees under Joubert. During the last few years they had had good summer rains. The supply of water had been well maintained. Previously there had been a diminution of water in the mill race during the summer season. The Government computation that 7½ million gallons ran down the furrow during the dry season was incorrect. That quantity would be more than the total flow. Only about 2½ million gallons was available to the town. If they had a better supply in the summer season, the Municipality could give more satisfaction to the consumers in the lower village. They could also water their streets, and they could go on planting trees. One of the causes of the diminution at the mill race was, in his opinion, the quantity taken away by the Government above the intake. He had seen water taken out of the furrow for the drain at the station yard, and he had spoken upon this matter to the overseer, Mr. Roux. The ratepayers were constantly complaining that the Council did not see that their rights were enforced against the Government, and that they were not given the benefit of the water they were entitled to. The Government supplied the Cape Central Railway with water. He had seen water taken away in tanks for twenty miles out of Worcester, on the Cape Central Railway.

Cross-examined by Mr. Jones: He had seen this happen several times on the Cape Central Railway. There was no scarcity of drinking water in the town during the summer. The shortage was really in water required for irrigation purposes. The erf holders got less water than they used to do, except during the past three summers, when they had had a comparatively good rainfall. It seemed to him that each year the Railway Department's consumption had increased at the rate of 60,000 gallons per diem. The Municipality really did not know where the department were going to stop. They started with a 3-in. pipe, and now they had a 5-in. pipe. The shortage of water caused a depreciation of property. The gardens were getting smaller each year, because of this lack of water. The Municipality wanted to beautify the town as much as possible. About five years ago readings were taken in the Hex River in February, when the flow was five million gallons. He was formerly co-partner at the mill with the late Mr. Joubert. He had not seen the water diverted by any Government employee from the sluit to the station yard. He would not say that it was stormwater that went down the furrow.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He had seen water running down the drain at the station yard in the summer season, when the question of stormwater would not arise. The reading about five years ago was taken by Mr. Stewart, and referred to the total flow. The gauge was taken on behalf of the firm with which witness was connected.

By the Court: The water belonged to the Municipality, but only 340,000 gallons could be taken out before it reached the mill. The mill was now run by a turbine.

John Leach, of Worcester, said that three years ago he lived at the cottage, near what was known as the old wool washing. He knew the drain that went through the station yard. The drain passed in front of the house witness formerly occupied, and the Municipal irrigation sluit went behind. He had noticed water flowing in the drain in the summer, when there was no water in the Municipal irrigation sluit. He had also noticed more water running in the drain than in the irrigation sluit.

Cross-examined by Mr. Jones: The wool-washing was close to the Government plantation. The irrigation sluit came from Tulbagh-street. For three years he was unable to water his garden regularly. He used to have to water his garden in the night, when other people were not drawing on the sluit.

By the Court: There was never any shortage of water in the drain during the six years when he occupied the cottage.

Andries Hendrick du Toit, of Worcester, said he was in the employ of the Western Wine and Brandy Co., and had lived in the cottage, formerly occupied by the last witness, during the last three years. He had seen water running in the drain all the time, even when the irrigation furrow was empty. He had been compelled to stop the distillery machinery through the shortage in the irrigation furrow. He had followed the course of the furrow right above the station to the dam, and he found that the trouble was due to there being very little in the furrow at any point. He had lived in Worcester since 1892. Since 1895 he should say that the water supply at Worcester had been diminishing. The town had been increasing, and the requirements for irrigation were greater.

Cross-examined by Mr. Jones: He should not say that the supply was actually less than in 1895. The demand was greater owing to the increase of the town. He had on several occasions traced the irrigation sluit beyond the station. The supply was not strong enough to reach his place. He had been much inconvenienced by the stoppage of his machinery through the shortage of water in the irrigation sluit. He made complaints to the secretary of the company. The distillery had been in existence about three years. The water in the drain was too dirty to use for the machinery.

By the Court: He had not seen water from the Municipal furrow flowing into the drain. If the water in the drain had been clean, it would have been sufficient to drive the machinery. If the water had been collected for a night they would have been able to irrigate a plot of ground next day.

Henry Klauff, of Worcester, a former employee of the C.G.R., said he knew the drain that ran through the station yard. There were a number of cottages around, which emptied into the drain. Witness had to flush the drain. He got the water for that purpose from the Municipal watercourse. He opened the watercourse under orders, and flushed the drain. The Municipality's employees closed the sluit after it had been opened, and witness afterwards opened it again.

Cross-examined by Mr. Jones: He received his instructions from the inspector, Mr. Reeks, as to opening the sluit. Mr. Reeks was not now at Worcester. Witness was not now in the employ of the C.G.R. He had only opened the sluit about three times in the course of three years. Mr. Lindenberg complained in August about the water running from the sluit.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: During the three years he was there the water flowed through the drain. On three occasions he opened the drain. It was closed with an embankment of soil.
